The Socialist Minister, Finocchiaro, replied, acknowledging the justice of the complaint and promising an immediate amendment to the law before the end of the present session, so that "the journalist in the exercise of his noble profession will incur a less severe penalty in case of libel." This is all very mysterious. It looks at first blush like a preparation to save the Seculo, Messaggero, Avanti and Evangelista (Methodist) from condign punishment for their exploitation of the defamations of Father Bricarelli, for which Verdesi was condemned. On the other hand the deputy making the interpellation is said to be a good Catholic, and may have only been drawing the fire of the anti-clericals and warning them indirectly that men in political life would be the first to suffer from a wide open press. You cannot always be sure in such matters, and if the interpellant member was acting a part, he acted it to the life and leaves one with an uneasy feeling in consequence.

The question of the government monopoly of all life insurance has stirred up a great deal of opposition, and the government now proposes to appoint a commission to look into the whole matter and report with findings and recommendations. The suffrage proposals of the Prime Minister, Giolitti, are undergoing a sort of preliminary discussion and evoking a kaleidoscopic variety of views. Some are for manhood suffrage, illiteracy or no; some for an adult human suffrage that will bring in the women; others for preserving a high character to the electorate by retaining present restrictions. Incidentally, others again desire to exclude a possibility of gerrymandering by having proportional representation from large districts, which will ensure that the minority has a fair share in the representation, while over all the anti-clericals hang the cloud of a possible amendment making the use of the suffrage obligatory, thereby bringing out the full clerical vote and swamping those at present in power. Ah, well! Doubtless all the world over the hour has struck for a discussion of the duty of the ballot rather than its right and privilege. C. M.

Portugal's Reign of Terror

MADRID, June 16, 1911.

Only those who have read the tragic history of France under Marat and Robespierre, or of unfortunate Poland under the brutal tyranny of autocratic Russia, can form an idea of what is going on in Portugal under the oligarchy that now controls its destinies. Is it any wonder that the Constituent Assembly was all of one way of thinking when, by the simple expedient of a ministerial decree a committee of two hundred citizens of Lisbon should represent at the polls the sixty thousand registered citizens of Lisbon? With good reason did Colonel Paiva Couceiro say, after having been ordered out of Spain at the request of the Lisbon miscalled government, that he would not recognize the elections for the Constituent Assembly, because they had been held in defiance of what have everywhere and always been looked upon as necessary conditions for legitimate elections.

Several varieties of persecution at the hands of the so-called Republican cabinet have been mentioned again and again; but now there is no question of brutal treatment on the public street, of exile or of arrest and solitary confinement, with no charge presented and no examination made. The feature that we wish to bring out on this occasion is that of the number of sudden deaths that have taken place in Portugal, and of suspicious attacks of insanity which have seized upon certain prominent individuals known to be unfriendly to the present régime.

The first to die suddenly, with no preceding sign of ailment, was Don Celestino Silva of Lisbon. He was looked upon as a monarchist conspirator, according to the government newspapers. He may well have been, for all we know, but on a certain day last March he sickened and died. Several others have followed him in orderly succession. Among them were a lieutenant of artillery, and another officer in the same branch of the service and two civilians, one of whom had been suspected of plotting, but had been released from prison only a few hours before death overtook him. Among those who have off-hand developed symptoms of madness are Professor Fortunato Almeria of Coimbra, and Senhor Machado Braga. What brings on those attacks of insanity in men who have always been known as levelheaded and soberminded? It is well worth while to try to answer that question.

For our part, we are satisfied that the signs of the times point to a speedy overthrow of the present order in Portugal; but we cannot see, even in fancy, the young king on his way back to Lisbon. Our impression is that his uncle, Dom Miguel, will be called upon by the people to restore order and liberty in the kingdom. Neither now exists there.

Interrupting the Pageants of Joan of Arc

PARIS, June 23, 1911.

For five centuries the City of Orleans has celebrated annually the great deeds of Joan of Arc. Every year there is a solemn festival, and the clergy, the army, and the civil authorities, as well as all the people unite in the celebration. It was only during the terrible Revolution that these festivities were interrupted. But since that time the 8th of May has always elicited the greatest enthusiasm in the whole country around Orleans. For the last five years, however, the Freethinkers and the Freemasons, who constitute our governing body in France, have endeavored to crush out this affection for the inspired Maid. When Clemenceau was in control, he forbade the civic officials and the army to take part in this procession, and since then there were two celebrations, one religious, and the other military and civic. At one time the Masonic Lodge of Orleans endeavored to appropriate the day for themselves by taking part in the procession, which, of course, made it impossible for Catholics to be represented in it. But their participation in the celebration was so ridiculous that it was shortly after given up. Nevertheless everything possible is done to diminish the pomp and traditional rejoicings. Finally, this year the inhabitants of the city were compelled to ask the Prefect for the revival of the old custom which reunited all the citizens of Orleans. But their request was absolutely refused.

For the last twenty years efforts have been frequently made to have the anniversary of the deliverance of Orleans recognized as the national feast of France, and a certain number of Freethinkers, among whom are writers, historians and politicians, supported the project, but the attempt failed. We can only hope for such conditions when France becomes Catholic again. On the other hand, as Joan was the victim of the hatred of a certain number of priests, the enemies of the Church use the story of the heroine only to assail Catholicism. It is of no importance to them that twenty-five years after the crime, the Church solemnly vindicated the memory of the noble victim. Hence, historians like Michelet, while speaking of her, deny that she was actuated by anything like patriotism. She was a heretic, a visionary and a victim of hysteria. Even learned men like Quicherat and Siméon Luce are beset by the desire of suppressing every idea of heavenly inspiration in her wonderful career. But Catholics have never abandoned nor forgotten the splendor of her exploits, and apart from the enthusiasm of the people historians have never failed to chronicle the wonderful events of the fifteenth century in which she figured. Notable among these writers are Pasquier, Edmund Richer, Bossuet, Fleury, Daniel Mezeray, Longival, Lelong, Benedict XIV, L'Averdy, Chateaubriand, Barante, etc. Unbelievers on the other hand have, in their historical writings, endeavored to cast contempt upon her, or to make her life a legend and a myth. Voltaire's "La Pucelle d'Orléans" is nothing but an unworthy parody.

How did it happen that about the year 1840 the Historical Society of France made up its mind to publish all the documents relative to the two trials in connection with Joan of Arc: her condemnation and her rehabilitation? We do not even know the name of the scholar who began this laudable work, but we do know that the investigation undertaken by Quicherat resulted in precious discoveries, and produced an extraordinary effect on the public mind. Every thinking man was startled by the abundance and incomparable precision of the authentic documents which were unearthed. Indeed, on the subject of Joan of Arc, a vast library of official documents and historical works is available. The process of condemnation, and the process of rehabilitation are there side by side; the latter refuting the former with irrefragable proofs. One cannot read the story without being thrilled with emotion.

Before us are the declarations of one hundred and twenty witnesses, and their testimony is not based on what they heard, but on what they saw. Their words are mere repetitions of the words of the heroine, and make us personally acquainted with her general demeanor, her countenance, and her manner of acting. No painting or drawing has preserved her portrait for us, nevertheless, we know that she was dark, tall, vigorous and handsome. Apart from the stories of her fellow-soldiers we have the remembrances of her childhood friends. Both one and the other admire in her the sweetness and tenderness which were always manifest, as well as her daring and intrepidity. Modest and pure though she was, she was, nevertheless, full of animation; a typical French woman in the virtue which shone in her life. In the long interrogatories which she had to undergo, before and after her exploits in the war, the categorical declarations, the picturesque answers, the triumphal rejoinders which abound in her replies, all bear the impression of a robust and lively spontaneity which is peculiarly French. This young girl of eighteen years could neither read nor write, and yet she spoke in a way that recalled the language of Joinville, of Saint Francis of Sales, of Henry IV, and Corneille. Her exploits on the field of battle were those of a conqueror. She died a martyr's death for her country and for her faith. The priests who condemned her were, for the most part, traitors to their country and to the Church, and that is why the Freethinkers of to-day are eager to invoke her name against the religion of their country. As everyone knows, Joan had frequent communication with what are known as the supernatural voices, and for that reason her enemies persistently endeavored to explain that fact in their own fashion. They have resorted to all manner of explanations of these voices without, however, ever agreeing even among themselves. In spite of them Joan of Arc must be regarded as a creature inspired by God, if we would explain anything in her singular history. That, however, is precisely what the Freethinkers of our day do not want to admit. Hence, they have latterly concluded to abandon that line of attack, and to endeavor to claim the glory of the Maid as their own; an impossible thing, of course, for her glory is essentially Christian. Their failure to carry out their scheme explains why the Government now keeps aloof from the celebrations in her honor, and endeavors to throw all sorts of obstacles in the way of those who wish to proclaim her glory. Indeed, they have increased her popularity. It is no longer in the Cathedral of Orleans alone that enthusiastic throngs are gathered. All the Cathedrals and a great number of churches now acclaim her. In Paris, on the 28th of May, Notre Dame was filled with a vast assembly of the choicest people of the land. From the windows of houses hung banners like those which Joan held in her hand when she went forth to battle, and in the evening there were splendid illuminations.

For a long time historians and theologians have discussed the question as to whether the mission of Joan in reality ceased at Reims after the consecration of Charles VII. The question is settled now, for if Joan was mistaken on that important point, or if she was unfaithful to the voices which had urged her forward from the beginning they would have abandoned her then. But those voices were heard even at the moment of her execution, and to-day one cannot help thinking that the work entrusted to her five centuries ago is now revived. Beatified as she is, and canonized as she is soon to be, Joan of Arc is living again. She is in the forefront of the battle, and is leading her country to victory.

Intercollegiate Socialist Society

"Kindly send us the names and addresses of any college students and teachers whom you know to be Socialists or who, you think, would be interested to have some information concerning our society. We should like to have, just as soon as possible, one or more correspondents in every college and university in the land, in order that we may thus extend our work. Communications of the sort here requested will be used in no way to embarrass those who do us this great favor."

It is an innocent and rather attractive little plea, is it not? It is the final word of an interesting poster sent out by the executive board of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society to introduce to the attention of young college men the projects of the Society.

The purpose of this organization is to enable college students and other studious people, both inside and outside of college, of all political parties, to investigate Socialism systematically, cooperatively and pleasantly. Study Chapters, so the poster tells us, have already been organized in several of the leading universities and colleges in the United States, such as Harvard, Chicago, Leland Stanford, Cornell, Pennsylvania, Vassar, Minnesota, Yale, Colorado, Ohio, Michigan, Columbia, and Marietta. This cooperative study is expanding rapidly among students, teachers and studious people generally.

The society, again to quote the poster, prints and distributes free an announcement explaining the nature, purpose and methods of the organization, also a course of study, a classified catalogue of books on Socialism and a monthly bulletin giving Intercollegiate Socialist news.

One may think and say what he pleases regarding Socialism, but one must concede to the movement a strikingly practical recognition of the value of organization in the spread of its propaganda. The Intercollegiate Society is but one phase among the many noiseless agencies constantly preaching the advantages Socialism claims to assure the people. And it is a phase of an ever vigilant propaganda that we Catholics must especially be mindful of. There is no doubt that it is becoming harder and harder, as business gravitates to close corporations, for a young man without capital to get a start for himself; and the specious plea put forth by socialistic agitators in defence of the industrial and economic reforms they would introduce is apt to awaken a questioning attitude on the part of those whose faculties have been sharpened by the discipline of the schools. Ignorant criticism of what Socialism demands will not serve to satisfy that attitude. We must meet the propaganda fairly, and it were well for us to have ready at hand counter organizations in our Catholic schools to serve as antidote against the poison contained in the scheme outlined in the innocent and attractive little paragraph quoted above, which invites the attention of college men to the Intercollegiate Socialist Society.

Belgian Socialists

Socialism seems to be of some importance in Belgium at the present time, but it is due to its alliance with the Liberal Party, and not to its own inherent strength. At least, so we are informed by MM. De Man and Brouckere, two leading Socialists, one of them up to a year ago the editor of Le Peuple. They tell us that the Socialism of the little kingdom is virtually defunct. Electoral activity is at a standstill; the Workmen's Party is not making any notable advance in Parliament, and the old syndicates which were going to revolutionize society have lapsed into common, everyday cooperative associations for business purposes.

It is especially in the famous Socialist paper of Ghent, the truculent Vooruit, that this money-making feature reveals itself. Its assembly rooms, which formerly resounded to frenzied political appeals, have been given over to picture shows, where you pay to enter; its café has an orchestrion, where the sou in the slot will give you the most abominable music from an artistic and moral point of view. Its Association of Weavers is now a cooperative concern, which has recently borrowed a million francs, and is managed by the banker who made the loan. Its members are debarred from the distinctive benefices they used to receive, and now you can become a Socialist simply by buying stock. The paper itself is a business enterprise, and lends money at a high per cent. to the farmers outside of Ghent. Politically, it has become so mild that it let off its employees to take part in the obsequies of King Leopold. In brief, the system of cooperation has become so popular that it has transformed the fierce revolutionary proletarians into little conservative bourgeois.

In 1908 the Belgian Syndicates could muster only 106,521 members, and many of these so-called syndicates are now only loan associations or trust companies, from which the deposits can be drawn at will; or, again, mutual insurance associations against accident, sickness, etc. The Miners' Syndicate, which was once considered the backbone of Socialism, had in 1908 3,500 associates, and is without money enough in its chest to organize a general strike. It can afford to pay only one secretary. The real militant Socialism of the country has been imported from France, and prevails chiefly in the Walloon country. It is frankly republican and revolutionary, and is in the anomalous situation of being led by Van der Velde, who is a multimillionaire. He is in it not for philanthropy, but politics.

In spite of their internal weakness, however, their friends, the Liberals, who hate and fear them, may make them the entering wedge to split the Conservative Government bloc. If they are as weak as their quondam associates pretend, the prophecies which the Catholics are making about the future Socialist control of the Liberals will not be realized. If the Liberals get in they will throw the Socialists out. They are useful only until after election.

Education in Louisiana

The New Orleans Morning Star has done well in making its last issue in June a record of the work accomplished by the educational institutions of the diocese. A famous pioneer priest of Louisiana when presented in his old age to Pius IX was asked, "How many churches have you built?" "Hardly any, your Holiness," he replied. "My churches built themselves. I have devoted my life to building schools"; and the Holy Father told him he did well. Others did likewise, with the result that the excellent diocesan journal is able to present an account of some thirty flourishing colleges, academies and High Schools, and in four supplementary pages of brief summaries can include but a small portion of the parochial schools. It is an object lesson, presenting cause and effect together, in the growth and vigor of Catholic life in Louisiana. There is one item which shows that this educational development has reached its logical conclusion. The cornerstone of the second building of Loyola University, the first Catholic University in the Southland, was laid June 18, by His Grace, Archbishop Blenk.

Marquette Hall, the first building, whose foundations were blessed last November by the Apostolic Delegate, has been erected by the Marquette Association, an organization of Catholic laymen, who, at the instance of the Archbishop and the Rector of Loyola College, leagued together to provide the financial resources requisite for the establishment of a University adequate to modern needs and worthy of Catholic traditions. It was decided to make Loyola College, in the suburbs, a recent offshoot of the city Jesuit College which has just completed its seventy-sixth year, the nucleus of the new institution, and Archbishop Blenk commended the completion of its buildings to his people as the first need of his diocese. The funds for Marquette Hall were quickly collected, and while the first building was under way a New Orleans lady, Mrs. Louise Thomas, volunteered to erect the second at her own expense. The Archbishop and Father Biever, Rector of Loyola, struck the right note when they said that Mrs. Thomas and the Marquette Association had shown the true Catholic spirit in correctly appraising the value of religious education. In translating their means into a permanent organism for the propagation of truth they had sanctified and glorified money.

We have recorded these facts for the emulation of other Catholics of wealth and influence in and outside of Louisiana; for the establishment or development of higher education is a universal need. An incident of the New Orleans function shows that our enemies are often keener than we in recognizing its influence. The Loyola inauguration had been patronized by the Governor and principal officials of city and state, and the city journals were crowded for weeks with accounts of Catholic educational institutions, among which Loyola University was prominently featured. A Presbyterian minister, perceiving the trend of events, proceeded to arrest them by introducing to his pulpit two ex-priests, real or alleged, who trotted out the old "Jesuit oath" and attested it with their signatures. A copy of this hoary imposture was circulated through the city and presented to the inaugurators of the Thomas Memorial Hall. Archbishop Blenk designated the circulators as "infamous liars," and proclaimed that he did so in order to make himself legally responsible to the authors of the calumny.

The Catholics of New Orleans are in no danger. Catholics everywhere can afford to disregard the machinations of their enemies, if in building up by their means, their voice and all the influence they can command, Catholic educational institutions, they lay deep and strong the foundations of permanent organisms for the propagation of scientific, moral and intellectual, and, therefore, of Catholic truth.

To Censure Moving Picture Films

It is a pleasure to learn that some systematic effort is to be made in one part of the country to put an end to the violations of public decency complained of in certain representations of moving picture shows. In Pennsylvania the purveyors of this form of entertainment will hereafter do well to follow a wise discrimination in the character of the picture films they make use of. The Governor of that commonwealth recently signed an act passed by the legislature which subjects to censorship all films to be exhibited throughout the State. The act empowers the State Executive to create a State Board of Censors, one of whose members is to be a woman, whose duty it shall be to say what may and what may not be exhibited. No pictures not duly approved by this Board may hereafter be used in Pennsylvania by the moving picture people, under a penalty increasing with every repetition of the offence.

It is to be hoped that those charged with the important office of this censorship will be guided by reasonable good sense and good taste. They who organized the movement looking to the enactment of this excellent piece of legislation were not minded to oppose the rational liberty of men engaged in the cinematograph industry. It is a fact, however, that vile, indecent, immoral and sacrilegious representations are found among the films passed from show to show about the country. It is a fact, too, that there can be no question of the restraint of any liberty of individuals in the suppression of the stories of crime and horror exhibited to children at some of the cheap shows in our cities. By maintaining a prudent discretion in ordering such suppression the members of Pennsylvania's Board of Censors will render really valuable public service to their community. May the example be speedily followed elsewhere.

IN MISSION FIELDS

The following interesting note of "An Old Almanack" is given in the Catholic Magazine for South Africa:—

"The most prosaic thing in the world is a directory. Who would look at one, unless he were obliged to find an address or discover the state of the moon next month? But an old directory is quite a different thing. If it should go back over fifty years, there is the poetry of 'auld lang syne' whispering through its pages. The most familiar objects have a quaint interest when we see them through the eyes of those who are dead and gone. This is how I found myself reading with much interest an old Cape of Good Hope Almanack of the year 1854. To be quite candid, it was parochial business that sent me to consult it, with some disgust at the loss of time. It was my own pleasure that made me linger over the pages.

"The year 1854 at the Cape seems to have brought the gold-hunger to the inhabitants. Meetings were held to discuss the chances of finding the precious metal. Amongst the advertisements of the Almanack, there is one offering a reward of one thousand pounds sterling 'to any person who shall first discover and extract gold from the ground, on the following conditions, namely:—when gold is discovered in the Western Districts of this Colony, shall have extended and been made available for shipment to the value of two thousand pounds sterling.' The offer is guaranteed by a long list of names of the Gold-Seeking Committee. . . .

"But amongst those who appeal to the public in both languages is our first Vicar-Apostolic, Bishop Griffith. He was the director of a 'Mercantile and Classical Academy' in the Machtenburg (it is well to rescue this name from oblivion) Garden. The curriculum was an extended one for those days on the linguistic side; and as became a school for gentlemen, 'the use of the globes' was also taught. It takes some thinking to discover an Irish Dominican bishop under this title: Hoog.-Eerw. Dr. Griffith, Vicarius Apostolicus. It will not be amiss if I transcribe the whole page of the Almanack which concerns the Catholic Church. Some almost forgotten names will be noticed, and a few items of news not generally known:—

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

WESTERN DISTRICTS.

1838. Right Rev. P. R. Griffith, D.D., Vicar Apostolic, Cape Town, April, 14, 1831, 200 L.

Very Rev. Joseph Griffith, Pro. V.G., Rondebosh, where a new church is now being erected.

Rev. Bernard McMahon, George Town.

Rev. Pieter H. van Ewijk, Cape Town.

Rev. James Kiernan, Simon's Town.

St. Mary's Church, Cape Town, was opened for divine services April, 1851, and is capable of affording accommodation to 1,800 or 2,000 persons, in which there is Mass every week-day morning at 7 o'clock, and on Sundays at 7 o'clock, 8 o'clock, and (with sermon in English) half-past 10 o'clock. Evening devotions on Sundays and Holidays at 3 o'clock p. m., and a sermon in the Dutch language, on Sundays, immediately after. Attached to the church are male and female free-schools; and a convent prepared for the reception of a religious community, which the Bishop expects shortly.

There is a Chapel at Olifant's River occasionally visited by the Rev. B. McMahon, and to be permanently supplied with a priest next year—as is also Mossel Bay.

EASTERN DISTRICTS.

Right Rev. Aiden Devereux, D.D., Vicar Apostolic, Graham's Town, 29 June, 1853, 100 L.

Very Rev. Thomas Murphy, V.G., Port Elizabeth, 100 L.

Rev. J. J. Desaney, Uitenhage, 100 L.

Rev. James Watkins, King William's Town.

Rev. O'Connell, Fort Beaufort, 100 L.

Rev. Quin, Burghersdorp, 100 L.

Rev. Jas. D. Richards, Graham's Town.

On the 10th March, 1852, a Roman Catholic Mission was opened at Natal, under the jurisdiction of the Right Rev. Dr. Allard, of the Order of the Oblates of Mary. Assistants, Rev. Messrs. Hoendervanger, Sabon and Logegarry, one of whom is at Bloemfontein; another resides with the Bishop at Pietermaritzburg, where a handsome church, in the Gothic style of architecture, has been erected; and the third is at Durban, where a neat Chapel has also been raised by the voluntary contributions of the faithful.

"Under the heading 'Local Occurrences,' this Almanack has an ill-sounding entry for the 6th of August, 1853, 'Arrival of the Rev. Van der Hoff at Rustenburg, as minister to the congregation of the Trans-Vaal. At a church meeting, a couple days after, the members repudiated connection with the Dutch Reformed Synod in the old colony—forbade all other denominations to establish churches in those territories, and imposed a church tax,—the first tax laid upon the inhabitants.’

“One more observation on the text of this old calendar. The Cape Parliament which has just expired began its short life in the year 1854, if we may be allowed to count the first representative constitution granted to the Colony. This almanack contains the names of the candidates for the Legislative Council, for which the elections were to take place during the first half of the year. The old Parliamentary institutions have come and gone in less time than it takes many an individual to accomplish his life’s work.”

LITERATURE

Pioneer Priests of North America, 1642-1710. By the Rev. T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J. Vol. III, Among the Algonquins. New York: The America Press. $2.20 by mail.

This third volume concludes the series of the great missionaries who, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, shed lustre on the Church and their Order by their heroic struggles to plant the faith among the Iroquois, the Hurons and the Algonquins. Comparing volume with volume, and without any thought of depreciating the wonderful picturing and character sketching of that portion of the work which was first given to the press, we fancy we can detect a more delicate touch, a more rapid movement and the display of a more finished workmanship in these concluding sketches of the admirable series of pen pictures we now possess of those great men. After all, this was what might have been expected. A painter’s initial production is seldom his greatest. Familiarity with materials, a higher appreciation of the value of perspective, ease in handling the tools, and a power of concentrating his thought on the main features of his subject, and of adding to it, or subtracting whatever will help to clearness in giving outward form and living reality, are not acquired all at once, no matter what be the natural gifts or the determination of the artist to produce his best. The author has now been laboring for several years over these graphic portraits of the missionary pioneers. These heroes, each in his own way, seemed fashioned by nature to cope with that class of difficulties which beset his path. No earthly motive could have supported them in their prolonged hardships, for their life was a burial in deepest oblivion, so far as the plaudits or honors of the world were concerned. They never dreamed that they were winning for themselves an immortality here and hereafter.

The missionaries whose lives are fittingly enshrined in the series now before us labored and suffered among the Algonquins, who at one time claimed as their own almost all the upper regions of the North American continent. Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia and all the country from Labrador to Alaska, was theirs, except where the Esquimaux lived in the East, the Kitunahans in the far Northwest, and the Hurons, Petuns and Neutrals in the region near Georgian Bay. A great part of this territory was visited by the author during the preparation of this last volume, and the familiarity thus acquired with the ancient haunts and rendezvous of these tribes has been of immense assistance in the graphic portrayal of the lives of the men who sought to win them to Christ.

The narrative is greatly relieved by the fact that several of these old missionaries were identified with the great events of the day. The Catholic who studies their lives will get a firmer grasp on the earlier and formative period of the history of Canada and of the Northeastern and North Central states. “Thus Albanel,” we are told, “was sent to find Radisson at the North Sea; Sylvie and Maret and Dalmas were in the wild raids of Iberville; Marquette was with Joliet in the discovery of the Mississippi; Druillettes was the envoy of Quebec to the magnates of Boston, and the death of Rale was the end of a fight for the possession of the State of Maine.” It must have been with no little satisfaction that Father Campbell laid down his pen on the completion of the last sketch in this volume. He had finished the anxious labors of years. With like satisfaction the reader will feel that the separate story of how these heroes fought and how they won has been told for all time by a worthy pen. The reading of these deeds of heroism will make the Catholic prouder of the Faith which could animate and inspire these seemingly frail men, and mayhap will be a summons to resist manfully in his own daily encounter with the forces of evil the temptations that would lead him to throw away his armor or become recreant in the fight.

The Origin and Growth of the American Constitution. By HANNIS TAYLOR. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.00 net.

“The Constitution of the United States has been amended in a formal way only once since 1804, a period of one hundred and seven years. And yet, during all the time it has been passing rapidly, despite its rigid and dogmatic form, through a marvelous process of unparalleled development, chiefly through the subtle agency of judge-made law ever flowing from a generous fountain, the Supreme Court of the United States.” In nearly fourteen hundred cases, that august tribunal has been called upon to construe the organic law which resulted from the deliberations of the Convention of 1787.

It is with a feeling of satisfaction that one takes up this stately volume, for the most cursory glance at its table of contents reveals the treasure that it holds. The United States is sometimes said to be a country without a history because it has no past; it is too recent, too modern. But, however this may be, it is instructive to trace “The Evolution of the Typical American State” from the invasion of Angle and Saxon through the royal houses of England from the Normans to the Stuarts. The first feeble attempts at union, from that of the New England colonies in 1643 to the Articles of Confederation in 1777, prepared the way for that “more perfect union” for which all sighed, though with fears for the outcome; but the one all-important element of strength and stability seemed far from realization. It was at the time when all seemed darkest that a master mind solved the difficulty of strength in union without loss of individuality. Peletiah Webster was the genius that achieved the feat, and to him a grateful posterity ought to do justice, even though it be tardy. It required no great ability to point out the inherent weaknesses of the Articles of Confederation; but where true inventiveness was demanded was in hitting upon the proper remedies. That “wholly novel theory,” as the Constitution was styled by De Tocqueville, was not the outcome of mere chance, was not the result of a sort of inspiration or of sundry compromises: it owed its existence to a closet philosopher, a political economist who thought long and deeply, and saw his thoughts appropriated by men in the public eye.

The compromises of the Constitution were no part of Webster’s theory. They came as a matter of course, when the varied and conflicting interests of the States were to be reconciled. Chief among these compromises were those on African slavery. The rise, progress, and final disappearance of this "local institution" in connection with national growth furnish matter for a valuable chapter. But if we were to call attention to every point of special importance in the work we should find ourselves constrained to reproduce the table of contents; for even the recent phases of our civil and political life, the colonial system, for example, and trusts and monopolies, receive ample attention.

An appendix contains twenty select documents bearing upon our constitutional growth. These begin with the new England Confederation of 1643, and include William Penn's "Briefe and Plaine Scheme" for uniting the colonies, issued in 1697, and other attempts at forming a political bond among the early settlements.

Prefixed to the work is a table of cases in which the Constitution has been construed by the Supreme Court, many of which are quite fully presented and discussed in the volume.

Although we may have to reconcile ourselves to the thought that, in the natural course of events, the victims of demagogism will always be many, there is much comfort for the serious-minded in the diligent perusal of "The Origin and Growth of the American Constitution." H. J. S.

Early Christian Hymns. Translations of the Verses of the Most Notable Latin Writers of the Early and Middle Ages. By DANIEL JOSEPH DONAHOE. New York: The Grafton Press.

This book has come to us so late—it was published three years ago—that we are of the opinion that it does not call for a lengthy review at present. Indeed, it scarcely needs it, since it has met with more than ordinary approbation from many distinguished writers. We take pleasure, however, in once more recalling it to the attention of the public as an excellent literary achievement and a book of keen interest to lovers of poetry and Christian history.

Christian hymnody is not an unexplored field in literature. St. Ambrose is usually styled the father of Latin hymnody. St. Fortunatus, Bishop of Poitiers, is one of its great poets. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries it reached its zenith, chiefly through the genius of Adam of St. Victor. After the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries it began to decline. Mr. Donahoe's book gives some idea of the earlier work done in the field.

As the descriptive sub-title points out, the field covered by these metrical versions is chronologically very extensive. The translations have been done in a spirit of reverence and fidelity for the original hymns and with a command over the technical difficulties of vernacular verse which cooperate to give us at one and the same time a faithful rendering of the ancient hymn and a natural freshness and grace in its modern attire. Short sketches in prose give the necessary historical and biographical settings for the poems. We know of no better book serviceable as an introduction to an interesting subject of study for the English reader. * * *

William the Silent, Prince of Orange 1533-1584. By RUTH PUTNAM. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

This interesting book presents us with the story of the revolt of the Netherlands against Spanish domination. The chief figure in it is William, surnamed the Taciturn or Silent, who would be more properly called the Dissimulator. The son of one of the original Protestants of Holland, he lived as a Catholic while he was the ward of Charles V; then became a Lutheran, and, when he had made up his mind that Calvinism suited his Dutch subjects better than any other religious point of view, he adopted that form of belief. He was not insincere or untruthful, says his biographer, but was essentially an opportunist; a distinction which it is difficult to accept. William the Silent who was tediously garrulous, at least when he put his pen to paper, was intent only on his own political advancement, and the end justified the means for him in every circumstance of his life. He was married four times. One of his wives was a cripple who had a fierce temper, took to drink, fell into adultery, and became insane; another was a runaway French nun. He was also interested in other ladies who had no matrimonial claims upon him. He was a skilful intriguer, and was finally assassinated after his rupture with his French ally, Anjou. Previous to that another attempt had been made on his life. Of course our author will grow infatuated with her subject, but it is doubtful if the average American will relish the attempted comparison of William the Silent with Lincoln and Washington. On the whole, however, the story of those dreadful times is interestingly told, and there are some graphic pictures drawn with a few strokes, as, for instance, the assassination of William, and the hideous scene of the preacher standing before the prison bars, giving spiritual comfort to the crazy and drunken Ann of Saxony, who had been incarcerated after her infidelity. In stories of this period the average writer eagerly takes the opportunity of having a fling at Papists and the Pope and the Church in general. It is gratifying to be able to say that this biography of the Unpleasant William is singularly free from such blemishes. * * *

When Tennyson died, not quite twenty years ago, many were sure that his popularity could not decay. A few dared to doubt. Which party was right the following facts seem to indicate:

John Love has just published the "Journals of Lady Charlotte Schreiber", edited by her son, Montague Guest, and annotated by Egan Mew. He asks two guineas for the book, a price that warrants one in expecting first-rate work. The editor tells how Tennyson took the subject of one of his Idylls, the story of Geraint and Enid, from Lady Charlotte's translation of "Mabinogion"; and how, meeting Lady Charlotte, he asked the quantity of E in Enid, as "in one of the passages of the book he had written, 'Geraint wedded Enid'", which could not go unless the E were long. On being told that it was short he "altered the phrase to 'Geraint married Enid.'"

Tennyson wrote neither the one phrase nor the other, for neither can fit the metre of the Idylls. From this we judge that neither Mr. Guest nor Mr. Mew knew the poet. The first edition of the Idylls contained these four, Enid, Vivien, Elaine and Guinevere. The phrase alluded to was not hard to find, as it occurs in the fourth line of the first, which opened thus:

"The brave Geraint, a knight of Arthur's court,
A tributary prince of Devon, one
Of that great order of the Table Round,
Had wedded Enid."

As Mr. Guest states, later editions have "married."

One may excuse the editor and the annotator on the plea of not having an ear for verse. But how can one excuse the reviewer in the Guardian for quoting, without correcting, Mr. Guest's words? The class represented by that great Church of England periodical used to have Tennyson at its fingers' ends. It was an oversight, perhaps. Turn one page to "Authors of Quotations." A correspondent quotes:

"And all the lavish hills . . .
The murmur of a happy Pan."

and asks: "Who is the author, and what is the missing word?"

A Guardian reader, and a Guardian editor; and neither recognizes lines from "In Memoriam"! Surely Tennyson's popularity is waning. It is to be deplored; for what are English men and women reading instead?

EDUCATION

The decree of Pius X, directing that young children be admitted to the privilege of First Holy Communion at an earlier age than has hitherto been the custom, is, we believe, already very generally observed. A few timid souls, here and there, have been slow to perceive its practical wisdom because of the fear besetting them that the new practice will create difficulties in keeping up our Catholic schools. These affirm that the most effective plea with parents, to induce them to send their children to parochial schools, has been the need of thorough grounding in the Catholic Faith before these latter were admitted to First Communion. Once this privilege was enjoyed, they added, many parents would no longer recognize the necessity of entrusting their children to a Catholic school. With the introduction of the new practice this abuse will grow, they fear; children will no longer be held in Catholic training until they shall have finished their elementary education, and, in consequence, the difficulty, already serious enough, of building up strong classes in the higher grades of grammar schools will be intensified, whilst the careful forming of young people in piety and in the thorough instruction hitherto assured will undoubtedly suffer in proportion.

* * *

We confess our inability to see the force of this argument. A too ready yielding to it on the part of certain well-meaning but imprudent leaders has, we are convinced, given life to a very unwise acceptance of what appears to be a radically unsound view of the place Catholic schools should hold in our esteem. Indeed, we are not averse to the contention frequently expressed that this too close correlation affirmed to exist between the Catholic school and the preparation of the child for the reception of the Sacraments is rather hurtful to the Catholic idea than helpful. Of course it is heartily to be commended that due provision be made for the careful preparation of children for the supremely important act of their young lives, the worthy reception of First Holy Communion. Yet any plan which makes this a sort of unum necessarium, and which pays no great heed to the need of after years—to the need that this first preparation be followed up by a thorough grounding in religion, so that the faith and piety of pupils may grow and develop through all the years of school training, appears to be little in accord with the essential idea of religious education.

* * *

Besides, who has the right to claim that the new custom will occasion any such lapse from correct Catholic action as the objectors referred to appear to take for granted? The necessity of sending Catholic children to the Catholic school becomes, if anything, even more important than hitherto, and Catholic parents will readily understand this. If the Holy Father desires these little ones to be admitted to Holy Communion with barely sufficient knowledge of divine things, he also insists and demands that the children thus privileged be afterwards fully instructed in their holy religion, and that they be permitted to enjoy every advantage of Catholic education open to them. Good Catholics have never failed to contend that home influence alone, even when supplemented by one or two instructions a week by the parish priest, is not sufficient to safeguard the faith of young people during the years of school training. As Bishop Fox, of Green Bay, Wisconsin, says in a pastoral lately read in the churches of his diocese, "it is the lukewarm, the weak, the indifferent Catholic, the proud and disobedient Catholic who permits his children to suffer shipwreck of the Faith, because in his unwise thought of fancied worldly advantage, he keeps them from the only hope of saving them, the Catholic school."

It seems to us that the good people who are worried over the future of our Catholic schools, because of the blessed practice now become fairly general of admitting children to First Communion at an early age, need but be reminded of ordinary first principles. We Catholics insist upon the religious training of our children because it is an historical fact that the morality of a people degenerates into some form of hedonism, utilitarianism or stoicism when it is not based on religion. It is equally certain that if religion is not taught in childhood and youth, its influence over conduct in later life will be problematic. Unless religion supplies from the earliest days of training a fundamental sanction binding the individual, his intelligence may come to know and proclaim, haltingly, it is true, and with some error, the law of right and wrong which is inscribed in the heart, but it will not be normally possible to train the will to those habits which make for upright and conscientious manhood and womanhood.

* * *

Now, this principle is fundamental. No matter what the policy of our leaders may be regarding the discipline touching the admission of young people to the privilege of early Communion, its obligation is ever the same. The Holy Father, in his zeal to renew all things in Christ, is eager that young children be helped in the earliest possible days of their character formation by the grace of the Sacraments comforting and strengthening them by its inherent and essential activity. But he carefully warns us that this will be but a helpful condition, and that with it there must be the assured accompaniment of the religious education always demanded by Catholic teaching. Young people must be well grounded in their holy religion, he declares, in all the years of their training and formation, that their faith and piety may grow and develop as their being and life increase into the full maturity of their powers.

ECONOMICS

Conservation of natural resources is becoming important in economics. It should have become so long ago. More than fifty years have passed since the great Lord Derby raised a warning voice in Parliament. But prophets have to cry in the wilderness for many a long day before the hour of listening to them comes; and in 1857, when free trade doctrines were the only gospel, any message speaking of their restriction stood no chance of a hearing.

Swedish iron has been in demand for a long time on account of its purity. A congress of Swedish economists has been considering the propriety of restricting its export in order to conserve the supply; and this led to the discussion of the question, whether iron or coal stand in greater need of conservation. Considered in the abstract, it has an obvious solution. Iron is not utterly consumed in the using. Much perishes by oxidation in the working, by the loss of smaller articles, by the rusting of neglected ironwork, by friction, by the sinking of ships, etc.; but most of it remains to be worked over and over again. Coal, on the contrary, perishes in its first using. Considering it in the concrete, however, a member of the congress attempted to prove that iron has the greater need. He alleged that there is no substitute for the metal, the demand for which grows year by year, whereas the increasing use of electricity for light and heat tends to diminish the demand for coal. His argument may have seemed conclusive in a land of lakes, rapid rivers and waterfalls, but there are other countries not so favorably circumstanced, and in these coal is being used up at an enormous rate.

Of all such countries the most extravagant, perhaps, is England. Australia looks to the future and conserves its coal: there is only one idea in England, turn it into money for the proprietor of the mine. The best steam coal known is found in the Welsh fields. Not all Welsh coal is such, and it is far from being inexhaustible. Nevertheless, it is being dug up and burned with a recklessness almost incredible. The captain of the Olympic is said to have stated that he took six thousand tons into his bunkers at Southampton, and very little of it remained when he reached New York. This means that his ship consumes about a thousand tons a day. The Mauretania and Lusitania burn at least as much. The Titanic will soon be doing the same, and the new German and Cunard ship will be as wasteful. These six ships alone will devour upwards of a million tons of the best coal every year!

Coal is to be burned sooner or later, and one must not grudge it if there be sufficient reason for its consumption. But let us ask, what are England and America the better for that we have mentioned? The people who cross the Atlantic in the first cabin get a week, more or less, of barbaric splendor, and the second cabin people get proportionately the same. Why, then, not stretch out these experiences for ten or twelve days? What practical advantage comes out of crossing the ocean in a week or less, to justify the consumption of coal? The mails do not call for it, since in urgent matters one can always use the cable. Vanity, rivalry, the mad desire for speed and present gain seem to be at the bottom of the whole affair. One could read in the papers that the Mauretania and Lusitania are outclassed in public estimation. The passage money for the Olympic on her first voyage from New York to Southampton was $250,000!

Conservation of coal could bring another advantage to England. The Welsh steam coal has, in addition to other advantages, that of being practically smokeless if properly managed. It is, therefore, the very best for war vessels, and adds greatly to their efficiency. The English nation is groaning under its burden of naval expenditure, and the English coal owners, intent upon profit, are filling every foreign arsenal with fuel which, if kept at home, would give the British fleet a superiority above that of mere numbers, and would allow a considerable reduction in construction, without the impairing of efficiency. Moreover, it would be a permanent superiority: that obtained by Dreadnought building is almost ephemeral. Some may say that foreign navies have oil. The history of oil shows that its deposits are not comparable to those of coal. A few years affect a field greatly, and though new fields are being discovered, the consumption of oil is proportionately more extravagant than that of coal, and it is far from clear that oil is to take a permanent place among fuels.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

At the opening of the eighth annual meeting of the Catholic Educational Association in Chicago, on June 27, his Grace Archbishop Quigley presided at the high Mass, and made an address in which, praising the work of the teachers in our Catholic schools, he said:

"We of the pulpit are constantly holding before the eyes of our people, and urging upon them the attainment of the highest ideals of Catholic religious and social life in old and young, especially in the young, upon whom do we rely for the realization of these ideals of Catholic life. If Catholic ideals are ever to be realized, by what agency shall it be effected? By our Catholic schools, mainly, though not wholly. Church, family and school are cooperating for the creation of this ideal Catholic life, but of this trinity of forces, hardly separable in action, the school is the most potent and far-reaching. True it is, that the school cannot exert fully its powers for good without the support of clergy and people, from whom are to come the children and the material means to carry on the work of education with a success commensurate with the ability of the teacher. It is our part to build the schools and to equip them, so as to give the teacher the most favorable environment, and above all to place under the teacher the best possible children, prepared in home and church for the formative work of the teacher.

"These conditions placed, the best possible results should be expected. But these conditions are placed as a rule. You teachers will admit that clergy and people are giving you the best possible aid in the prosecution of your work. Our schools are admirably built and equipped. Our children are the best in the world, even in the environment of our American cities; bright, docile, respectful of authority, obedient, affectionate, and altogether lovable. With these conditions existing generally, what shall I say of the results of your work, as it has been my duty and opportunity to observe them? From the kindergarten, up through the graded school, high school and college to the university, it gives me pleasure to say, in the name of clergy and people, to you delegates, teachers and friends of Catholic education here assembled, that the system of Catholic education, of which you are the exponents, in its results in every department is most gratifying and worthy of highest commendation.

"Your work is beneficially felt in Church and State. The light of God's holy revelation is being spread in men's hearts and minds, as it was of old in the days when the sway of the Catholic Church in the domain of education was supreme and unquestioned, and when the foundations of our Christian civilization were laid by the Catholic Church, through its system of Christian education.

"The masses are being trained in the knowledge, love and service of God. Young hearts are being filled with holy thoughts, and young minds with the knowledge of holy things, and our whole national life is being leavened with Christian principles.

"Through you, Catholic teachers, this great work is being done, and well done. We of the clergy, and people, testify to this in time and out of time. Our crowded school rooms, our costly school buildings, and the generous and grateful support given you by our people bear witness that you are doing well."

SCIENCE

The Chilean government has just placed a contract with the Electric Boat Company of New York for two submarines, which will cost about $500,000 apiece. They will be assembled at Seattle, and are to make the voyage to Chile, a distance of 7,000 miles, under their own power.

Geologists in session at the International Geological Congress, held at Stockholm, were divided in their opinion touching the possibility of an iron famine. Prof. Sjögren regards the iron reserves as practically inexhaustible. From actual computation, he estimates the available ore supply of the world at 425,000,000,000 tons. Prof. Kemp was of the same mind, predicting a diminished demand in iron ore, now that we are passing from the age of steel to that of cement. The critical point, he maintained, is not the ore supply, but the coking coals' exhaustion. M. Lindman, Prime Minister of Sweden, however, advocated strongly the conservation of the iron ores over that of coal, alleging that water supply offers a permanent source of heat and power.

"Converted Steel," a recent alloy of iron, has proven itself a rival in price over ordinary malleable iron, and at the same time

far superior to the other product in its qualities. Though the details of the process of manufacture have been kept secret, it is known that the main ingredient is charcoal-pig-iron, and that the annealing, done in a muffle-furnace, is completed in the short space of three days. The tensile strength has been measured up to 29,000 pounds in excess of, malleable iron, and the coefficient of elongation is exceptionally high. The metal lends itself readily to the tool, being uniform throughout. If defect there be, it shows on the surface, and the machinist is spared the disappointment of encountering blow-holes in the course of his tooling. Castings may be made from this metal weighing up to 1,200 pounds and of up to 6-inch section.

Experiments to determine the best alloy for permanent magnets show that chromium alone added to iron free from carbon does not suit, whereas a combination of 5/6 of one per cent. of the same element with 0.75 to 1.00 per cent. of silicon or 0.3 to 0.5 per cent. of carbon is very suitable. Increasing the manganese enhances the coercive force, but reduces correspondingly the retentivity until 10.41 per cent. is reached, at which the iron becomes magnetic. The addition of vanadium augments magnetic hardness. Binary alloys of tungsten and iron are useless, but one with 40 per cent. of vanadium shows exceptional qualities.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

A special cable to the New York Sun, dated Rome, May 30, was as follows:

"The Right Rev. James J. Keane, Roman Catholic Bishop of the Diocese of Cheyenne, Wyo., has been appointed titular Archbishop of Cuis."

Several of our Catholic contemporaries copied this statement, which, as later and more reliable information from Rome now shows, should have been, that Archbishop Keane of Dubuque, having resigned that see, had been translated to the ancient titular archbishopric of Cuse, in Egypt.

The three days' celebrations announced in AMERICA, May 20, to mark the centenary of the founding of the College of St. Hyacinthe, Province of Quebec, Canada, were carried out most successfully. They were attended by the highest dignitaries of Church and State and by upwards of 2,000 graduates and former students. On June 22, at the closing banquet, in which 1,500 guests took part, the elevation of Canon Choquette, President of the institution, to the dignity of domestic prelate to His Holiness the Pope was proclaimed by the Rt. Rev. A. X. Bernard, the Bishop of the diocese.

In Hungary the Socialist body appears not to follow the prudent tactics the organization uses in its propaganda in the United States. Here its leaders proclaim the movement to be purely social and economic in its aims; it is not concerned, they say, with the religion of its followers and it is opposed to no Church organization. In Hungary the Socialists favor no such half-way measures. They openly attack the Catholic Church and frankly acknowledge their purpose to align their organization in hostile array against her influence with the Hungarian people. A favorite object of their anti-religious warfare is found in the religious orders established in the kingdom. The excellent work these do in the many places in which the various orders have houses is ignored, and their organization is slanderously termed "die tote Hand" (the dead Hand). To meet the attacks made upon them, Catholic leaders are satisfied to point to the splendid record achieved by the various religious communities in the social activities to which they give themselves. For example, the Prior of the mother-house of the Brothers of Charity in Budapest published in May an account of the work done by these religious last year. They have charge of fourteen hospitals, thirteen in Hungary and one in Agram; 8,866 patients were cared for in the Hungarian institutions during the year 1910, of whom 4,744 were treated in Budapest alone; in the same year the Agram hospital received 6,510 patients. In 1910, too, 213,698 outdoor patients were cared for in Hungary, 78,291 of them in the capital city and 25,171 received the ministrations of the Brothers in Agram. The Budapest hospital, controlled by these religious, was entirely rebuilt in 1903, and is now conceded to be a model institution, equipped to the last detail with every convenience demanded by the most up-to-date surgical and medical methods. Of the patients admitted to the institution last year, 3,372 were Catholics, 148 were Greek Schismatics, 46 were members of various Oriental rites, 543 were Reformed Calvinists, 273 were Evangelicals, 334 were Jews and 28 were Unitarians.

In reports sent out from Rome descriptive of the festivities marking the jubilee of United Italy every effort is made to emphasize the civic and national character of the celebrations. The purpose is manifest: foreigners are to be left under the impression that there was in the jubilee holiday making no thought of any disrespect to the Holy Father and no intention to make the occasion one of anti-papal demonstration. Unfortunately, press reports of such incidents as the appearance of the Priest-Mayor of the little town of Goriano, in Sicily, among the municipal chiefs in attendance of the unveiling of the Victor Emmanuel monument give the lie to these pretensions. We are told that he was vociferously welcomed upon his appearance in Rome with the other Mayors, that he was acclaimed a hero, whose patriotism would not permit him to heed the expressed wish of Pius X that Catholics should abstain from every active participation in the festivities. As usual the enemies of the Church have exulted without reason. The hero is not a priest at all. The Archbishop of the diocese of Aquila, whence the Priest-Mayor is said to have come, denies that Don Giulio Paolucci, Mayor of Goriano, ever received priestly orders.

The special course in sociological work to be given in Munich-Gladbach for Americans, clerical and lay, is announced to take place immediately after the close of the Catholic Congress in Mainz (Mayence), August 6-10. The lecturers and instructors who will direct the work have been selected from the trained specialists of the German Volksverein staff. The registration of several American priests who mean to follow the course is already announced; and a considerable number of American Seminarians, studying in Europe, have declared their intention to attend the lectures. Purses have been generously offered by individual societies here in the States, as well as by the State Federations of German allied organizations in New York, Missouri, Minnesota and Illinois, and the local Federations of Brooklyn and New York City, to meet the expenses of those volunteering to pursue the course. The only condition imposed by the Volksverein people in Munich-Gladbach is that a sufficient number of students enter upon the work. They desire a class of at least fifteen to twenty, in order to make the labor worth the while. Full information regarding the very worthy project can be had upon application to the Secretary of the Centralverein, 18 South 6th Street, St. Louis, Missouri.

Loreto Academy, Niagara Falls, Archdiocese of Toronto, celebrated its golden jubilee June 20-22. The first day was given over to the commencement exercises; the second was Alumnæ Day, and the third was devoted to the religious celebration. The speakers on the respective days were the Rt. Rev. Mgr. J. J. McCann, Vicar-General; the Very Rev. A. Kreidt, O.C.C., and the Rev. J. T. Kidd, D.D., the administrator of the vacant see. The nuns are an affiliation of the Irish branch of the Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary, founded in 1821, by Mother Frances Ball, under the direction of Archbishop Murray of Dublin. Bishop Power called them to Toronto in 1847. Besides their mother-house at the Loreto Abbey, Toronto, the religious have other houses in Toronto, and in the United States at Chicago, Joliet and Sault Ste. Marie.

Very Rev. John E. Gunn, S.M., D.D., has been appointed to the See of Natchez, to succeed the late Bishop Heslin. Born in Tyrone, 1863, Dr. Gunn entered the Marist Congregation in Dundalk, and won high honors in the Royal Irish University and the Gregorian University, Rome. Having taught in France and Ireland, he was appointed, 1892, to the Chair of Moral Theology in the Marist Seminary, Washington, D.C., and in 1898 opened a new parish in Atlanta, Ga., where he founded a new church, a flourishing college for boys, and a girls' high school, wrote and lectured much in Catholic exposition and defence, and took a leading part in all Catholic activities.

PERSONAL

The appointment by the Consistorial Congregation of Very Rev. Michael O'Doherty to the bishopric of Zambo-ango, Philippine Islands, has been ratified by the Holy Father. Born in Mayo, 1872, Father O'Doherty was ordained for his native diocese of Achonry, and had worked some years on the Irish Mission when he was selected by the Bishops of Ireland for the Rectorship of the Irish College, Salamanca. The ability and tact he displayed in that office suggested the fitness of his appointment to the Philippine bishopric. He has been succeeded in the Rectorship of Salamanca by his brother, Rev. Denis O'Doherty, of Elphin.

Bishop Maes of Covington, Ky., has issued the call for the fifth National Congress of the Encharistic League, to meet in Cincinnati, September 28th to October 1.

The Right Rev. J. Henry Tihen, the new Bishop of Lincoln, Neb., was consecrated at the pro-Cathedral, Wichita, Kansas, on July 6.

Under the direction of the Rev. Dr. D. J. Hickey, of Brooklyn, the Catholic Summer School opened its nineteenth session at its picturesque site on the shore of Lake Champlain with a solemn Mass on Sunday, July 2.

In cooperation with the "safe and sane celebration" plan for the Fourth of July, Archbishop Moeller, of Cincinnati, allowed the church bells to be rung for five minutes on the morning of the day, and officially advised his people to celebrate in a manner that would not endanger life and limb.

OBITUARY

The Most Rev. Denis O'Connor, C.S.B., D.D., former Archbishop of Toronto, Canada, died at St. Basil's Novitiate, Toronto, on June 30. He retired from his office three years ago, owing to ill health, and was succeeded by Archbishop McEvay. Upon the death of the latter Archbishop O'Connor resumed the administration of the diocese, pending the appointment of a successor. He was born at Pickering, near Toronto, seventy years ago, of Irish parents. Educated at St. Michael's College, Toronto, he afterwards studied in France, and was ordained to the priesthood in 1863. On his return to Canada he was made a professor in his alma mater, but soon relinquished that position to become Superior of the College of the Assumption, Sandwich. In 1890 he was appointed Bishop of London, in succession to Archbishop Walsh, and translated to the See of Toronto in June, 1899.

The Province of Ontario, Can., has lost one of her most esteemed priests, the Rev. Dr. Teefy, C.S.B., of Toronto. John Read Teefy was born at Richmond Hill, Ontario, in 1849. After his graduation from the University of Toronto he was for several years connected, as professor or principal, with several schools and colleges until, feeling a call to the priesthood, he entered the Montreal Seminary, and finally joined the Basilian Fathers. Father Teefy was ordained in 1878, and then began his life work at St. Michael's College, Toronto, first as professor, and from 1889 as president. Highmindedness, steadfastness of purpose, devotion to the Church and to higher Catholic education, prudence, simplicity and charity were some of the characteristics of his life. His pen was ever active in the cause of the Church. He was for seven years the chief editorial writer of the Catholic Record, and published a valuable history of the Church in Ontario, under the title of "The Archdiocese of Toronto and Archbishop Walsh", which appeared in 1892. The book is a mine of information for future historians. In 1909 Dr. Teefy represented his religious brethren at the First Plenary Council of Quebec, and last summer attended the General Chapter of the Basilian Congregation, held in Europe.

George W. Young, a member of the National Council of the Knights of Columbus and a leading banker of New Orleans, died in that city, June 22. Born in New Orleans, 1848, and educated by the Christian Brothers, he attained control of several flourishing commercial enterprises, was President of the Louisiana Savings Bank, and Vice-President and manager of the Canal-Louisiana Bank. He was elected to the State Legislature on the anti-lottery ticket, and, while avoiding office, took a leading part in every movement for good government in city and State. Meanwhile he devoted his best energies to Catholic interests. An earnest worker in the St. Vincent de Paul Society for forty years, he served for half that period as president of his parish conference, and was a member of the State Superior Council and of the National Council of the Society. He organized the Knights of Columbus in Louisiana, was elected State Deputy and was a permanent member of the National Council. He was prominent in the Federation of Catholic Societies, was a charter member of the Marquette Association for the establishment of Loyola University, and was an influential, though generally a silent factor in forwarding every Catholic enterprise. The New Orleans Picayune says of him editorially: "Prominent in business, in charity, in good works and in every way a credit to the city, he was a patriot and a Christian of the highest character, and his taking away was a public loss."

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

WORK FOR THE FEDERATION.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Thousands of members of the Federation of Catholic Societies use the lines of the elevated railways of Manhattan Borough every day, and it seems strange to me that neither as individuals nor as an organization have they made any protest against an advertising poster displayed, for some time past, at nearly every station, that is a most outrageous insult to every Catholic instinct and tradition. I refer to the hideous caricature of a monk that is used by an English firm to attract notice to the brand of liquor they manufacture. It is one of the most offensive manifestations of a contempt for Catholic opinion seen on our streets for years, and it is almost incredible that, in this large and influential Catholic community it has been tolerated so long without proper action for its suppression.

If a representation to the well-known advertising firm that controls the billboards along the elevated railroad stations does not secure the removal of these insulting signs, a formal complaint to the Public Service Commission will probably compel the necessary action in the matter. It is not possible that the Catholic taxpayers in this city will allow three of the leading streets of the Borough to be used to defame their religion and its ministers.

CHRONICLE

Jogues Memorial.—Mr. W. Max Reid of Amsterdam, chairman of a committee to select a site for the Memorial to Father Isaac Jogues, the Jesuit Pioneer Priest of New York, and the discoverer of Lake George, visited the lake recently to inspect the sites which might be suitable for the proposed monument, in company with State Historian James A. Holden and local Game Warden Wm. H. Burnett. Mr. Reid finally decided to recommend to the New York State Historical Society, sponsor of the memorial, the northernmost island of the Mother Bunch Group, which is situated near the north end of the Narrows, about twenty miles from Lake George Village.

It is from this point that Father Jogues first saw Lake George, or, as he called it, Lac du St. Sacrement. The committee to whom the choice was submitted consists of George O. Knapp of St. Louis and Shelving Rock, Mrs. Harry W. Watrous of New York and Hague, David Williams of New York and Rogers Rock, and the Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J., editor of AMERICA. Mr. Reid has communicated to Father Campbell the news that he had succeeded in closing the contract on June 21st, and that the New York State Historical Society is now custodian of the island. The place will soon be marked by the inscription:

"Isle of Lac du St. Sacrement. Lake discovered and named by Father Isaac Jogues, S.J., in May, 1646."

Safe and Sane Fourth.—Owing to the safe and sane observance of Independence Day generally throughout the country under the prohibition of the sale and use of fire crackers and toy pistols, this year's celebration of the Fourth of July was the least destructive of human life in recent years. The number of casualties reported is by far the smallest that has been reported since records have been kept. Roughly speaking there were only one-half as many killed as last year, and only one-third as many as the year before. The number of minor injuries was less than one-sixth as great as last year, and less than one-eighth as great as the year before. Many important communities have completely abolished all offensive and dangerous forms of fireworks, and in many others the evil has been greatly diminished. In New York there were only four fires, with a total damage of $80.00. "The saving of so many lives and of so many persons from injury, suffering and mutilation," says the New York Tribune, "amply justifies and rewards the efforts for safety and sanity."

International Steel Trust.—The steel interests of America, Canada, England, France, Germany, Belgium, Italy, Austria and Spain were represented by 160 delegates, who met in conference at Brussels and appointed a committee of thirty, made up of members proposed by each national group, to work out a plan for an international steel organization, and submit the same to the full conference when called. Judge E. H. Gary, of the board of directors of the United States Steel Corporation, was elected chairman of the committee. The belief was expressed by members of the special Steel Trust Investigation Committee, appointed by the House of Representatives, and by a prominent member of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, that the American steel men who participated in the Brussels conference will be liable to criminal prosecution under the Sherman anti-trust law.

Will Sift Express Rates.—The Interstate Commerce Commission has ordered an investigation of all the express companies in the United States affected by the interstate commerce law. Prominent among these companies are the Adams Express, the American Express, the Wells Fargo and the United States Express. More than a year ago a number of the leading commercial organizations of the country asked for an investigation of the rates and methods of the express companies, with a view to determining whether the rates and classifications were in violation of the interstate commerce act. In accordance with this request the inquiry is ordered "to determine whether such rates, classifications, regulations or practices, or any of them, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of said act, and to determine the manner and method in which the business of said express companies, and of each of them, is conducted." Reductions in express rates, which are to become effective on August 1, do not affect questions at issue and will be included in the inquiry; if they are not sufficient to meet the requirements of express commerce or if the rates are still excessive, they undoubtedly will be further reduced.

Revenue Passes $700,000,000.—Official figures indicate that the Treasury for the fiscal year 1911, which closed June 30, will show an ordinary surplus of $45,681,620 and an excess of $31,305,923 over all disbursements, including Panama and public debt transactions. Receipts exceed $700,000,000, and are far greater than the official estimates. The increase is due to the fact that $27,500,000, or about $8,000,000 more than officials expected, was received from the corporation tax. Internal revenue was $14,000,000 more than the official estimate, amounting to $322,419,938, the greatest amount ever collected. Customs receipts were $313,846,209.

Monument to MacGahan.—A monument to the memory of Januarius Aloysius MacGahan, the famous war correspondent, was unveiled at New Lexington, Ohio, on July 4. MacGahan was correspondent of the New York Herald in the Franco-Prussian war, and was the only newspaper correspondent in Paris during the whole period of the Commune, at which time he narrowly escaped death. Accompanied by the United States Commissioner, Eugene Schuyler, he investigated as a journalist the Turkish atrocities in Bulgaria, and his book under that title helped to free the hands of Russia for the Turkish war. He was preparing to attend the International Congress at Berlin in 1878, when he died of fever at Constantinople. Almost a generation ago his body was brought back from Constantinople on a man-of-war at the request of the Governor and the Legislature of Ohio.

Mexico.—The Government has announced that certain valuable concessions made by the Diaz administration will be examined with the view of declaring them null and void, if, as has been asserted, they were made in defiance of the law.—A detachment of over five hundred infantry has been despatched to Mérida, Yucatan, to restore peace among the plantation laborers.—Four days after the official proclamation of "peace" two opposing squads of revolutionists near Zamora exchanged a few volleys, the result being the death of Captain Quiroz, one of the leaders, and five others.—Flores Magon, the head of the Socialistic revolution, has urged his followers to accept Madero, for the time is not ripe for a Socialistic triumph.—For the benefit of the unemployed the Government has undertaken extensive public works in the Federal District, such as paving, cleaning canals, etc.—In commenting on the celebration of the sacerdotal jubilee of Cardinal Gibbons, in which the highest officials and the general public took part, the Mexican press ask why a similar event could not take place in Mexico. It could, if there were in Mexico such government officials, and a general public of similar dispositions; nothing else is required.—The decision in the Chamizal dispute, which is in the nature of a compromise rather than a settlement on principle, is unsatisfactory to both parties. It would be rejected, were it not for deference to the principle of arbitration, to which the United States is strongly committed. A part of El Paso, Texas, is declared to be Mexican territory.—One of the signs of progress in the country is seen in the petition of some ladies, praying that the suffrage be conferred on the "conflicting sex."—A riotous demonstration on the part of the striking conductors and motormen in the capital had to be suppressed by the authorities. The rioters fled before the sabre strokes of the civil guard.

Canada.—The Liberals are giving a magnificent welcome to Sir Wilfrid Laurier on his return from the Imperial Conference. The object is to impress the Quebec voters.—Lord Strathcona is resigning the High Commissionership in London. He is over ninety, and is no longer equal to the office.—Some injury to the western wheat crop from rain, hail and frost is reported. It is said to be purely local, and it is not likely to affect the prospect of an immense yield, probably 200 million bushels.—Mr. Borden's tour in the west is reported to have been successful in dividing the farmers on the subject of reciprocity. The election will show how true this is.—The Canadian and West Indian League has been formed to promote trade between Canada and the West Indies. Its executive council contains some of the most important men of business.—The coal strike in Alberta and Eastern British Columbia will, it is hoped, be settled by the granting of an increase of 7 per cent. in wages and other concessions. The closed shop is the great difficulty. The strike caused considerable loss to manufacturers, who have had to import coal from the United States.

Great Britain.—The Unionist leaders are rejecting all independent amendments to the Parliament Bill coming from their party, and passing only those which have the weight of the party behind them. Besides those mentioned last week, is one to make the decision as to whether a measure is a money bill or not, rest with a committee from both sides of the Commons, instead of with the Speaker. The Government will reject all these amendments.—A deputation of Socialists demanded from Mr. Lloyd George that the working classes enjoy all the benefits of the Insurance Bill without making any contributions. Their demand was, of course, refused.—There is a strong agitation against the clauses of the Declaration of London, which make food, under certain conditions, contraband of war. Lord Charles Beresford and 127 other Admirals have declared that such concessions expose England to the danger of conquest by means of starvation, even though her fleets be victorious at sea. Nearly all the large shipping companies are against the confirmation of the Declaration. The Government, nevertheless, has forced it through the House, though their majority was only thirty in a fairly full vote.—The shipping strike is announced to have been settled. Men are to receive 60 cents a week additional; dockers, one cent an hour. A half holiday on Saturday is granted. Disputes are to be referred to Board of Trade. The settlement does not seem to be very secure. Neither side trusts the other's sincerity, and notwithstanding the settlement, little outbreaks are reported from time to time.—A carters' and millworkers' strike in Manchester has led to serious rioting. Police and troops have been brought down from London.—The Miners' Federation continued its contribution of £3,000 weekly to the South Wales strikers, for three weeks, after it had renounced all responsibility, so as to provide for those who might otherwise suffer from unavoidable delays in getting back to work. All strikers in that district are now thrown on their own resources.—The suffragist coronation procession contained 40,000 women of every rank in life. At the meeting in Albert Hall, it was announced that £100,000 had been contributed to the fund of the movement.

Ireland.—Coronation Day was observed in Protestant churches and official circles, but the Nationalists were undemonstrative, except in Dublin, where a large public meeting was held, asserting "Ireland's inalienable right to nationhood, and that no man may fix a boundary to her national progress," and rejoicing at the opposition in America "to any alliance between that country and Great Britain—a proposal equally inimical to the peace of the United States and the liberties of Ireland." A few days later a movement to reverse the action of the Dublin Corporation, which had refused by a large majority to present an address to the King, provoked a counter movement, which left the City Council's attitude unchanged. Lord Mayor Farrell declared, notwithstanding, that he would himself present an address to the King on the grounds that King George had had the part of the Coronation oath that was objectionable to Catholics deleted, and that Mr. Redmond had urged the Irish Party to attend the Coronation. It was pointed out that Catholics had other ways of expressing satisfaction at King George's action, which had nothing to do with Irish nationality; that Mr. Redmond's proposal was overruled by the Irish Party, which determined not to protest their loyalty until they had got something to be loyal to, and that the Mayor could not legally act as such contrary to the directions of the Council. A telegram to that effect was sent to King George, and the Mayoral regalia was locked up. The Cork Corporation, under the influence of William O'Brien, decided to present an address, with the result that several of Mr. O'Brien's leading supporters abandoned him. The policy is to receive the King and Queen with respect, but to abstain from protestations of loyalty until full self-government has been conceded.—Two papers were read at the Maynooth Union on the Irish language, asserting the moral necessity of making it again the national tongue, and rejoicing that Maynooth was now the strongest centre of Gaelic propaganda. "Gaelic," said Father Phelan, S.J., "is the channel carved by nature for the flow of Irish thought; it had made the children of English settlers more Irish than the Irish; the contrary process has made many of her own children more English than the English. We abandoned nature for a civilization that was unnatural to us and antagonistic; we must go back to the road we never should have left." The Bishop of Clogher said the Gaelic revival had not only made the people more manly and self-reliant, but was bringing back the grand spirit of faith and prayer that was enshrined in the Gaelic tongue.—It was announced at the annual meeting of Irish Catholic Truth Society that the Society had distributed over 500,000 books.—The King and Queen landed at Kingstown, July 8, and were warmly received. King George said: "I and the Queen hastened our visit to Ireland, in whose welfare our interest is deep and abiding." The Dublin reception was particularly enthusiastic, and the King is reported to have looked much happier than during the coronation processions in London.

Portugal.—Bishop Antonio Moutinho, of Porta'egre, has sent to the government a dignified protest against making the inventory of church property with a view to its confiscation. In his own diocese he says that the church property is largely due to benefactors, including especially three of his predecessors, and he requests that his protest be admitted as a part of the report on the temporalities of his diocese.

France.—The ecclesiastical deputy Abbé Lemire, who often trains with the Left, has sued Mgr. Delassus for defamation of character, who (1) charged him with infringing the statutes of the diocese of Hazebrouck; (2) announced his being struck off the list of Honorary Canons, and with being lawfully forbidden to celebrate Mass on May 7 at Arneke.—Within the last ten years 105,000 university decorations or distinctions have been accorded in France. Simultaneously there is a complaint that the French language is deteriorating. People are asking if there is any connection between these two facts.—Germany's determination to keep a warship at Agadir is particularly irritating to France, and it is thought in Paris, according to the most recent cable despatches, that Germany wants to deal with France alone for a partition of Morocco between Germany, France and Spain. France, however, is opposed to any plan that does not include England, and England on its side declares its determination to stand by France.

Belgium.—From the Brussels correspondent of the Bien Public we gather that M. Woeste is badly compromised by what he announced with regard to the fall of the Schollaert Ministry. On the 7th of June he declared in the House that when he opposed sending the School Bill to a Commission the resignation of the Cabinet was already in the King's hands. The truth is that, although the Ministers foresaw the possibility of their fall, it was not until after M. Woeste's declaration that they concluded that their resignation was unavoidable. The resignation was signed on the evening of June 7, and it was only 10 o'clock of the following morning that M. Schollaert went to the palace to put it in the hands of the King. If this be so the venerable ex-Minister Woeste is in a bad plight, but it is quite possible that a lapse of memory, which might easily occur in a man of his age, will explain the discrepancy.

Germany.—With the beginning of July the American tourist invasion approached high tide. In the central district of Berlin, where are situated the big hotels, one hears quite as much English spoken as German. The huge sight-seeing autos, which lumber about the city on excursions twice daily, are packed with people whose accent and style of dress leave no room for doubt as to their nationality.—Bayreuth is actively engaged in preparations for the forthcoming Wagner festival, and it seems that the famous little Bavarian city is likely to play nearly as large a rôle in the movement of passenger traffic as Oberammergau did last year. The performances will last from July 25 until August 20.—The German cruiser Berlin was ordered to Agadir, Morocco, to relieve the gunboat Panther, earlier despatched thither to look after the interests of Germans in the district. No official statement has been secured from Germany as to its ultimate object in sending the Berlin to Agadir, and some uncertainty and tension is evident in diplomatic circles. It is reported, too, that French capital is being withdrawn from German banks, a condition of things usually preceding strained relations between France and Germany.—Great Britain, it is understood, has intimated to the German government that it could not contemplate without the gravest concern the possibility of the establishment of a German naval station anywhere on the Morocco coast.—In the parish church of St. Stephen, in Mainz, there was recently held a splendid memorial celebration of the nine hundredth anniversary of the great Archbishop Willigis, in his day Chancellor of the German empire. The famous prelate founded St. Stephen's, and began the building of the cathedral of Mainz.—On the occasion of the silver jubilee of the marriage of the King and Queen of Württemberg, Pius X sent a very cordial greeting to the royal pair. His Holiness, in his letter, recalled the gracious message forwarded to him by the King at the celebration of his own silver jubilee as a bishop, and spoke in affectionate terms of the devotion ever manifested in his regard by the clergy and the people of the kingdom.

Austria-Hungary.—The Society of the Grail, an association of Catholic literary workers, whose aim is to preserve literature and the arts from the degradation modern materialism is tending to introduce, was highly complimented lately by the receipt of an autograph letter from the Holy Father. Pope Pius X gave most cordial approval to the work of the society, and encouraged its members to strenuous labor in achieving their worthy purpose.—Monsignor Batthyany, the Bishop of Neutra, recently gave very practical proof of disinterested solicitude for the social condition of his people. To discourage emigration to foreign lands he caused his large estate of over 2,000 acres to be divided into small tracts, which he stands ready to hand over to the peasant farmers of his diocese upon easy terms. The Bishop succeeded in winning over to a like course Baron Waldberg, a large landed proprietor of the district. This latter offers 1,000 acres to the peasants on similar conditions to those determined upon by the Bishop. In consequence, it is reported that more than a hundred families have abandoned their project to emigrate and will remain in the home district.—Count Khuen-Hedervary, Premier of Hungary, announced during an open session of the lower house of that kingdom, that Austria-Hungary, Russia, and Italy had reached a complete understanding regarding the condition of affairs in Albania, and that no fear need be felt of trouble in that direction.—Emperor Francis Joseph has gone to his summer home in Ischl, but he will return to Vienna the day parliament opens in order to preside on that occasion.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Power of German Socialism

If numbers and organization are synonymous with power, then the Social Democracy of Germany is a political and social force of the first magnitude. Its steady and rapid growth since its rise in 1871 is the more significant, because with the march of time and the change of events, it has shown no signs of abatement or decrease. A brief summary of Socialist progress in Germany should be of interest to thoughtful Americans, since what has come to pass in Germany is at least possible in America.

At the first Reichstag elections—1871—the Social Democracy received 120,000 votes and ten years later, though restrained by the "Socialist Laws," it nevertheless counted 312,000 adherents. With the cessation of governmental checks the party waxed strong, and in 1890 it polled a total of one and one-half million votes. In 1898, the two million mark was reached, followed by three millions in 1903. At the last national election "Die Social-Democratie" registered 3,260,000 votes, and to-day even their enemies are willing to concede that in the impending January election they will come close to four million votes, making them by far the strongest party in the Fatherland! The Socialists themselves are more confident, and look for higher figures. They base their estimates on the fact that in the last five years, 1906 to 1911, the number of their organized party members has almost doubled, having risen from 384,000 to 720,000. Never has their agitation been more vigorous than to-day, and if local elections are any forecast of the coming national struggle, the Social Democracy is fully justified in its hopes. It will be of interest to study this development of power in detail, for in studying the various factors, the resultant becomes plain and tangible.

The Leipzig convention decreed that "Only those persons are members of the party, who profess the principles of the platform and who are members of the party organization." The minimum dues for members are thirty pfennig a month for men and fifteen pfennig for women, and hence to-day nearly 800,000 persons of the poor proletariat are paying their hard earned money just to be members of the Socialistic Party. The finances—always the sinews of war—of the party are most flourishing, as is evidenced by the fact that the party income for the last year (July 1909-1910) was no less than 935,409 marks. To this amount, their leading organ Der Vorwärts contributed its annual profit of 113,000 marks. True to socialistic ideals, all the party newspapers are common property, the strong helping the weak, financially as well as in other ways. Of last year's income 300,000 marks were spent for agitation, 41,000 marks for "party schools," to train up writers and agitators and 18,000 marks for their "Press Correspondence," a bi-monthly issue of 4,000, supplying free "copy" to the press.

The manner in which the 300,000 marks were used for agitation purposes gives a striking confirmation that the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light. The annual report of 1909-1910 states that 29,826 membership and 13,814 public meetings were held; that 23,162,440 tracts gratuitously spread "the glad tidings of the future," and that calendars and pamphlets were distributed to the number of 2,545,811. Thus, as an example of their propaganda, the farmers received an "agitation leaflet" in the form of a personal letter, in which the city comrades lovingly addressed their country cousins as "Dear Relatives."

But by far the most potent agitator for German Socialism is the press, and here a veritable campaign of printer's ink comes into view. In 1910 the party controlled 78 dailies, issued from 57 of their own establishments, and these papers counted 1,160,086 subscribers—just double the number given for 1904—only six years before. Der Vorwärts, the leading party organ, daily sends forth 140,000 copies, giving it rank with the chief newspapers of the empire. Another influential journal is Die Gleichheit, the official organ of the women Socialists. Last year it had 85,000 subscriptions. The literary weekly, Neue Zeit, claims nearly 100,000 readers, while the more learned Sozialistische Monatshefte is almost equally popular. Comic papers are not wanting, and the leader, Der Wahre Jakob, dispenses smiles as well as Socialism to nearly three hundred thousand interested readers. To this mighty array of printed power must be added the influential press of the Socialistic Trades Unions, an influence which may be measured by the fact that in 1907 these Unions had 1,837,146 members and thirty-three million marks in their treasury. It is difficult to get a clear concept of the magnitude and intensity of this press propaganda; it must be seen, especially in the large industrial centres, to be fully realized.

Perhaps the most fearful feature of German Socialism is the astoundingly rapid and almost meteoric growth of its Frauenbewegung—its female propaganda. Since the first conference of Social Democratic Women in Mainz, 1900, it has advanced with leaps and bounds. The German female Socialists are veritable Amazons in the cause. A few facts will suffice to indicate the frenzy as well as the fields of their operations. In 1902 they circulated 400,000 leaflets; in 1903 they assisted the party financially and with their presence at the polls. At the Reichstag elections of 1907 their tracts and pamphlets ran into the millions, and they added feminine eloquence to the persuasiveness of their press. In 1908 their beligerency manifested itself in stirring up strikes and waging a huge boycott against Berlin merchants, who would not submit to their demands. At present, 1911, they are more than ever in evidence, and their activity is giving serious concern to the opposition leaders. Of course conventions, public meetings and protestations, and speechmaking in all its forms were never wanting. Nor did they neglect to supply the public with a "Catalogue of Books for Studying Socialism and the Woman Question." In 1909 sixty-two thousand women were members of the party organization; one year later they numbered twenty thousand more, and to-day they loudly claim to have a hundred thousand members.

The official journal of the women is Die Gleichheit (Equality), which enjoys an ever increasing popularity (77,000 subscribers in 1909; 85,000 in 1910). In spite of its fair name, Equality is at all times ultra radical and vehemently anti-Catholic. One specimen of the Editress, Frau Zetkin's strenuous style must suffice. "We must see to it," she says "that we are panoplied with all rights and all knowledge, with the spirit of sacrifice and energy enthusiastically to be one with Socialism in thought and deed, so as to consign to hell as soon as possible this rotten and decrepit society of ours."

Nor have the Socialists been unmindful of the aphorism, "Whoever has the youth has the future." Their Jugendbewegung is simply amazing in its extent and variety; no means is left untried in the effort to capture the coming generation. Beginning in 1904 with societies and journals nominally indifferent, they have gradually developed a propaganda as insinuating as it is effective. This propaganda includes the youth of both sexes, and its influence finds its way into the remotest country school, while in the larger cities its virulence is seen on all sides, seemingly unmolested in its career of destruction. This department of Socialism also has its organ, and here it is the Arbeiter Jugend, which takes great pains to prove to fifty thousand and more inquisitive youths that there is no God, that Christ was only an extraordinary man—like Karl Marx; that the Mother of Christ was a mere Jewess who married a carpenter, etc. Of course "science" of the latest German variety is plentifully supplied to show that the universe is a mere evolution of blind matter, and man the lineal descendant of the ape. All this is "gründlich," demonstrated for the special benefit of the begrimed factory lad or the unkempt farm hand. Science is here made popular with a purpose.

But beneficent Socialism is not content to supply the mind of youth with nourishment; the body, too, must receive its attention, and hence sports and entertainment play an important part in the winning of the younger generation to the cause. Clubhouses have been established in 105 places, seventy of which are provided with free libraries and,—a point to be noted—these clubhouses are open to both sexes, certainly equality with a vengeance. In connection with this "uplifting" of the youth, the annual report for 1910 chronicles 1,434 lectures and entertainments, 38 courses of instruction, 259 theatricals, 215 visits to museums, 1,466 outings, etc. Here, too, printers' ink is not spared, and hence, to assure success, we have a half million special tracts for youth, catechisms of the new religion, and even social song books to the number of thirty thousand. The pleasure clubs are generally the first socialistic snares laid for the unwary, for what can be more innocent than a bicycle club or an athletic meet or a swimming contest? With truth can it be said that only the Catholic organizations can compete with the Socialists in their fight for the youth of to-day and the men of the future.

German Socialism, though checked by the might of monarchy and an opposition ministry, has not worked altogether in vain in its efforts to seize the reins of government. Thanks to class elections and other political agencies, its representation in Parliament is in no proportion to its political strength. This fact fills the Socialists with wrath, and they are promising themselves an ultimate victory and an awful day of reckoning. Nevertheless, in 1909 they held in nineteen of the provinces nearly two hundred seats in the respective diets, while in the various city and town councils they were represented by no less than 7,533 members—often a majority—and these numbers have been increased by the last elections. If the Social Democracy should ever triumph in the Reichstag, and that is not impossible, it will be an evil day for the throne as well as for religion.

The Socialists of Germany certainly have method in their madness, and whoever takes the pains to study their methods will find that they have neglected none of the acknowledged avenues of success. Organization and agitation, platform and press, man, woman and child, all are called into service with a zeal worthy of a better cause. Now, add to all this the economic attractions which German Socialism offers to its followers: co-operative societies of every kind, where the Red comrade or, worse still, his Red wife buys to advantage fuel or flour, apparel or groceries, or the fresh baked bread of the Socialist's modern bakery. These "actual realizations" of his theories turn the Socialist's party loyalty to a cult well nigh blind, so that he sees in them only a foretaste of that blessed order of things where the rose will bloom without a thorn, where the sun shines always and rainy days are nevermore—because they are all so ordered by the Omnipotent State.

This is German Socialism in the year of grace 1911. It is a giant octopus, extending its feelers into every corner of the empire, to be seen with the naked eye or deciphered in the columns of unemotional statistics. It has grown thus in forty years, in prosperous times and in a land economically the best situated on the continent, and among a people hitherto regarded for their intelligence and conservativeness. Could history thus repeat itself in our land of freedom and plenty? Would a change or check in our "good times"—for they cannot continue forever—precipitate such a movement and lead to like results?

A few years ago, Professor Werner Sombart, the well-known German sociologist, came to America to study its conditions, and on his return to Europe he published his results in a work entitled "Why is there no Socialism in the United States?" The book discusses the economic, political and social conditions which have thus far made impossible the successful propagation of Continental Socialism in the United States; and yet Sombart closes his volume with this remarkable sentence: "All the factors that have up to this time retarded the evolution of Socialism in the United States are on the point of vanishing, or of changing into their contraries, and, as a consequence, Socialism will, in all likelihood, during the next generation attain in the Union its highest development." Here is a statement to make Americans pause. Is it possible? Is it probable?

FREDERIC SIEDENBURG, S.J.

What the Court Found

There is still an echo of the Verdesi case in Rome and in the world outside. The anti-clerical papers have averred that as far as Bricarelli is concerned the decision had only the effect of a Scotch verdict, condemning Verdesi for not proving what the court's rulings prevented him from proving, and leaving Bricarelli under the full cloud of the original accusation. A Mr. Robertson, in Venice, has written in that sense to the Scotsman, but there are none so blind as those that will not see. A complete summary of the official findings of the full tribunal, signed by the three judges, the proctor of the crown and the vice-chancellor, has now been published in three columns of one of the Roman newspapers, and may be useful as a specific for the future vaporings of some unborn Littledale or Lea. An abstract is here subjoined:—

First.—The charge of an injurious nature.

The Court finds that Father Bricarelli was a Catholic priest, in excellent standing with his ecclesiastical superiors and the public at large, concerning whom a charge of violating the secrecy of the Confessional would, if true, work serious injury to his good fame and standing.

Secondly.—The charge explicitly made by Verdesi.

The Court finds that Verdesi stated explicitly and without qualification to the press, confirming the same over his own signature, that he had made a certain statement to Father Bricarelli in Confession and that Father Bricarelli, without his knowledge or consent, revealed the same to the Pope.

Thirdly.—The charge not only unproven but false.

The Court finds that Verdesi, in his deposition before the Court, qualifies his charge so as to concern only a statement made in confidence to Father Bricarelli after Confession, a qualification omitted in his published accusation, which charged Bricarelli with revealing a statement made in Confession. This difference, amounting to a contradiction, is emphasized by a series of other contradictions between the original charge and his testimony at the trial, so that the Court is constrained to find that the statement in question was made to Bricarelli neither in Confession, nor in a continuation of Confession, but in the course of a simple conversation between friends.

Furthermore, the declaration made by Bricarelli in his deposition that the statement was made to him in the course of a friendly conversation the Court finds to be substantiated by the testimony of Father Perotti, a friend of Verdesi's, to the effect that Verdesi had told him in September that he had asked such counsel of a friend; now Verdesi has stated under oath that between the time of this statement to Perotti and the visit of Father Bricarelli in July, he had not mentioned the matter to anyone else: hence speaking to Perotti, he refers to the interview with Bricarelli and so denominates a friendly conversation.

Fourthly.—Verdesi acted in bad faith in making the charge.

The Court finds that Verdesi only charged that Father Bricarelli had abused the confidence of a friendly conversation, until he found that the newspapers would not publish that, as of no interest to the public; whereupon Verdesi changed the charge to one of violation of the secrecy of Confession, which the newspapers at once welcomed from him and published.

Fifthly.—The contradictory of the charge proven.

The decision here sums up its findings on the charge proper by stating that considering all the evidence relative to the fact charged against Father Bricarelli of having revealed a secret of the Confessional, "the Court declares not only that the fact has not been proven, but that the contrary has been proven."

Sixthly.—The charge made with intent to defame.

The Court finds that the intent of Verdesi was not, as he avers, to defend himself and his friends whom he had denounced; for, as he himself acknowledged, his friends had not suffered from the denunciation, and neither they nor anyone else, save only those to whom Verdesi himself had confided the fact, knew that Verdesi had made the denunciatory accusation. The Court also finds that Verdesi deliberately intended to defame; for whereas the first newspaper to which Verdesi gave the charge suppressed the name of Father Bricarelli, to avoid, at least technically, personal defamation, as Verdesi knew, he nevertheless wrote thereafter a letter in full, signed and published it, in which explicitly and by name he makes the charge against Bricarelli, a charge he knew to be false, and foresaw would be injurious to the good name of the said Bricarelli.

Seventhly.—The charge made with a sinister purpose of his own.

The Court finds that Verdesi made the charge to fill the press with a grave scandal in the Catholic priesthood, and get himself on the lips of everybody as a victim of the Catholic Church, and so win the sympathy of many and consequent material benefits therefrom.

Eighthly.—The extenuating circumstances.

The Court finds that Verdesi is a wretched, small, repulsive type of man who, not content with his condition in life, seeks to change it with recriminations of his past associates in order to justify his change.

Then follow the sentence of imprisonment, fine, damages and costs.

Religious Orders Before the Spanish Cortes

Spanish anticlericalism, the enemy of the religious Orders, has met with disaster in the parliamentary inquiry which was ordered by Premier Canalejas to know the public feeling on the question of his notorious Associations Law.

The sessions of the committee in charge of the measure were public; all who had, or thought they had, information to communicate, were invited to appear and speak out. Many interested persons were present, even if they did not come prepared to address the committee, for the subject was of such a nature that they were sure of hearing it discussed by able thinkers. The hall in which the sessions were held was crowded with people, who listened attentively, and gave free expression to their own views by the way they received the remarks of the speakers. Among these were both Catholics and anticlericals. There was, however, a marked difference between the two camps, for while the Catholics were represented by eminent thinkers, scientists, and orators who, with irresistible logic and persuasive eloquence, demonstrated the absurdity of the proposed measure, religiously, socially, economically and politically considered, and subjected its chief provisions to a searching analysis from the viewpoint of natural and international law, as well as of Spanish civil law and the canon law of the Church, the anticlericals could bring forth nothing better than a few intellectual mediocrities, who produced upon the public a melancholy impression of mental poverty, prodigious superficiality, and a plentiful lack of scientific acquirements.

Who were the Catholics that volunteered the information ostensibly sought by the committee in its public sessions? They were representatives of the Society of Catholic Youth, of the Central and Provincial Committees on Catholic Action, of the Catholic Workingmen's Clubs, of the Committees for Social Defence, and of the religious Orders, Augustinians, Carmelites, Dominicans, Jesuits, and Salesians. The anticlericals, on the other hand, were represented by two or three business men, two or three anonymous Republicans, and two or three unknown Protestants, whose "information" came to this: The business men averred that the competition of the monks and nuns in the industries was ruinous; the Republicans maintained that the Orders ought to be suppressed; the only point made by the Protestants was that the vow of religion ought not to be recognized by the State as an impediment to marriage. Their position was consistent with their origin.

As a consequence of the public sessions of the parliamentary committee, two conclusions remain firmly established, namely, that the proposed measure against the Orders is anticonstitutional, unjust, arbitrary, and harmful to the interests of the nation, and secondly, that the intellectual life of the country, its scientific and literary culture, the field of dialectics and the domain of the spoken word, are in the possession of the Catholics, whom, however, their anticlerical enemies are never weary of stigmatizing as obscurantists, reactionaries, and enemies of progress. In other words, the public inquiry has brought out that, among us Spaniards, whatever is of any account is Catholic and in the Church.

One of the most striking incidents of the meeting took place in the afternoon of the last day of the sessions. The hall was jammed with people, Catholics, Republicans, Radicals. It was the turn of the representative of the Salesians to address the committee. He was Father Rodolfo Fierro, an unassuming young priest, born in Colombia, South America, educated in Italy, and stationed for the past few years in Spain. Father Fierro began by giving an outline of the work contemplated by Don Bosco's Salesians, their efforts, namely, to educate and elevate the children of the humbler social classes. As he went on with his remarks, such was his unction, his gentleness, his simple and unaffected earnestness, and the magic of his words, that the onlookers rose to their feet as one man and gave vent to their feelings in a wild burst of applause in honor of the humble young Salesian. It was the first time in my life that I saw Spanish Republicans applaud the remarks of a priest.

Father Astrain, S.J., who is now engaged in writing the history of the Spanish Assistancy of the Society of Jesus, addressed the committee in behalf of the Jesuits. He spoke of the early glories of the Society, which owes its existence to a Spanish noble, and enlarged upon the work of the Jesuits in Latin America and the Philippines, where some nine hundred Spanish members of the Society are engaged in mission work.

What, we may ask, will be the fate of the unsavory Association Law, after this public parliamentary inquiry? In the light of the information elicited, Señor Canalejas should pigeonhole his project, but this he will not do. He makes it a point of honor to push the matter on, and his motive is to ingratiate himself with the anticlericals. With his molelike political vision, he seems quite unable to perceive that his pet measure, while highly offensive to the Catholics, does not satisfy the anticlericals, who aim at the suppression and expulsion of all the Orders. Nothing short of this radical measure will appease them.

The matter will now probably go over to the autumn session of the Cortes, but what may happen in the meanwhile nobody can tell. Even now it is whispered about that Canalejas, having made a grand-stand play by presenting his proposed measure in the Cortes without a word with the Vatican, is now feeling his way towards an understanding with the Holy See. He is a lively representation of Janus, for he looks at the Radicals and tries to be on good terms with them while, at the same time, he looks at the Catholics and tries to avoid a rupture with them. It is quite evident that he does not bear in mind those words of Our Divine Lord, "No man can serve two masters." Rather, by his vain attempts to conciliate both, he conciliates neither. Of such a one we Spaniards say, "He always has two candles burning; one in honor of St. Michael, prince of the heavenly host, the other in honor of the prince of darkness."

NORBERTO TORCAL.

Thinking It Over

Attention was called in a recent issue of AMERICA to the altered attitude of Anglican organs towards Modernism. They had joined vociferously in the clamor of protest against the resolute firmness of Pius X in dealing with the heresy and its propagators, but when an Oxford Dean of Divinity published a book ridiculing biblical miracles and undermining revealed religion in Modernistic fashion, they experienced a change of heart. The clamor that was raised against the decree Ne Temere is reaching a similar anti-climax, brought about by the original authors of the uproar.

It was the Presbyterians of Ulster who launched upon the world the grievance that has been raging in press and pulpit from Belfast to Montreal and shaking the rafters of Westminster. A Belfast Catholic named McCann married a Presbyterian without dispensation from his church, and sought later to have his marriage validated. But his consort, who proved to be a termagant, scornfully refused, and endeavored, vi et armis, to drag his children from the Catholic baptismal font. McCann took away the children and disappeared from the scene. This happened over two months before the General Election, but the world knew it not until six days before the polling in West Belfast, where Mr. Devlin, the Nationalist and Catholic candidate, could not be elected without the aid of Protestant votes. Then the full details, with many others, flashed over the wires; the British hustings rang with the cry, "Home Rule is Rome Rule," and Protestant Ulster felt that if the terrible "Nuh-tommery" was not trampled under foot, McCann would have nullified the labors of King William. Mr. Devlin and a Home Rule majority were elected, and Parliament was invoked. Mr. Birrell referred the complainants to the law courts of Belfast, but they declined to adopt this obvious procedure. "The priests," they said, had instigated McCann's action, but when challenged to name the priest or priests as a basis for a libel suit, they were silent. Meanwhile the charges grew in violence, and the Presbyterian Synods and other Protestant bodies issued fiery fulminations, calculated by their violence to soothe the troubled slumbers of William of Orange.

Some six months later, June 8, the Presbyterian General Assembly met in Dublin. Their declared purpose was to revise their Rule of Faith and disciplinary Code, but the Belfast delegates, still obsessed by Mrs. McCann, insisted that the Pope should also change his. Forgetting that His Holiness is not possessed of the Protestant privilege to remodel the rule of Faith at will, nor lightly disposed to reverse the laws of discipline, they presented a memorial demanding the withdrawal of Ne Temere. But a change had come over the Assembly. Dr. Hanson insisted that there should be no abuse of the Catholic Church on the score of this decree, the object of which was commendable; and his statement that, "It might be as well if Protestant churches looked as carefully after the married welfare and pre-nuptial morals of their members," was received with applause.

It was then proposed that the matter should be again referred to Parliament, and the Lord Lieutenant and Chief Secretary be made responsible for the restoration of the children of Mrs. McCann. But the members had come to see that these officials had no power in the matter, an opinion of an Oxford Professor of Civil Law was read showing that the Viceroy's refusal to interfere was legally and constitutionally correct, some Belfast elders were reprimanded for insulting the religious character of their opponents, and the resolution was voted down. Mrs. McCann had ceased to be an international character. The tempest had settled in the teapot.

But the effect of the Decree on the Protestant mind has not ended with the Belfast episode. The discussion it occasioned has already enlightened the Irish Presbyterians, into whose heads, after six months' reflection, the conviction has gradually percolated that the Pope was mainly in the right, and that the Catholic Church is the most authoritative and efficient guardian of the sacredness of matrimony. In another six months they may see the answer to their only remaining objection, that the "null and void" provision of the Decree "is in conflict with the rights of other denominations and the law."

If "claims" were substituted for "rights," the whole proposition could be granted. The Catholic Church, as the one religion founded by Christ and, therefore, the only true religion, denies that any other has a right even to exist as a Christian body. She acknowledges and defends the individual rights of all men, but "denominations" are essentially opposed to the truths and the authority committed by God to her alone; and with them she does not deal. To preserve those truths and enforce that authority she makes laws for her own children. If others do not like these laws they are free to stay outside their range. A Protestant who objects to the Ne Temere Decree is under no compulsion to marry a Catholic, and has no right to seek marriage with one who accepts it as sacred and inviolably binding. Should he persuade the Catholic to marry him in violation of conscience and the latter should afterwards repent, he has himself to blame for the consequences. The Church has given him fair warning, and the McCann case has rendered good service in widely disseminating it.

It has done more. It has helped to clarify and promulgate the truth that the law of the State may be in grave contradiction of the law of the Church and of conscience. When Christianity was instituted the contradiction between its tenets and the unjust laws of the time immediately provoked the fiercest antagonism on the part of the State. It was at the price of three centuries of suffering and the blood of twenty million martyrs that the Church replaced the laws of Nero by the laws of Constantine and developed the Justinian Code, which is at the root of all European and all modern civilized polity. The doctrine that a church decree is condemnable whenever it is "in conflict with the laws of the State," gives to the State the mastery of conscience, and logically implies that the Church has no reason for existence. The State permits a hundred things—divorce, for instance—which Christianity and conscience may not avail of. The State enforces many things, such as anti-Christian education in France, which the Christian conscience is compelled to oppose. According to this thesis legality would be the logical measure of justice and right, and a good Christian might be defined as one who can keep out of jail.

The law-of-the-state pronouncement might be expected of the Church of England Protestantism, which was founded, and has been and is formulated, ruled, endowed and administered by the State; but Irish Presbyterians are the last that should have uttered it. Their existence for over a century was in defiance of the State, a defiance which found vent in the Irish Insurrection of 1798; and those of them who had emigrated to the New World gave it more efficient and permanent expression in the American Revolution. They only became enamored of State law when the State adopted the policy of allowing them to do as they liked. The State has not yet treated Catholics in such fashion, but even should it do so, Catholic principles can never permit them to accept such a theory.

The Dublin Assembly meeting makes it clear that the more thoughtful among them are not assured of their position. They had before them practical proof that the laws of the Catholic Church are more effective of social purity than theirs. The Protestant parts of Ulster more than treble the percentage of illegitimacy of all the rest of Ireland. They, as well as others elsewhere, who, impelled by hereditary bias, rashly inveigh at first blush against Papal decrees, may well give thought to such different results, and perhaps ultimately arrive at the conclusion that Divine direction and influence is the differentiating factor. The vociferation against the Papal condemnation of Modernism has only served to bring home to the religious consciousness of the world that the Pope is the true custodian of the Faith. The noisy protests which the Ne Temere incited will strengthen and widen the conviction that the Catholic Church and its Head are the only efficient conservers of morality.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Pope and the Peace Conference

ROME, June 25, 1911.

On June 11 the Holy Father addressed a letter to the Apostolic Delegate to the United States, Archbishop Falconio, blessing and encouraging the latest efforts for a world-wide peace and a partial disarmament of the great nations. The letter was published in the Roman papers this week; so I suppose that it has been already given to the press in America. It will be remembered that in 1899, when Russia called a Peace Conference at the Hague, Italy protested against the invitation for representation being extended to the Sovereign Pontiff, the Vicar of the Prince of Peace. The protest was listened to and the invitation was not extended. Since then we have had the South African War and the Russo-Japanese War, and the Peace Conference had not the slightest results in the way of making either of them impossible. It is to be hoped that this time, with the cooperation of the Holy Father insured, results of more recent efforts may be more satisfactory.

A part of the Roman press has featured on the front page the extraordinary reception tendered to Cardinal Gibbons in Baltimore. Naturally, a comparison was drawn between the United States and some European republics. Over there, in a full-fledged republic, the patriotism of a man, who as a Prince of the Catholic Church has preached her doctrines of respect for law, order and public authority, has been honored with universal appreciation by government and people with the open understanding that Catholic principles make for security of the State in a republic as well as in a kingdom. In two of the European republics of late the representatives of the same Catholic Church have been treated with contumely and oppression on the alleged ground that the Church is of necessity hostile to the liberty of the people. It is the same Church, and the same principles are hers everywhere, but as ever in the world's history, there are some to see with the eyes of their prejudices and act with the malice of their passion.

The Catholic press also notes with approval that among the world's representatives at the English coronation the ambassador of the Sovereign Pontiff, Mgr. Granito di Belmonte, has been treated with distinguished consideration, set at the same table with the Duke of Connaught and the other princes royal, and greeted after dinner with special deference by the King, Queen and entire royal entourage.

To pass from great to small, the Legation of Uruguay at the Quirinal has just announced that the Uruguayan Legation to the Vatican has been suppressed. There is a technical inaccuracy in this. On March 28th last the Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary of Uruguay to the Holy See, Señor Arturo Iñier Jackson, sent in his resignation, which was accepted by his government, with the declaration sent to him that the mission was closed. However, as he was actually in France at the time, he did not at once receive his letters of recall. As these have never been presented to the Vatican, he is technically still accredited at the Vatican as the representative of Uruguay.

The Italian Government, in spite of the joint note of protest of the diplomatic corps, is going ahead with its legislative project for a government monopoly of life insurance. Though the scheme has a socialistic look, and there is promise of pensions to old and injured workmen from its profits, it is not viewed without a good deal of distrust by the radical element, as it would seem to threaten coerced insurance and a new taxation under the name of insurance dues. None the less, as the Prime Minister, Giolitti, wishes it to go through, and his displeasure would imperil the reelection of quite a large number of the deputies, it is safe to say that he will have his way, whatever that way may turn out ultimately to be.

Human nature and history would seem to indicate that there must have been graft in the building of ancient Rome; the pyramids may have been honeycombed with it, for all we know. But surely modern Rome, Albany and Harrisburg are near of kin. There is a monster Palace of Justice here, nominally completed, concerning which the honorable Signor Amici has moved an investigation. Speaking to his motion, he calls attention to the fact that the cost of the same, beginning with eight million lire, rapidly passed to twenty-six and now has reached the astounding sum of thirty-seven million. He would like the country to know where the money has all gone. The contractors are not yet all paid, as their accounts with the State are still under settlement by arbitration. The arbitrators are awarding immense sums to the contractors, while the work is yet incomplete and showing evident signs of poor execution. That is the way the wheel goes round; the newly ins are forever investigating the newly outs, and all the while for ins and outs the people pay the piper.

Over in the Farnese district, where many people of means have their homes, a rifle range is in use for the Exposition's great shoot. The riflemen have peppered bullets in plenty into the neighbors' habitations, and when they complained to the Mayor for protection, he suavely told them that they might move out. An Englishwoman, the wife of an Italian resident, has come out in an open letter of protest to Signor Nathan, saying that she has come from a free country to a free country, and that she wants this free country's protection. Signor Nathan, in a wide-open reply, intimates that she sha'n't have it, and if she doesn't like it, she may take herself off to the free land from which she came, as nobody invited her hither. Whereat Mr. Man appears with a protest that he had invited her hither by way of matrimony, and that as the wife of a Roman citizen, once an awesome name in the marts of men, she is entitled to civil protection, if not to civil treatment. There the controversy rests for the present, while the riflemen keep on shooting and an armed sentinel of the government stands guard at the good lady's door to prevent her entering her own garden, lest she might be shot. It is to be hoped that the action, or, rather, inaction, of the original mayor (we are in the days of such originals) will not interfere with the course of true love and international marriages, as there is yet need of some foreign gold-dust to furbish up an occasional antique coronet.

On Thursday died Father M. Anastasio Ronci, the Procurator General of the Carmelites of the Strict Observance. He had been unanimously elected head of his order at the General Chapter held in Rome in 1908. He was born in San Vito Romano, made his novitiate in Malta, and, while a religious of modest and humble character, was a profound scholar in philosophy and theology, and a man of rare prudence and sagacity in administrative affairs.

Anti-Manchu Outbreak in Canton

SHANGHAI, May 8, 1911.

The murder of the Manchu Tartar, General Fuki, at Canton, on April 9, by Wen Cheng-tsai, a resident of Singapore and member of the Reform party, was the first step in a series of violent acts aimed at the present reigning dynasty of China. The Cantonese are a fiery and turbulent people, and, more than the Northerners, entertain little respect for the Manchus, whom they consider as invaders of the country and detrimental to its best interests. These sentiments are constantly voiced in the Southern press, at the theatre and betimes in public meetings. The popular ballad brings them home to every village and hamlet, and thus the masses are inoculated with anti-Manchu hatred. Recently one of these ballads contained the following stanza: "Grand injury has been done in Kuantung. The people are growing daily poorer. These shaggy-haired devils from the Long White Mountain (the original home of the Manchus) deserve our hatred. They have caused a terrible stench everywhere. Why should we submit ourselves to their despotic rule? Come, black-haired brethren, let us devise some plan for exterminating them." The song contains also injurious references to the youthful emperor destined to govern one day the Empire. Such outpourings as the above do an immense amount of evil, and, helped by the press, have been the immediate cause of the late local uprising.

The outbreak, for it can hardly be called a revolt, began on the evening of April 27. The revolutionary chiefs adopted a cunning device and thus disarmed suspicion. They lopped off their pigtails, dressed up in foreign clothes and, riding in official sedan chairs, boldly entered the Viceroy's palace. Once within the stately walls, no time was lost. Armed with rifles, revolvers and bombs, the work of destruction was commenced without delay. The guards, insufficient in number, were at first taken by surprise, but little by little regained courage, and a terrible fight ensued. Meanwhile the bombs created havoc, and a copious flow of kerosene set fire to the outer buildings. The Viceroy, Chang Ming-ki, fearing for his life, retreated in haste to the Admiral's quarters, which were not far distant. An attempt was made to seize the armory, but proved unsuccessful. It is noteworthy that the foreign-modeled troops encamped outside the city were not called into active service. Their fidelity was open to suspicion, and they might possibly side with the rebels. In such critical circumstances the Viceroy deemed it wiser to appeal to the Admiral of the Pearl River, and it is this official and his men who principally succeeded in quelling the disturbance. Fighting went on till late in the night, and when the tumult was over it was found that among the slain were the Viceroy's aide-de-camp, the commander of the guard, two military officers of the palace and over fifty marines. The rebels on their side also lost heavily, and a benevolent society of the city put into coffins as many as seventy-three corpses.

A large number were wounded and others captured, among them a gray-haired man of seventy, hailing from Hunan province, and a young girl of sixteen, who had secreted on her person several pounds of dynamite. During three days after the outbreak the gates of the city were closed, railway and steamer traffic suspended, and a regular search made for all who appeared to be connected with the movement. Many dressed in foreign clothes and queueless students were seized as suspects. When the event was made known to the Peking Court the Regent issued immediately a decree ordering "to hinder by all means the spread of the revolt, arrest the leaders, allowing no one," it was said, "to slip out of the net, but exterminating all of them, root and branch."

They did, however, slip out of the net. The rebel chiefs, two of them well known, Hu Yien-hung and Huang Hing, escaped unhurt, and three days later, April 30, spread the revolt to the neighboring cities. An attempt was made to seize Fatshan, a place southwest of Canton, with which it is connected by rail. It has a population of over half a million and carries on an extensive silk trade. The rebels set fire to several quarters simultaneously, but were finally repulsed by the troops. On the same day five other cities were attacked, Chaokingfu and Hweichowfu, Samshui, Kweishan and Shunteh. In all these places the officials were the main object pursued, and much damage was done to public buildings. The arrival of eight regiments of fresh troops from Kuangsi province helped to restore peace to the panic-stricken inhabitants and crush out the rebellion.

Catholic Organization in Holland

Last Pentecost the thirteenth annual Catholic Congress of the Diocese of Roermond was held in the little town of Sittard. The Diocese of Roermond embraces the entire Province of Limburg, and the event suggests the advisability of giving to the readers of AMERICA some idea of the activity of the Catholics of Holland in social matters, and in the promotion of their material interests. Of course these popular movements are all under the guiding influence of Catholic doctrine and morality.

These material interests, of course, vary with the locality and the individuals concerned. Hence anti-alcoholic leagues have been formed; leagues of postmen, telegraph operators, commercial travelers, etc. All these leagues are perfectly well organized. Periodical public meetings are held and the common interests discussed. All of them have Spiritual Moderators, who advise as to the best way to straighten out difficulties that may present themselves and to preserve peace among the members, or between the members and outsiders.

There was a problem that presented itself in the Protestant provinces. Naturally, in such places, there was a good deal of give and take on both sides, and associations were formed in which religion did not enter. But it was thought advisable by the Bishops to organize such associations on an exclusively Catholic basis. It was difficult at first to do so, but the attempt was ultimately crowned with success. Although in neutral societies certain material advantages could be more easily obtained, the Bishops insisted on the ground that the spiritual loss outbalanced the temporal gain, and that in any case it would be easy to strike a balance by adopting means outside of the organization. The result has been that almost everywhere exclusively Catholic societies have sprung up and are in a very flourishing condition.

Each diocese has its Katholickendag, or Catholic Day, but there are no general Congresses for the whole country. The bishops did not think they were desirable. They are all diocesan, and are not necessarily annual.

They are always convened with the permission of the Ordinary, which, of course, is usually given. There is an instance, however, of a refusal, for the reason that the resolutions of the preceding congress was not sufficiently carried out. If leave is given, the program is discussed as well as the time and place. The Congress opens with high Mass in one of the parish churches, and the various bodies of the Congress meet separately. Thus at Sittard there were (1) The People's League; (2) The Farmers' League; (3) The Shopkeepers' League; (4) Employers' League, and so on for Postmen, Telegraph Operators, Temperance, Miners, etc.

All these leagues are exclusively Catholic, and restricted to the Diocese of Roermond. There are, however, similar associations elsewhere.

After the various subjects are discussed and voted on at the special meetings there is a general assembly, where the Bishop or some ecclesiastical dignitary is present and distinguished orators are heard. Civic festivities are generally held in honor of the Congress.

Portugal's Sham Elections

LISBON, June 23, 1911.

The Portuguese Republicans are very much elated over the fact that in the recent election for members of the Constituent Assembly not a single monarchist was successful at the polls; but, instead of being an occasion for boasting, it is really a cause of shame, for there was no freedom in the voting. Certain monarchists had indeed decided to become candidates for the Constituent Assembly, but as the time for the election drew near emissaries of the administration approached them and informed them in all seriousness and strict confidence that the administration could not be responsible for their lives and property, nor for the safety of their families, if they persisted in remaining in Portugal and in seeking election. What more efficient means could be devised for securing unanimity at the polls? Hence, A Capital, an advanced newspaper of this city, could say with much bitterness and all truth, "The republic prevents Portuguese citizens from voting! What is now taking place stirs up the indignation of all those for whom 'democracy' is not simply a rhetorical figure, and for whom 'republic' is not simply a term under whose cloak flourish detestable political practices utterly foreign to the noble struggle for principles. There are no elections! This action of the cabinet closes the ballot-boxes to the citizens of Lisbon."

The candidates for the Constituent Assembly were all named by the Lisbon cabinet; nothing was left to the national will. By such gentle means, therefore, was the Assembly successfully "packed" with delegates entirely in sympathy with the guiding spirits of the enterprise.

The first acts of the Assembly were to declare the house of Bragança ousted and a "democratic republic" established, and next, to decree the colors of the new Portuguese flag.

The message sent to the Assembly by the provisional Government declared that the monarchy had brought about the dismemberment of the country and the political, social and economic ruin of the people. On the religious question it was not less explicit. To effect the expulsion of the religious Orders recourse was had to certain laws and decrees of the defunct monarchy, notably those of Pombal (dating from the eighteenth century!), Aguiar and Braamcamp, so that all was accomplished with perfect (?) legality.

Although the administration affected great fear of a proximate monarchistic invasion (possibly by aeroplane) it seems to us that such talk, for the present at least, is all moonshine.

The recognition of the republic by the United States was hailed with extravagant joy, for other great nations will doubtless follow the example of America. In fact, it is hard to see how they could well do otherwise, for to remain indefinitely not on speaking terms with one's neighbor is out of the question.

The pastoral letter of the Bishops on the injustice of the Separation Law met the same fate as Father Cabral's defense of the Jesuits: the Government forbade its circulation and ordered the seizure of all copies of it. This was done, we presume, because the effete monarchy has now given place to a genuine, simon-pure, democratic republic, as the term is understood in Portugal.

The Child-Widows of India

ST. JOSEPH'S COLLEGE, TRICHINOPOLY, INDIA.

From the returns of the census taken this year for the whole of India, an American lady has drawn up the following list, which speaks of woes unutterable to a large section of God's children, the little child-widows of India, doomed to perpetual widowhood by a cruel and inhuman custom. There are now in India 859 widows one year old, 1,886 widows between 2 and 3 years of age, 3,732 between 3 and 4, 8,180 between 4 and 5, 78,407 between 5 and 10, whilst the number of widows between 10 and 15 rises to 227,367, thus giving a total of 320,431 child-widows, who have never lived with their husbands and yet are real widows in the eyes of orthodox Hindus. Never may they have a chance of getting married again, but must drag on a wretched existence or lead a life of sin, through no fault of their own.

Whence this dreadful state of things? The answer is to be found in the absurd custom prevalent among the higher castes, especially among the Brahmins, of marrying their girls at a very early age. Though the girls join their husbands only after attaining maturity, yet this first marriage is considered as sacred and binding for life on the part of the girls. Should a husband die before his child-wife has reached her age, the latter becomes a true widow and is debarred from getting into lawful wedlock again. There is here close by, in the Sister's School, a young Brahmin widow, now fourteen years old. Some three years ago her marriage took place. The celebration was to last four days; on the third day the bridegroom was carried off by cholera and, on the fourth day, poor Kassi (such is her name) found herself a widow forever.

Formerly most of the Hindu widows, especially among the Brahmins, had to allow themselves to be burnt on the funeral pyre of their husbands. The English Government has suppressed such a barbarous custom, but the enforced widowhood remains. These poor girls, often belonging to the best families, very intelligent and with loving hearts, when grown up find themselves excluded from all the enjoyments of society and are shunned as accursed beings, who, through sins committed in a previous existence, have brought on the death of their husbands. What tongue shall relate the tales of sorrow, grief and despair of these poor girls thus thrown amidst a society debased and corrupted by paganism, without faith, and without hope in this world or in the next?

What a beautiful work it would be to rescue these unfortunate children of God, if we had the means to set up an asylum for them, where they should learn that they, too, are God's children, and very dear to Him! The Protestants, with American aid, have done something in that line.

Here in Trichinopoly we have started, with the help of some friends, a centre for the Brahmins of Southern India who wish to become Catholics. As, in order to embrace our faith, these Brahmins have literally to leave home, parents, friends and everything dearest on earth, they find, in the Christian Brahmin quarter, freedom to follow their conscience and friends to help and encourage them. The pagans, at the same time, have come to learn that Brahmins may become Christians without losing any of the privileges of the caste or becoming pariahs. Had we only means at our disposal to develop the work, it would undoubtedly become a powerful centre for the propagation of our Faith in Southern India.

In a corner of the Catholic Brahmin quarter there rises a modest building, which bids fair to become the long-wished for asylum for these poor widows, the day when some kindly Christian soul shall be moved with pity and come to their help. Already several widows have found peace and happiness within its precincts, and have been set up in life.

How God will bring these souls to the asylum, a letter I have just received from a Brahmin widow, dwelling far away from Trichinopoly, and now in her twentieth year, will show. Belonging to one of the best families of the Madras Presidency, the girl lost her husband when quite a child. Thanks to her parents' affection and her fondness for study, she was happily preserved from all dangers to her soul. A passing acquaintance with a Catholic woman was the means employed by God to bring her to the light of faith. As soon as she heard of Our Lord and His love for us, her heart went to Him and she resolved, in the face of innumerable difficulties, to become a Catholic. She wrote to me, asking the favor that she might be received among the Brahmin converts. On receiving a favorable answer, she thanked me in the following simple and touching way: "Rev. and Dear Father: Many thanks for your kind letter. I am very anxious to become a member of the Holy Church and to receive all its blessings. As soon as possible, I shall take the last step and give myself fully to Our Lord. Be kind enough to receive me among your children and make me a child of God. My dear Father, I am very grateful for your kindness towards my poor soul, and I sincerely thank my Catholic sisters for their prayers."

What God has done in the case of this good soul He will do in the case of many others, if only our Christian brethren in other more fortunate lands will pray for them and help us to prepare a place to receive them.

The London Times states that the devastation of the Catholic villages in Albania has been of the most savage character. Old men and women were thrown into the burning houses and atrocities committed which cannot be described. The Albanians refuse to submit to the Sultan. King Nicholas declares it is not the Sultan personally who has authorized these atrocities, but the irresponsible clique which control the Government. The latest news is that, in spite of the advice of Russia, the Montenegrins have determined to take up arms against Turkey and thus generalize the Balkan conflict. Meantime, Turkey is refusing to submit the Albanian question to the Powers.

The Jesuit Oath

The Call is a paper published in New York in the interests of Socialism. Our introduction to it came through a clipping sent us from the issue of June 17, and the furtherance of this slight acquaintance, if there is to be any, will certainly not be of our choosing. To prejudice its readers against the Jesuits, whom it accuses of using unfair means against the Socialist movement, it publishes the canard styled "the Jesuit Oath." What manner of man is it that will attempt to becloud a clear issue—such as the conflict between Socialism and religion—by printing and standing for a fabrication which the most bitterly anti-Catholic organs have denounced as an utter fraud which no well-informed person could swallow? Having served its purpose in England, appearing at regular intervals with more or less embellishment from the days of Titus Oates, it took a flying trip not long ago to Germany, where disaster befell it as soon as it was sighted. The Evangelische Bund, the German equivalent of the Protestant Alliance, styled it eine plumpe Falschung, "a clumsy fabrication," while the official organ of that body, the Tägliche Rundschau, implored Protestants not to give themselves away by accepting such rubbish, thus playing into their enemies' hands, and "drawing water to the Ultramontane mill." When we heard that the silly calumny had appeared only a year ago in the Wanganui Chronicle of New Zealand, we thought that the myth, having run its crooked course over the earth, had at last reached the world's limit, and was preparing for its disappearance into the nothingness out of which it had evolved. This final plunge it seemed to take when the Protestant's Treasury, the English Protestant Press Bureau, which supplies material for unsavory warfare against Rome, at last, under pressure of nearly three centuries of refutation, expressly disowned this document as a forgery, as the New Zealand

Tablet informs us, and so formally withdrew it from the Protestant armory. Lo and behold! it has dared to raise its head again, a month ago in New Orleans; more recently in New York. We are convinced now that some errors seem to share in the immortality of truth. At least they will always thrust their distorted visage into the world over which rules the Prince of Darkness and the Father of Lies. Socialism should be more choice in the company it keeps.

R. P.

Readers of the French papers are continually confronted by two mystical letters at the head or in the body of political articles. They are R. P. They do not mean Republican Party or Roman Pontiff, or Reformed Protestants or Russian Police, but they symbolize the most recent political war cry: Représentation Proportionnelle, which may soon be another R. P., that is, a Revolutionary Program, or the occasion of it.

At present there are two electoral systems in France, both of which are known in our own country. They are the scrutin d'arrondissement, and the scrutin de liste. Balloting for a single individual in a given electoral district is called by the French uninominal voting, or scrutin d'arrondissement, whereas voting the general ticket on which the names of all the candidates of a large electoral circumscription are inscribed is called the scrutin de liste. At present the Deputies are elected by the former, the Senators by the latter. But the Deputies are unhappy, at least a large part of them, and so are a great many other people. For in the first place the scrutin d'arrondissement is a fertile field for graft. The candidate in a small locality can promise all sorts of jobs for his friends and neighbors before election, and after he is in office he is kept busy paying his debts instead of serving his country. It has the additional disadvantage of multiplying party divisions—a curse which France is troubled with to an exasperating degree in its power to check wholesome legislation. On the other hand the scrutin de liste labors under the disadvantage of killing minority representation, for the votes of a small district can easily be swamped by the general ticket. However the result may be often the triumph of the minority with regard to the whole people, just as with us a Democratic State may have a Republican Legislature, or a President may not represent the majority of the nation. It is a puzzle no matter how you look at it, and in France the politicians are striving to effect a compromise. In fact, they have been worrying over the problem ever since the time of Gambetta. He was the champion of Proportional Representation, and often left his Presidential seat and mounted the tribune to fight for it. In our own times, Briand, before he left office, was in favor of it, and proposed that in each electoral district half the candidates should be given to the majority and the rest divided up among the minority. Against this the Socialists protest, as the present system of the scrutin d'arrondissement gives them their only hope, by dickering with the other candidates, of getting into Parliament. If they were to stand alone their numerical weakness would be revealed. The R. P. for them is a menace, and they are fighting it fiercely. The same battle is being waged in Belgium where Proportional Representation, by means of the system of plural voting which prevails there, is in force. Against it the Socialists are arrayed, and they have to a great extent constrained the Liberals to help them in the fight. They have adopted a rival alphabetical symbol, viz.: S. U., or Suffrage Universel. But that will scarcely help them. S. U. prevails in France as we have seen, but has not brought peace. The latest news from the Palais Bourbon is that R. P. has been passed by 566 to 4. This is a surprise, but the nature of this Proportional Representation has not yet been revealed to the world at large.

Lawlessness of the People

Certain prejudices concerning the people of the United States are so deeply rooted in England that it is almost impossible to eradicate them. Of these one is that, compared with Englishmen, Americans are lawless. One might urge that no member of Congress, for instance, could imitate Keir Hardie and his friends, all M. P.'s, in India and the Young Egypt Congress, and go to the Philippines to stir up hatred of American rule, or make fiery speeches at a convention held in Mexico to promote the liberation of Hawaii, and then resume his seat in the House of Representatives; for his constituents would not tolerate it. Compare your courts with ours, would be the reply. See how quickly we settle our criminal trials, while in America new trials, appeals, technical subterfuges, drag a case out, and often, too, the guilty man escapes.

We are not perfect, and our imperfections in this matter may be deplorable, but they do not prove us lawless. They rather show us to be very devotees of the law. We allow an accused person to use every means the law allows him to escape punishment, but when he has exhausted all these in vain, the American people expect him to meet his fate like a man, and will not stir a finger to help him to avoid it. The reporting by the Bar Association of Newton, the attorney for Crippen, the wife murderer, reminds us that the English people act very differently. The judge, the jury, the court of appeal, get through their work efficaciously enough; but the case is not then finished. It is retried by women, old and young, over the teacups; by men in the train, in the club, over their wine after dinner, over their beer in the public house; and the British people decide that the judge was wrong, even though he were Lord Chief Justice of England; that the jury was wrong; that the court of appeal was utterly wrong. Then petitions are circulated and signed, praying for a pardon or a commutation. In the Crippen case the attorney seems to have helped on the movement by communications to the press which he knew contained falsehoods. The people are not content to accept the decision of the only lawful tribunals, and this is the height of lawlessness.

But the Home Office generally ignores such petitions. Granted; but that only proves that the executive is law-abiding. It does not change the lawlessness of the people. Still, you can't deny that criminals in the United States get executive clemency through political influence. It does not happen so often as people think; and when it does happen it shows weakness, perhaps, in the executive, but it does not make the people lawless.

Revision by petition flourishes in Canada. It has been tried in this country. We pray it never may become a common practice. The step from it to the mobbing and the assaulting of judges is, as we learn from recent happenings in England, not a very long one.

Fabricating News

The newspapers on Monday morning as a rule make very dull reading for the man in quest of facts. Unless an earthquake somewhere has disturbed the tranquillity of the Sabbath, or a tremendous catastrophe on land or sea has opportunely come to the relief of the chronicler, or some astute politician is ready to spring a sensation on an unexpectant public, there is little to be found in the Monday editions, and for the most part more than that little is hardly ever looked for by the jaded reader of the Sunday supplements.

We can imagine the wobegone attitude of the Sunday night editor as he tries to patch together what will pass for news on the morrow. The office pigeon-holes are ransacked, a catchy filler that was crowded out of the Sunday issue is taken off the rack, a new headline or a new date added and the concoction is ready to serve.

This is the hour of the bright young journalist who is trying, has been for years trying, to make good. Any event, real or imaginary, will serve his purpose; if prosaic or commonplace it may need a little dressing; but if it be humorous, if it tickles the fancy, or raises a smile or a laugh or strengthens an ancient prejudice, or supplies a short and spicy story for the breakfast hour, it will probably find itself in honored setting on the first page.

The curious may easily pick these delicious scraps of information from the various daily newspapers, but they must be looked for in Monday's issues only.

The latest story—and, of course, it is introduced in out-of-town papers as a Special Telegram—is a romance, all told in twenty lines. The heroine; the adventurer; the denouement; the aftermath. Then the setting: Rome; Artist's Studio; Escape from Rome to Marseilles; Atlantic Steamship; Quebec; Convent; Adieu. Then come the pen touches under which the whole story takes on life; slender girl in brown; face heavily veiled—which saves the artist the labor of a minute description—an only child; family wealthy; nineteen and beautiful. In Rome—proper place for romance—she meets a young man, so the story runs, tall, with thick dark hair and much of the artistic manner; quick friendship and ready offer of marriage; unknown to petitioner, parents of slender girl in brown cable to America for further information about the tall young man with the thick dark hair. And the result is—well, the engagement is broken off. "Plainly an adventurer," chorused the steamship passengers, who, strange to say, knew all about the girl in brown and the tall young man before reading a line of the love affair in the newspapers. Perhaps they had used the cable or, better still, the wireless. But alas for the girl in brown—even the old sea-dogs declared it a case of a broken heart. No diversion will bring any consolation; though father and mother try to dissuade her, she clings to the determination to enter a convent.

The story is really pathetic. Everybody will read it. And the silly and unfounded belief that the convent is the refuge of broken hearts is newly confirmed. Is this way of furnishing news to be classed among the triumphs of the modern Press?

Bavaria's Latest School Conflict

There is a contest just now on in Catholic Bavaria, which is of actual interest to those who note the trend of educational work the world over. The readers of AMERICA will recall a reference made some time ago to a joint letter of the Bishops of Bavaria to the Catholic members of the association of public school teachers of that kingdom. The communication dealt with the irreligious and agnostic tone characteristic of articles appearing in a certain school journal, the Bayerische Lehrerzeitung, accepted as an official organ by the association.

It appears that the rules of the Bavarian State Teachers' Association make it obligatory on all members to subscribe for this journal. In view of its anti-Catholic and anti-Christian utterances the Bishops, in their letter, requested all Catholic teachers affiliated with the organization either to insist upon the elimination of this characteristic tone of the journal, or to join in an effort to secure the abrogation of the rule making it incumbent upon all members of the Teachers' Association to subscribe for the Lehrerzeitung. Their evident purpose in publishing their joint letter was to safeguard the Catholic teachers from dangerous and vicious influences.

The request of the Bishops raised a hue and cry among those of the non-Catholic members of the organization, who stand for neutral or non-religious training in the public schools of the kingdom. All sorts of mean and petty charges were made by them, the Bishops being attacked especially, because, so these proponents of neutral schools affirmed, they had interfered in a matter entirely beyond their competency.

The Bishops declined to keep silent, when they recognized the need of an urgent word of warning to their own Catholic people. In a second joint letter addressed to the Catholics of Bavaria, they gave a dignified explanation of the action they had taken in regard to the Lehrerzeitung. That they were clearly within the limits of their competency in criticizing the anti-Christian journal as they had done, they thus affirmed: "Our right to make the appeal we have made is not to be questioned; it is rooted in the duty imposed upon us as bishops to safeguard purity of teaching; it is solemnly established as well in the Constitution of Bavaria, one provision of which declares it to be a part of the privileged rights of the episcopal office 'vigilantly to watch over the teaching of faith and morals.' Notwithstanding this constitutional prerogative belonging to us, the request we expressed in regard to Catholic teachers and the Lehrerzeitung has been bluntly refused, with a snub that implies a strange ignorance of our rights under the law of our country."

The leaders in Germany favoring non-religious teaching in State schools evidently are not minded to rest quietly under the dignified rebuke thus administered. On May 1, the General Secretary of the National Association of the State Teachers of Germany, to which the Bavarian organization is attached, in the "general news summary" which it edits for Die Deutsche Schule, a monthly review appearing in the interests of the National Association, published a paragraph calling upon the members of the larger body to unite with their Bavarian confreres in energetic protest against the "uncalled for interference of the Bavarian Bishops with the internal policy of the Teachers' Association."

Happily the Bishops are not without their own strong auxiliaries, eager to hurry to their support. The faithful people of that Catholic land do not propose to allow any association of teachers to have the last word in what concerns the training of their children. They have already manifested their purpose to use the rights which, as parents, they possess in the matter, and to aid, with enthusiasm the action their Bishops have taken to repel the anti-Catholic influences that are being brought to bear upon the teaching body of their country. On June 1, following a call issued by the Committee of Catholic Action in Munich, an immense concourse of Catholics assembled publicly to profess this purpose. The largest hall in Munich, accommodating 6,000 persons, was packed to its last capacity. The foremost lay Catholic leaders of Bavaria were in attendance; the audience was a thoroughly representative one, made up of men and women of every class in the community. The local organization of the Teachers' Association had issued an insistent request that the members of that body should absent themselves from the gathering, but the Catholic State school teachers ignored the mandate and were present in force. It was publicly avowed by the speakers at the meeting that their meeting was in no sense a political one. With politics as such their Bishops, as Bishops, wished in no wise to meddle. They met, it was said, simply to declare their loyal accord with their Bishops in the policy these had followed in criticizing and condemning the anti-Christian tone of the Lehrerzeitung, a school journal forced upon Catholic members of the Teachers' Association. Their declaration of this sentiment, one is glad to note, was clear enough and emphatic enough to cause the members of the Teachers' Association, if they are wise, to take prudent counsel and avoid further conflict.

Catholics and the Press

The straightforward words addressed by our able and earnest collaborator, Señor Norberto Torcal, to a distinguished gathering in the palace of Archbishop Almaraz of Seville at a recent meeting in favor of a Catholic Press Association, are so applicable to the condition of the Church in America, that our readers will doubtless appreciate them in English dress.

"If the Catholic press was to fulfil duly the object of its existence and realize fully its exalted mission, it was plain at the outset that the one thing necessary was a bureau of telegraphic and telephonic information which could furnish sober, truthful, and complete news of all that might happen in Spain as well as abroad. Thus would Catholics be freed from the slavery of the anti-Catholic news agencies and would be delivered from the hateful work of contributing with their funds to the success of undertakings that were always hostile to religion and Church. But what was so easily seen was not so easily done. Whence could be gathered the capital needed for the enterprise? Then began in a small way the formation of the association for whose development and extension the present meeting had been called.

"Of what avail is it," asked the speaker, "if our Catholic newspapers have excellent editorials and learned contributions, and yet, on the news page, which is commonly all that is read, they are poor, weak, defenceless, and at the mercy, by no means tender, of the enemy? At the mercy of the enemy! That enemy uses two weapons against us, and those weapons are silence and misrepresentation. Silence is the order of the day when there is question of anything favorable to the Church; hypocritical affectation of impartiality is in evidence when, by a few swift twists of misrepresentation, the nature and importance of a great Catholic movement may be so distorted as to appear something cheap, trivial and insignificant. Take the immense gatherings which met to protest against the proposed 'lay schools,' that is, schools without religion. From the reports of them sent out by hostile agents, one might think that those meetings, where the brightest and best men in Spain appeared and spoke, had been attended solely by the clergy, with a sprinkling of sacristans and pious old women.

"You will tell me," continued the speaker, "that you are tired of being besieged for contributions to good works, that there are already too many claims and calls upon your charity and good will. I don't deny it; I don't deny that you are tired, I don't deny that you are besieged. Unfortunately, many, very many, ask, and few, very few, give. But I would like to bring home to you that there is something more urgent, more pressing, and more necessary than, for example, the splendid illumination of our churches or the elaborate and costly celebration of religious solemnities, or the building of finer churches and richer altars, than, though I hesitate to say it, the relief of the temporal needs of the poor. That something is the proper provision for the existence and support of the Catholic press, for the press is the great propagator of truth, the great apostle of society, the great agent for the salvation of souls. What doth it profit, ladies and gentlemen, if the generosity of the few pious rich raises sumptuous temples when those temples remain empty, when the people do not come to them to pray, to assist at holy Mass, and to hear the Word of God? If the people, those who need light, direction, love and counsel, wander far from the sanctuary and the priest, what doth it profit? Remember that every great explosion against the Church and religious institutions has been preceded and heralded by a violent newspaper campaign of misrepresentation and slander. It is in such campaigns that the Catholic press must take part. That it may take an efficient part, it rightfully demands your hearty cooperation."

Amenities of Statesmanship

When the refined and courteous de Broqueville took the reins of power as Premier of Belgium, people hoped that his suavity and prudence would have an effect on the manners and methods of the turbulent Left of the legislative body. The reverse has happened. The House of Deputies at one of its sessions was like a menagerie. Of course de Broqueville is not the chief tamer of the rampant and roaring legislators, but he was present while the first trouble of the new administration was going on. However his good manners failed to filter through to help his able assistant, Cooremans, or to moderate the rage of his assailants. The scene was most disgraceful, and the epithets of "liar," "forger," "thief," hurtled through the air as these supposed Solons howled and stamped and smashed things while they legislated for the country.

It was the 21st of June, and the exultant if not utterly triumphant Left were for war. First Daens, the Christian Socialist, not always on the right side, but now with the Catholics, and who was adding to his "crime" of treachery the equally unforgivable one of speaking Flemish, was denounced as a "liar," "calumniator," and "traitor." The Catholics of Louvain were described as "the murderers of the workmen who wanted universal suffrage"; Catholic financiers were "plunderers and grafters," and the Catholic clergy were "corrupters of youth." To upset Schollaert the opposition had successfully employed street riots, and now they make the Parliament House a cabaret where legislators fight like rowdies. No wonder there are riots among the people when there is anarchy among the law-makers. The outlook is not encouraging, and the friends of sturdy little Belgium are wondering if its Government is going to pass into the hands of men like those who are dragging France, Portugal and Italy to perdition.

LITERATURE

The Religious Experience of the Roman People. By W. WARDE FOWLER, M.A. London, New York, etc.: The Macmillan Company. Price, $4 net.

The author of this work has gathered together virtually everything that is extant in classical authors concerning the religion of the Romans. Its title seems to us inappropriate. Religion, i. e., man's apprehension of his essential relations with God and his voluntary discharge of the obligations arising from them, belongs primarily to the individual. Social religion, whether of the family, the community, or the state, exists because these are human societies, having as their function to help the individual to the perfection of his nature. Religious experience, according to the universal acceptance of the words, at least among Christians, is the reflex apprehension of God's workings in the soul and of the soul's response to such workings by the subjection to them of its intellect and will. It is therefore purely personal. It is the soul's most intimate possession, and therefore the most jealously guarded. Cicero discourses learnedly of man's relations with God; but he does so objectively and in the abstract. Of his concrete subjective religious experience, of what these relations were to him practically, we may conjecture, but he tells us nothing. In a Methodist revival meeting the convert pretends to tell his experience, but all see that his reserve far exceeds his confidences. His difficulty is two-fold: the repugnance to laying bare one's secret soul, and the hardness of the task of self-introspection, and of the finding of material terms apt to express the things of the spirit. It is this almost moral impossibility that makes St. Augustine's Confessions perhaps unique. He has had imitators. Some saints have come very near him, but his thorough introspection, his perfect analysis, his complete revelation, stand alone in religious literature. For Mr. Fowler, religious experience is little more than a record of the successive phases of social religion.

These remarks must not be taken as quibblings over a name. They are important, as showing how widely Christian and Rationalist differ as regards, not only their point of view and their method, but also their hopes when they set themselves to penetrate the mists obscuring the religious practices of antiquity, and then, a task infinitely harder, to reach the religious experiences lying deep beneath. The Christian bears in mind that God, who wishes all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth, though He suffered men to walk in their own ways, to change the glory of the incorruptible God, whom they knew, into the likeness of things corruptible, and so to fall victims to uncleanness, left not Himself without testimony doing good from heaven, manifesting His eternal power and divinity by the things that are made; so that in every nation were those fearing God and working justice fulfilling the conditions laid down by St. Paul for enlightenment to salvation: "He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and is a rewarder of them that seek Him." How many, how few such were in the ancient world God alone knows. What was the relation of primitive religious practices, of which the vestiges remain, to the perception of the supreme and only God, none knows but He. This, however, we do know, that idolatry was a decadence, a degradation of the religious idea in man; and therefore one must be cautious in judging primitive religions by any similarities he sees, or imagines he sees, amongst the idol worshippers of to-day.

The reticence such reflections induce is no part of modern comparative religion. This prattles pleasantly about totemism, taboo, magic, fetishism; and compounds for ignoring real obscurities by making obscurities of the obvious. Our author is very far from being a devotee to a theory because it is fashionable. He will not hear of totemism in connection with the Roman people, and his reasons, briefly expressed, seem convincing. But with regard to taboo, he appears to fall into a snare almost unavoidable to an Evolutionist who can say: "By taboo is to be understood a very important part of what I have called the protoplasm of primitive religion, and one clearly allied to magic and fetishism" (page 27). Evolutionism holds necessarily a theory of primitive religions the very opposite of the Christian doctrine. Instead of a gradual decadence in the peoples who turned from God, it takes for granted a progress in all religions from what is worse to what is better. Hence, if totemism, which is pure diabolism, be excluded as an origin of primitive religions, magic and fetishism and taboo, diabolism under other forms, must be brought in. We do not say these things were not to be found in the religions of the early world, but we hold that there is no warrant for reckoning them as part of the protoplasm. On the contrary, they were facts of their gradual degradation.

We think, therefore, that many things which the author refers to taboo may be explained otherwise. As for the exclusion of strangers, captives and women from certain sacrifices (page 30), to explain it by taboo seems to us a notable example of the making of an obscurity out of the obvious. The same may be said of the expulsion of members of neighboring communities in the lustratio populi (page 31), and before we could admit the sprinkling of Professor Von Duhn and Bishop Berkeley's bedroom with holy water to be a survival in modern Italy of the old taboo, we should have to hear what the village priest and the Bishop's landlady had to say on the subject.

We are glad to see that Mr. Fowler repudiates utterly the notion that the late religion of the Roman State implied a bilateral contract which bound the gods to its observance. He shows with great acumen that sacrifices and worship were all impetratory, and that the reasons alleged on behalf of the former theory are without foundation. His explanation of the radical difference between the old Roman idea of the gods and the Greek Olympus is enlightening and confirms those who hold the comparative purity of the earlier religions. The chapter on the influences of Greek philosophy, leading up to those on Mysticism—a title to which we might take exception—and the Religious Feeling in Virgil, will be most useful to one studying the preparation for the Incarnation; and that on the Augustan revival throws light on the persecution of Christianity by the successors of Augustus.

In discussing the influence of Roman religion upon Christianity the author falls into the common exaggeration of assuming that wherever similarity is found one must assume a borrowing. The fact is that certain things, such as litanies, processions, aspersions, etc., appeal universally to the religious soul as eminently proper for the exterior worship of God, and this suffices to explain their place in the rites of Christianity, which necessarily abhorred idolatry. We must say, too, that the author betrays, from time to time, an animus against the Church, at least in Italy. Thus he tells us (page 309) that when the Goths were threatening Rome, and certain Etruscan magicians had offered their services to the Prefect of the City, to drive them away with incantations, Pope St. Innocent consented to their employment, provided they performed their rites in private. The story is most injurious, and antecedently improbable. One, therefore, would have expected Mr. Fowler to look up the authorities for it before making it his own. He refers us casually to Professor Dill's "Roman Society in the Last Century of the Western Empire", and Dill refers us to Sozomen and Zosimus. The former says nothing about the Pope. He states that certain "Hellenizers", i. e., idolaters, in the Senate proposed to invoke the gods, and implies that nothing came of it. Zosimus was a pagan, who made Constantine and Christianity responsible for all the woes of the Empire, and lost no opportunity of blackening their reputation. He is hardly an acceptable authority.

Nevertheless, despite its blemishes, Mr. Fowler's book is of the highest interest to students, who, reading his facts in the light of revealed religion instead of the haziness of Evolutionary theories, will draw from it much profit. H. W.

William Lloyd Garrison. By LINDSAY SWIFT. Philadelphia: George W. Jacobs & Co. $1.25 net.

We sometimes wonder how many former slaves of African birth still survive in these United States. True, the last importations commonly found their way to those places where servile labor was hardest and, consequently, slave life was shortest; but still there may be some who retain a vivid remembrance of the slave-ship and its dreary course across the Atlantic. For them and for their fellows the great Secessionist, William Lloyd Garrison, wrote and spoke and unflinchingly faced mob violence. Fiercely in earnest, blindly inconsistent, preaching peace and rousing his readers and hearers to frenzy, his eye was so focussed upon his own viewpoint that, in his opinion, those who differed with him must necessarily be the spawn of the evil one, the instruments of his tyrannical sway. Garrison was firmly persuaded of his own personal infallibility, and this persuasion of his brought him suffering, stripes, and wounds; yet he was consistently obstinate in his inconsistency, until the great reform at which he aimed had been brought by means which he had always held in abhorrence.

His life is the seventeenth in the American Crisis Biographies, and is far from being the least interesting and instructive. Born in 1805, he was an editor before he was of age, and began his career as a public speaker before he was much older; he was well on in his seventy-fourth year, before the end came to a life which had known many wild tempests and few restful calms. Abolition was his main theme, but he found time or occasion for subjects as varied as phrenology, clairvoyance, female suffrage, total abstinence, and an anti-tobacco crusade. He was a youth when slavery became a burning question in national politics; he lived to see it buried. Who would question his sincerity? Who would commend his reasonableness or breadth of vision? We are now far enough removed from those stormy times to be able to study with composure and calmness the words and deeds of one who faced a mob in cultured Boston, publicly burnt the Constitution of the United States on the Fourth of July, 1854, and lived to receive honor in that same Boston and to see the Constitution amended to his liking. Although Garrison is the central figure, and rightly, the author quite properly introduces other public men of the period with whom we feel better acquainted for having read the work. H. J. S.

Half a Man. By MARY WHITE OVINGTON. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

This half man is the New York Negro. The little book which tells us of him is an interesting description of the black man in his surroundings, work, and aspirations in the great metropolis. It is written in a sympathetic vein, but the impression left on the reader is not one of great hopefulness for the black man's future. The only church where the author found the white man mingling with his dark brothers was the Catholic Church on Fifty-third street. "At St. Benedict the Moor the black faces of the boy acolytes contrast with the benignant white-haired Irish priest, and without need of words preach good will to men." "The white-haired Irish priest" is a New Yorker. It is to be regretted that Miss Ovington did not also meet Father Burke in the Metropolitan Tower, who is entrusted with a larger solicitude for his black brother than is his devoted assistant at St. Benedict's.

The O'Shaughnessy Girls. By ROSA MULHOLLAND. New York: Benziger Brothers. $1.50 net.

There are four of them, Gentianella, Heliantha, Bluebell and Lavender, all named after flowers by their mother, an English countess, who rejected a duke to marry The O'Shaughnessy. Tremendously pedigreed on both sides and wondrously accomplished, two of them capture English earls, the third weds her gardener, who turns out to be a wealthy English gentleman, and the last settles down with The O'Clare in an Irish castle built by an American mine. They talk a great deal, as girls will, and write long letters about flowers, balls, parties, theatres and millinery, and a little about love, for which purpose men are occasionally introduced, two of them "highly educated at Harvard University." One of these is The McRory O'Rorke, the other an American named Slingsby, who, however, atones for his name by being a millionaire and marrying and settling in Ireland. They are all good if somewhat worldly people; but if they ever went to Mass, said a prayer, had a Catholic education, or were Catholics at all, the author fails to inform us. There are some useful chapters on a stage-struck young lady, and the whole narrative, though long drawn out, is pleasantly told. * * *

La Flor Maravillosa de Woxindon. Novela Histórica de la época de Isabel de Inglaterra por el P. JOSÉ SPILLMAN de la Compañía de Jesús. St. Louis: B. Herder $1.10 net.

Although this is called a "historical novel", it is a history rather than a novel, as readers of the familiar English version know; for the events which led to the execution of Mary, Queen of Scots, are related with scrupulous regard for historic truth. The author's skill in introducing into the history the lights and shades of an English Catholic family of the period does not affect the substantial accuracy of his description of one of the greatest tragedies of the reign of the heartless and unholy Elizabeth of England. * * *

Dr. James J. Walsh has given to the readers of the July Harper's Magazine an interesting and valuable article on the "Irish brogue", a manner of pronunciation which is not the result of ignorance or lack of education, but of adherence to primitive methods. "Tea", for instance, was "tay" in Queen Anne's time; and "nayther" is or was just as correct a pronunciation of the ei sound in "neither" as it is in "reign" or "feign", etc., at the present time. The Irish expression, "old dart", meaning "the old country", solves a philological puzzle. The word "earth" was formerly pronounced "arth", just as we say harth and not "herth" in speaking of the "hearth." As it often happens that Irishmen omit the sound of the final h in certain words—an omission which was also once quite proper—hence "the old earth" or "old land" became the "old arth", and has finally lapsed into the "old dart." The article is not only interesting but instructive.

EDUCATION

With addresses of appreciation for the treatment accorded the delegates by the people of Chicago, the Catholic Educational Association closed the successful sessions of this year's congress with an enthusiastic mass-meeting in the Cathedral College hall in that city. Archbishop Quigley presided, and the addresses were made by some of the most noted Catholics of the country engaged in educational work. Of the five resolutions, passed with practical unanimity by the 2,500 members of the Association present from all parts of the United States and Canada, that condemning the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching was probably the most important expression of Catholic educational principle during the meeting.

* * *

Father Brosnahan's paper dealing with the Foundation, which was read during one of the separate meetings of the College section of the Association, no doubt led to the introduction of the resolution. Characterizing Mr. Carnegie's fund as "a private agency which is endeavoring to exercise an undue and irresponsible influence over American education," the reverend author of the paper followed the line of argument already frequently insisted upon in former issues of AMERICA, and showed the Foundation to be not a benefit but "a menace to the intellectual and moral well-being of the American people," since it essentially "aims at the dechristianization of education in this country." The resolution, accepted by the large assembly of representative Catholic educators, puts the stamp of that body's approval on Father Brosnahan's argument, and deprecates "the illiberal and sectarian attitude of the Foundation toward American universities and colleges."

* * *

Right Rev. Joseph Schrembs, Auxiliary Bishop of Grand Rapids, Michigan, voiced excellently the general tenor of sentiment leading those present to make this emphatic protest against the spirit and aims of Mr. Carnegie's fund. He said: "Our object—to bring all our educational forces of the country together upon a basis of intelligent cooperation with the definite purpose of imprinting Catholic thought upon education in every branch—from the elementary school to the university and seminary—never has been defined more clearly than in this convention. The educational system some men seek to foist upon the country rests on an entirely false basis. Education devoid of religion does not satisfy. Show me two professors in any of our big secular universities to-day who are agreed on what is moral. Morality, as these men seem to understand it, is a shifting opinion, a conviction which changes with the spirit of the age. The Catholic view is that morality is something objective, something outside of man, and only by conforming to it can he work out his happiness even here below."

* * *

Catholics stand for the accompaniment of explicit religious instruction in every grade of educational work because they recognize that without the sanction of religion this necessary moral teaching is impossible. No great study is needed to show the aim of the Carnegie Foundation to be the establishment of a centralizing education trust which will exalt the universities and colleges that are opposed to evangelical Christianity and will discredit those under control of Christian denominations. One needs not be surprised, then, to find a representative body of Catholic educators stigmatizing the scheme of this modern "patron Saint of learning" as a genuine menace to the intellectual and moral well-being of the American people.

* * *

To be sure, it is the privilege of Mr. Carnegie to dispose of his wealth as he may see fit, but, as the Rev. Dr. Edwin Poteat, President of the Furman (Baptist) University, Greenville, S. C., recently declared, "no rich man has the right to ask us to desert our principles for the sake of an old-age pension." One is glad to quote Doctor Poteat. Despite repeated affirmations of a similar tenor made by Protestant divines and educators, there is an inexplicable tendency on the part of writers in the secular press to look upon the condemnation of the Carnegie Foundation, by those who favor explicit religious training, as something emanating from "narrow" Catholics. These will tell us that the administrators of the fund are not averse to religious teaching, that what they reject is the sectarian character of such teaching in schools controlled by religious bodies. A writer in a well-known Boston paper recently criticized Father Brosnahan's argument with this worn-out subterfuge. One would think that the necessity of definite and fixed principles in the matter of religious teaching ought to be recognized by a writer presuming to instruct us editorially. "Unsectarian religion"—it is the term used by those who find religious teaching possible in the Carnegie colleges—has about the same significance to the logical mind as has the term "squared circle" to the mathematician.

Nay, even were one to concede the feasibility of religious training on some broad interdenominational lines common to all beliefs, a concession no strict religionist will ever admit, one would still question the fairness of Mr. Carnegie's provisions for the distribution of his fund, and would still hold the Foundation to be hostile to

Christian schools. As interpreted by his own administrators, these provisions explicitly affirm schools controlled by religious bodies to be incapable of genuine and broad scholarship simply because of their affiliation, however tenuous, with these bodies. To quote again the strong plea made by Doctor Poteat for a broader Christian spirit in colleges and universities: "I deny the right of Mr. Carnegie to impugn the competence in the field of education of my college or of any other sectarian institution."

* * *

It is a misfortune that Mr. Carnegie was not generous enough in planning his endowment to forget for the nonce the tendency of wealthy men to make gifts under stipulations that unreasonably limit their field of usefulness. Had he conceived his benefaction so as to create a fund to aid the whole body of teachers in the country, he would have done a commendable service to the community. As it is, the Foundation, under its administrators' provisions, as now insisted upon, is and can be a benefit only to certain schools which, no matter what their defenders may claim, exercise a distinctly hostile influence toward religion in education.

Unhappily, the non-religious school is an "institution" among us, and its cause is upheld by many others besides Mr. Carnegie. "Yet," as the New York Press said recently, commenting editorially on a form of rowdism which has been attracting special attention from the city magistrates, "the question remains: What is there wrong in our system of religious and ethical education that it should turn out each year so large a new crop of young men and women who are so little impressed with the rights of others, and of the limitations of their own rights as to freedom of conduct? That an altogether too large a proportion of our growing boys and girls are in such a state of ignorance the police court records bear painful witness." The non-sectarian system of education, which Mr. Carnegie's fund recognizes as the last word in broad, liberal training, is working out its results with us more slowly, perhaps, than among the more mercurial French, but it is certain to achieve its fated end quite as effectually here as there.

Prejudice, which in former days frequently blinded non-Catholics to the reason and motive impelling Catholics to establish their own educational system in America, seems to be disappearing among us. Evidence of this is the frequent and cordial word of praise spoken by prominent leaders of Protestantism regarding the educational work done by Catholics. Indeed, instances of such appreciation are becoming so common as to excite no surprise. Just recently a Lutheran preacher of Fort Wayne, Indiana, commented on one phase of Catholic success and drew from it a lesson, which he urged his coreligionists to profit by. Speaking of the language difficulty, common enough in our cosmopolitan land, he said:

"In Cleveland, as in many other cities, there are many immigrants among the Roman Catholics. They come from many lands. But, notwithstanding the diversity of tongues, there is uniformity in their churches and schools. You will find the Irish Church of St. Patrick, and beside it a flourishing school. You will find the German church, the Polish church, the Bohemian church, and beside each of them a school. There is uniformity in all these schools, and they constitute a bulwark of the Church. The Roman Church says: 'Give us a child until it is twelve years old and it will be a Catholic for life.' The effectiveness and success of the Catholic Church in its educational system has often impressed me. I realize the true Christian spirit that actuates the Papal Church, and I want to impress upon you to-day the fact that the Catholic Church finds diversity of languages no barrier in its schools."

M. J. O'C.

The Religious Education Association has degenerated in its magazine to publishing articles by Percival Chubb in favor of Mr. Adler's Ethical Culture School. When inquiry was made of the secretary if this was religious education, he replied that they were not responsible for all the views in the magazine, but would publish anything that would stimulate moral thought. This declaration will undoubtedly give a radical stamp to the Association and entail for it the loss of its conservative and uncompromising members. Mr. Bird S. Coler, one of its vice-presidents, has sent in his resignation, and is now planning a new organization that will hew only in one line and stimulate nothing that does not mean authoritative religious teaching. It will be a society having for its object the promotion and defense of church schools. It will aim at checking the spread of Socialistic materialism in the primary schools of America, and promoting the teaching of morals with the living authority of God behind them as an offset to the subsidization of the higher institutions of learning in the interest of affirmative Agnosticism. The following is a rough sketch of the proposed organization:

OBJECT.

The definite aim of the Society shall be the impressing upon the mind of our people of the moral danger that threatens the nation from the Godless School and the employment of public opinion as a motive force in the direction of providing a system of distribution of public funds for educational work which will be absolutely just and shall do away with the un-American discrimination against churches and religious institutions. For the execution of this program the Society shall have the power to publish, print, sell and otherwise distribute literature bearing upon the subject; the power to receive gifts and legacies, and to apply such, in the discretion of the directors of the Society, to work in consonance with the Society's object as herein outlined. It shall also have power to promote and hold public meetings, and to conduct lectures.

ORGANIZATION.

All persons believing in God shall be eligible to membership in the Society, but they shall, before admission, assent to the following explicit declaration:

We agree that our work and such money as we may contribute to the Society shall go to the object as outlined above, and that no system of teaching shall be considered as moral teaching which is not founded upon the tenets of authorized religion.

The members shall annually elect a Board of Five Directors, which may be enlarged by vote of the directors at any time hereafter, and such directors, at the meeting following their election, shall elect the following officers: a president, six vice-presidents, a secretary, a treasurer. The president, when elected, shall appoint an editor and manager, whose duty it shall be to take charge of the Society's offices, and have general supervision over the distribution of literature, the promotion of meetings, the arranging for lectures, and such other work as the Board of Directors shall, from time to time, prescribe. The editor and manager shall receive such compensation as the Board of Directors shall determine.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Those who have not yet peeped into the historical works published recently by The America Press, under the title of "Pioneer Priests of North America," may gather from the unqualified praise and enthusiasm with which these excursions into the field of aboriginal American history have been received that American Catholics have at last something to which they can point with becoming satisfaction and laudable pride. It would be a reproach if the secular press should be the first to call the attention of Catholics to a work which seems destined to mark the beginning of a new era in the production of historical works of standard value. The following critique, which we have taken the liberty to abridge, of Father Campbell's latest volume, "Among the Algonquins," appeared in the New York Evening Sun of July 1st, under the appropriate title of

"A TRUE ROMANCE":

It is not given to every historian to make his chronicle readable. Facts unadorned and constrained within the sober limits of actual events, are apt to prove a trifle dry. And unless the author is able to infuse into his work that touch of life without which it is but an ordered succession of names and dates, his book is predestined to know the reference shelf more intimately than the library table. Without the attractive garb of an entertaining style the naked truth is usually hurried to the darkness and dust of scholarly oblivion.

To say, therefore, that a work, historical in scope, accurate in detail and instructive in its information, is at the same time interesting and even fascinating, is to pay no small tribute to the achievement of its author. But the work before us, "Among the Algonquins," by the Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J. (The America Press), is well worthy of this praise.

Constituting the third volume of the series on "Pioneer Priests of North America," it takes up the lives and labors of the first missionaries to the Indian nation, which extended from the St. Lawrence to Hudson Bay and from the Mississippi to the Atlantic. But the story is not alone one of evangelization. It is a chapter in the birth of a continent, and as such is tense with the thrill of primeval battle with the elements and of herculean fortitude in the face of toil and danger and suffering.

And into this warp of adventure are woven the raids of Iberville, the discovery of the Mississippi and the struggle between two great Powers for dominion over the State of Maine.

Yet the very simplicity of the style makes the effect infinitely more impressive than if a dozen pages were used in place of one. The author has realized that he is dealing in events that are larger and stronger than any language, and it is to this fact, in largest measure, that his book owes its unquestioned power.

In quick succession come the stories of Druillettes, Albanel, Allouez, Marquette, Maret, Laure, Aulneau and Râle. And though no two are alike, there is in all the same undercurrent of heroic service to a mighty labor. There is in all the same background of ice and snow, flood and famine, want and toil, disease and death. In all is found the same homily of privations gladly borne, dangers calmly faced, suffering patiently endured, in order that these indomitable souls might advance the banner of their faith.

Quite apart from its value as a history of early North American events, there is a vast fund of ethnological information in Father Campbell's book. Here and there throughout its pages are scattered observations on the habits and character of the Algonquins which should form a valuable addition to this branch of knowledge.

One quotation from a letter of John Aulneau on the religious beliefs of the Kristinaux is particularly interesting:

"Everywhere on these (supernatural) plains you see kettles swung over the fire and dances and games. That is their paradise. But before reaching it there is an extremely dangerous place, a wide ditch which the souls have to cross. On one side of it, there is a stretch of muddy water, offensive to the smell, and covered with scum; then there is a pit filled with fire which rises in fierce tongues of flame. The only means of crossing is a pine tree, the ends of which rest on either bank. Its bark is ever freshly moistened and besmeared with a substance which makes it slippery as ice. If the souls who wish to cross to the enchanting hunting plains have the misfortune to fall at this dangerous passage, there is no help left; they are doomed forever to drink of the foul stagnant water or to burn in the flames."

We cannot close our consideration of the book without yielding to the temptation of quoting again. To illustrate the character of those among whom the Jesuit missionaries labored, Father Campbell has included the story of one Indian family, which in its way is little else than epic:

"An Indian at the point of death had been baptized but recovered. Unfortunately, he was madly in love with a squaw, and without waiting to marry her in Christian fashion simply took her off to his cabin. It happened that he and his family went off to hunt, and every one of them perished except the man and two of his children, who made their way back to Three Rivers. He was exhausted and at the point of death, and naturally might have expected some help from his sister, who lived there with a sick boy. But, not wanting to be troubled with the care of another invalid, she brained her brother in the presence of his two sick and starving children, a boy and a girl, and then, heedless of their clamors for food, she put her own hopeful in a canoe and started down the river to Quebec. The children followed her all day along the shore, begging to be taken on board. At nightfall the fierce hag beached the canoe and told the boy: 'I can't carry both of you with me; kill your sister and I will take you.' Horrible to relate, the young brute seized a string and tied it around the neck of the girl. Then, holding one end with his foot, he choked her to death.

"Did she struggle with you?" asked the priest, when the story was told at Quebec.

"No; she did not even try to run away, but only looked at me and let me do it."

Just that! She only looked at him.

Altogether it is a splendid volume that Father Campbell has produced. To those of the same faith as the pioneer priests whose lives it relates, it should prove no less edifying than absorbing. But even to those of other persuasion, "Among the Algonquins" offers an opportunity for serious and interesting reading, where solid historical worth is matched by charm of style and vigor of conception.

The following letter was addressed by the Holy Father to Rev. Dr. Charles Granman, member of the Biblical Commission, in recognition of the great zeal displayed by him for the welfare of the South American College in Rome, and for the preparation therein of worthy priests for the churches of America:—

Beloved Son, health and Apostolic Benediction.

We take the occasion of writing to you from that which offers you the exercise of the highest charity, out of the zeal which We have for Latin America, for her Church, and for the life which Christ our Lord gave to mankind and which We desire men to possess, and to possess even more abundantly. But as often as We consider the condition of that Church, We recall the sorrowful words of the Gospel, "The harvest indeed is great, but the laborers are few." In spirit We see there many and vast lands, as yet unbroken, for the sowing of the seed of Christian wisdom; there, too, We see an immense multitude calling for Apostolic men to come in greater numbers and with better preparation for the furtherance of Catholic interests.

To these causes of Our solicitude another care is now added, one that has its origin in that very source whence rightfully should come the choicest fruit. We mean the Roman College of Latin America. The financial condition of this College has become so straitened that necessity requires the lessening of its student body, and that at a time (We speak to one who knows) when the situation in the dioceses of South America demands, rather, an increase in the number of students.

Hence you will rightly understand, Beloved Son, with what gratitude We regarded the announcement that you would undertake to relieve the pressing domestic difficulties of the College by enlisting at large the generosity of the Catholics of the United States of America. The plan is one full of charity and one that We declare must be attributed to the favor of a Merciful God; since there appears no hope of any help to come from the Catholics of Latin America; because their resources, which scarcely suffice for the recently created dioceses, are employed in supporting their domestic institutions; and at the same time the slender means of the Apostolic See forbids Us, though willing and eager, from listening to the promptings of Our Paternal Heart.

Your remarkable zeal and the favorable disposition of the Catholics of North America quicken in Us a joyous expectation. For if the Church of South America demands now a more effective force in her priests, and priests that shall excel in virtue and in learning, assuredly it is fitting that she should look for them to this See of Rome, the centre of the whole Catholic Church and the teacher of truth, in whose sacred schools and camps the youthful clergy, at the tombs of the Apostles and almost under Our very eyes, will be formed, as it were, into a new soldiery for the good fight of faith and for every virtue.

Therefore, "earnestly asking the Lord of the harvest to send laborers into His harvest," We congratulate you, Beloved Son, for undertaking a cause upon which depends, in greatest measure, the strength and increase of Christianity among neighboring peoples. We also assure those in whom you will find assistance, that their beneficence could not be bestowed better, since it is employed in aiding and in widening the influence of a College which experience has approved and still approves as the home of perfect ecclesiastical discipline.

And may the Apostolic Benediction, which We most lovingly, in the Lord, impart to you, Beloved Son, be an earnest of Divine favor and a testimony of Our Benevolence.

Given at Rome, at St. Peter's, the fifth day of April, nineteen hundred and eleven, in the eighth year of Our Pontificate.

SOCIOLOGY

We discussed lately the shark of the sea and the loan shark. The former is a creature of God and glorifies its Creator by exercising the functions of its nature. Man knows but little of the mysteries of the ocean and of what may be the place of the shark in the economy of the deep. Naturalists call it the scavenger of the sea, but other fishes perform that office too. We do know, however, that its devouring of man is purely accidental, and that, had it no other food, it would soon become extinct. Very different is the loan shark. As such he is not God's creature, neither has he any place in the beneficent plan of society, the work of nature. He devours men, not by accident, but as his ordinary food, and grows fat and multiplies by his feeding. He exists, nevertheless, because there is a demand for him. If men did not want to borrow, he would not be here to lend. Moreover, if they did not wish to borrow in a peculiar way, in secret, without what is known in regular business as security, i. e., a lien upon property, or a responsible guarantor, he would not be on hand to lend in that peculiar way. If, then, he is to become extinct, he must be deprived of his prey; and that this may be done, it is necessary to know the class of borrowers on whom he feeds.

In the first place we may mention honorable, upright men upon whom calamity has fallen. We mention them first to get them out of the way; for they bear to the loan shark the same relation that human beings do to the shark of the sea. They fall into his jaws, but only accidentally: they are not his regular food. The reason is clear. Calamity means generally loss of fortune, sickness or hard times, both of which result in loss of regular employment, or open embarrassments in business; and each of these takes its victim out of the category of the loan shark's ordinary prey, men who borrow secretly on their personal note, whose fear of discovery, which would deprive them of their otherwise assured position, is the lender's security, not so much for his principal as for a long-continued payment of usury, which soon amounts to far more than the sum lent.

Now, the ordinary prey borrow secretly because their embarrassments are secret; and these must be secret because, as a general rule, there is something disgraceful about them. The origins of disgraceful embarrassments are commonly betting, gambling, speculating in stocks, etc., and extravagant and immoral living, and the introduction to the loan shark too often follows the appropriation of another's money, by which one hoped to get out of his difficulties and make everything straight. Those four evils enter integrally into the life of our modern cities; they are the forms under which, for a large number of men, old as well as young, appear the concupiscence of the flesh, the concupiscence of the eyes and the pride of life, the three elements that make up the world. No individual is constrained to be a betting man, a gambler, a bucket-shop operator, or a prodigal, but so long as city life is what it is to-day, these four will abound, not only following their passions openly, but secretly also among respectable salaried and professional men; and if they abound, the loan shark will not be absent. There is this great advantage in making his existence difficult, that it would hasten the exposure of the double lives of men apparently respectable; and their disgrace might deter others from following their evil courses. But a radical reform calls for the elimination of the causes that produce him.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

His Holiness, Pius X, in an autograph letter to the Apostolic Delegate, Mgr. Falconio, applauds the lead taken by the United States in the world-wide campaign for international peace. A copy of the letter was sent to the White House. The letter follows:—

To Our Venerable Brother, Diomede, Titular Archbishop of Larissa, Apostolic Delegate to the United States of America.

Venerable Brother: Health and apostolic benediction. We are happy to learn from you that in the United States of America, under the leadership of men enjoying the highest authority with the people, the more judicious members of the community are fervently desirous of maintaining the advantages of international peace. To compose differences, to restrain the outbreak of hostilities, to prevent the dangers of war, to remove even the anxieties of so-called armed peace is, indeed, most praiseworthy, and any effort in this cause, even although it may not immediately or wholly accomplish its purpose, manifests, nevertheless, a zeal which cannot but redound to the credit of its authors and be of benefit to the States.

This is especially true at the present day, when vast armies, instrumentalities most destructive to human life, and the advanced state of military science portend wars which must be a source of fear even to the most powerful rulers.

Wherefore, We most heartily commend the work already begun, which should be approved by all good men and especially by Us, holding, as We do, the supreme pontificate of the Church and representing Him who is both the God and the Prince of Peace; and We most gladly lend the weight of our authority to those who are striving to realize this most beneficent purpose.

For We do not doubt that the same distinguished men who possess so much ability and such wisdom in affairs of state will construct in behalf of a struggling age a royal road for the nations leading to peace and conciliation in accordance with the laws of justice and charity, which should be sacredly observed by all. For, inasmuch as peace consists in order, who will vainly think that it can be established unless he strives with all the force within him that due respect be everywhere given to those virtues which are the principles of order and its firmest foundation?

As for the remaining aspects of the matter, We recall to mind the example of so many of our illustrious predecessors, who, when the condition of the times permitted, rendered, in this very matter also, the most signal service to the cause of humanity and to the stability of governments; but since the present age allows Us to aid in this cause only by pious prayers to God, We therefore most earnestly pray God, who knows the hearts of men and inclines them as He wills, that He may be gracious to those who are furthering peace among the peoples, and may grant to the nations which, with united purposes, are laboring to this end, that the destruction of war and its disasters being averted, they may at length find repose in the beauty of peace.

As a pledge of divine favor and a proof of our benevolence, We most lovingly grant you, venerable brother, the apostolic benediction.

Given at Rome, at St. Peter's, the eleventh day of June, 1911, and the eighth year of our Pontificate.

PIUS X.

A public statement has been made by the Right Rev. Louis S. Walsh, D.D., Bishop of Portland, Me., explaining the interdict issued against six laymen of the Portland diocese who introduced a bill in the Maine Legislature against the Bishop's control of church property as a corporation sole.

On June 23, 1911, feast of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, the Rev. Fabián Ruano celebrated his first holy Mass in the convent of the barefooted Franciscan nuns, Madrid. After a professorship of many years in the Institute of Salamanca, the incumbent became a widower only a few months ago. He then determined to enter the sacred ministry, for which he was already well qualified by his extensive studies. At his first Mass, one of his sons, the Rev. Juan Ruano y Corbo, S.J., officiated as assistant priest, and a little granddaughter of the celebrant made her first holy Communion. The choice of chapel was determined by the fact that the newly ordained priest had a daughter among the religious. Rev. Father Ruano was ordained at the age of sixty-four.

On the occasion of the centennial celebration of the Seminary of St. Hyacinth the "old boys" presented to their Alma Mater the handsome gift of $80,000. The money will be spent in enlarging the physical cabinet, and in making improvements in various departments of the Seminary according to the judgment of the authorities of the institution.

The Right Rev. Thomas J. Daly, Vicar-General of the Archdiocese of Halifax, celebrated the golden jubilee of his ordination on July 9. Mgr. Daly was born in Halifax, in February, 1839, and was raised to the priesthood July 9, 1861. After his ordination he was appointed to a parish at Chezzetcook, at the same time acting as secretary to his Grace Archbishop Connolly. On the death of the Archbishop, Mgr. Daly took charge of the parish at Windsor for several years, till he was appointed by the late Archbishop O'Brien Vicar-General, with the additional pastorate of St. Joseph's parish, where he still continues his zealous labors. The non-Catholic members of the community vied with their fellow-Catholic citizens in honoring the worthy priest.

Every Saturday morning the Aloysius Truth Society, of Washington, D. C., publishes, in a local daily paper, a column of Catholic notes and comments, and at various intervals prepares the publication of important Catholic items in the Sunday press. Its activities are extending in many directions. As a result of a recent meeting, the work of the Society is now divided among four committees:

The press committee, whose duties are to use every available means to refute such published articles as attack the true Faith or are subversive of Christian morality, and to publish in the public press important and instructive Catholic news.

The library committee, which seeks to stimulate a desire for higher education among the Catholic laity by printing and distributing lists of Catholic books, and otherwise encouraging the circulation and reading of standard Catholic literature.

The social studies committee, whose work is to assist in the dissemination of Catholic truth by means of lectures and conferences on social, moral and dogmatic subjects of special interest, and particularly by fostering the practice of yearly retreats among the laity of all classes.

The law committee, which aims to aid the society by its legal knowledge; to urge the strict enforcement of existing laws for the safeguarding of public morals, and, when necessary, to advocate new and more efficient civil legislation.

The President of the A. T. Society is the Rev. Augustus J. Duarte, S.J., of St. Aloysius' Church, Washington.

The Bureau of Mines, in a brochure entitled "The Escape of Gas from Coal", gives the following interesting results of its investigation on American coals. Inflammable gas is not only liberated while they are being broken down in mining, but also for a considerable period thereafter. The escape of gas is at first quite rapid, but the rate diminishes, tending towards a final cessation in from 3 to 18 minutes. With the volume of the small lumps of coal taken as a unit of measurement, about $\frac{1}{4}$ volume of methane escapes during the crushing, and from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ volumes on continued exposure to the air. The final loss consequent to this loss of gas is trifling, but the danger of accumulation of explosive gas from this source in mines and coal bunkers warrants its being taken into account in the ventilation of mines and in the storage of coal.

A recent boring made in the village of Czuchow, in Silesia, to a depth of 7,348 feet, has permitted of new earth-temperature determinations. Experiments up to date show that an increase of one degree Fahrenheit is had for every 58 feet of descent.

The latest investigation regarding the movement of soil material may be embodied in the following items:—The wind plays no minor rôle and is not the least of the great dynamic agents now recognized as affecting the soil. The older static conceptions are now untenable. In soil removal the wind is one of several agents (of which running water is probably the chief) which, by removing weathered soil material from the land surface into the sea, progressively expose the rocks beneath to the process of decay, enabling the maintenance of that balance upon which depends the permanence of the soil layer. Among these agents the wind is greatest only in areas of considerable aridity, and even there it is by no means the sole active factor. From our present viewpoint, the second or mixing action is of far greater and more general importance. The carrying of soil material from place to place across the land surface makes possible the existence in any particular soil of minerals not present in its parent rocks, and is one cause of the well-known and remarkable constancy with which the useful minerals occur in the soils of the world. In this action the wind shows its greatest effectiveness. As a mixer of soils already formed it yields to none. Nor is this action, like the former, confined to arid lands. Wind action, both in removal and transfer, must be regarded as an important item in the newly emphasized dynamic explanations of the soil and its fertility. (Bureau of Soils, Bulletin No. 68.)

OBITUARY

The death is announced of Mother M. Rose Whitty, at Port Elizabeth, South Africa, on May 4. Mother Rose was born in Dublin, Ireland, November 24, 1831, and so at the time of her death was in her eightieth year. Less than a year ago she celebrated her diamond jubilee, the sixtieth anniversary of her religious profession, and received on that occasion a special blessing from the Holy Father. She was the foundress of the Dominican convent in Port Elizabeth, and was its prioress for twenty-five years. Altogether her career was a remarkable one, as well in length as in labors, and should draw attention to the heroic and unremitting labors of the Sisterhoods in behalf of education in that far-off region.

The Rev. Gabriel A. Healy, Pastor for forty-one years of St. Bernard's Church, New York City, died in the rectory, on July 3. Father Healy was a priest for fifty-one years. As a boy he attended the schools of the Christian Brothers, and later the College of St. Francis Xavier, where he received the degree of A.B. in 1861. In the fall of the same year he presented himself as a candidate for the priesthood and was sent for his theological studies to the Grand Seminary in Montreal. At the end of his four years' course he was ordained in old St. Patrick's Cathedral, by Bishop James Roosevelt Bailey of Newark, afterwards Archbishop of Baltimore. Father Healy founded the parish and built the church over which he presided for so many years. His name will recall the memory of an exemplary priest and one who was known and loved by the Catholics of Manhattan.

Right Rev. Monsignor Dennis J. Flynn, LL.D., President Emeritus of Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md., and a well-known Catholic educator, died, July 7, at the institution of which he was for many years the head. Dr. Flynn had been ailing for the past eighteen months. He was born at Louisville, Ky., September 17, 1856, and after the usual preparatory studies in his native city, he entered Mount St. Mary's in 1877. Receiving his A.B. degree in 1880, and his A.M. in 1882, Monsignor Flynn was ordained priest in 1883. His first charge led him to Wilmington, Delaware, where his ministerial work during sixteen years was singularly successful. His appointment to Mount St. Mary's faculty dates from February, 1899. In June, 1904, Monsignor Flynn was elected to the important posts of Vice-President and Treasurer, and in June, 1905, he was further honored by being chosen President of that venerable institution. This charge he filled until failing health obliged him to retire as President Emeritus eighteen months ago.

Dr. Flynn received the honorary degree of LL.D. from his Alma Mater in 1897, and from Georgetown University in 1906. During the ceremony attending the dedication of the new chapel, attached to Mount St. Mary's College, on October 12 last, Cardinal Gibbons announced that Dr. Flynn had been created domestic prelate by Pope Pius X. The honor was conferred upon him at the special request of the Cardinal.

CHRONICLE

Senate's Closing Program.—The end of the present special session of Congress has come definitely into sight through the action of the Senate in fixing a time for voting on the five most important measures pending in that body. The vote on the reciprocity bill will be taken on Saturday, July 22; on the wool bill, passed by the House, on Thursday, July 27; on the Farmers' Free List, on Tuesday, August 1; on the reapportionment bill, on Thursday, August 3, and on the House joint resolution providing for the approval of the constitutions of New Mexico and Arizona, on Monday, August 7. With these measures disposed of adjournment may be expected shortly thereafter. President Taft, when informed of the Senate's program, expressed his gratification, particularly over the precedence given to the reciprocity bill.

Foreign Commerce Records.—Figures made public on July 15 by the Bureau of Statistics for the fiscal year which ended on June 30 show that the business transacted by the United States amounted to more than $3,500,000,000. This exceeds the record year of 1907 by more than $263,000,000. The country's exports for the first time exceeded $2,000,000,000, while the imports were second only to last year's. The year ended with a trade balance of more than $520,000,000 in favor of Americans. This is $332,000,000 more than last year's business, but was exceeded in the record year of 1908 and the years 1901, 1900 and 1899. Fifty per cent. of the imports entered free of duty, being a greater amount than at any time in history, except in 1892-'93-'94, when sugar was imported free under the McKinley tariff law. The total value of merchandise entering free, however, was larger than in any year heretofore.

Dr. Wiley's Case.—Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, pure food expert and Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, and one of the most widely-known officials in the government service, has been condemned by a committee on personnel of the Department of Agriculture, with a recommendation to President Taft that he "be permitted to resign." Attorney-General Wickersham in submitting the case to the President recommends approval of the committee's action. The charge against Dr. Wiley is that he allowed two of his subordinates to fix a higher rate of compensation for the services of an expert pharmacologist than is warranted by law. The amount involved is only $1,600, the expert's salary for one year. Dr. Wiley was so successful in his crusade against impure foods and fraudulent labelling that many look with suspicion on the request for his resignation, and in view of the army of enemies he has made are convinced that a technical violation is not the full and complete reason for the stand taken against him. The President has the matter under advisement, but it is unlikely that he will take any action.

Suit Against Magazine Trust.—The Government, through District-Attorney Wise, has brought a civil anti-trust suit against the Periodical Clearing House, charging unlawful combination and conspiracy to restrain interstate trade and foreign commerce in magazines and other periodicals. The Government's suit is the result of a six months' investigation. It has been represented to the Department of Justice that the defendant association practically controls distribution of magazines and other periodicals, and that dealers who have not charged the prices prescribed by the Clearing House have been discriminated against. Mr. Houston, President of the Clearing House, declares that the association has "never sought to increase prices, but has pursued the directly opposite policy of trying to avoid reductions from the regular subscription price to the point of demoralization."

New York Votes United States Income Tax.—Following the action of the State Senate, the New York Assembly passed the proposed income tax amendment by a vote of 91 to 42. This brings up the number of ratifying states to thirty-one, within four of the number of assents necessary. Fifteen states have either defeated the amendment in one or both houses, or have adjourned without taking action, or having indorsed the measure in one branch, have adjourned with the other branch unrecorded in the matter. This accounts for all forty-six states to date. Eliminating Arkansas, whose Governor has raised a nice constitutional question by vetoing the indorsement of the amendment by both branches of the State's Legislature, only thirty votes in favor of the amendment remain. Further progress must await the convening of new legislatures.

Japanese in the Northwest.—The Japanese have secured possession of more than eighty-thousand acres of the richest land in the White River Valley, lying between Seattle and Tacoma, in the State of Washington. They have subdivided the land into five and ten acre ranches, and grow on it vegetables and fruit for the markets. The result has been to drive out the few white farmers who were there, and to make this great tract practically Japanese territory, where a white face is not seen nor the English language spoken.

Naval Base at Pearl Harbor.—The great drydock at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, is nearing completion. It will be 831 feet long, 110 feet wide and 34 feet deep, and capable of accommodating any battleship now building or likely to be built in the near future. The total cost of the naval base at Pearl Harbor will approximate $11,000,000, the greater part of which will be expended on the repair shops. Provision is also being made for marine barracks, a naval hospital and a coaling plant.

Disastrous Railway Wreck.—The Federal Express, one of the New Haven Railroad's fastest trains, jumped the tracks and tumbled down a twenty-foot embankment at Bridgeport, Conn. Fourteen persons, including the engineer, were killed in the wreck and forty-eight passengers more or less seriously injured. The train was running at sixty miles an hour over a "crossover switch," where the rules call for a speed of not more than fifteen miles an hour.

Mexico.—President de la Barra has paid short official visits to Veracruz and to his native city Querétaro. While on the way to the latter place, he and his suite heard Mass on Sunday in the town of San Juan del Rio. During the administration of former President Diaz, the only time that he appeared officially at Mass was at a requiem celebrated for Señor Pedro Montt, the deceased President of Chile.—Francisco I. Madero has retired to a country house, leaving the management of political affairs in the hands of a committee of five.—Forces hostile to the present régime are still under arms in six different states, including San Luis Potosí on the north and Chiapas in the extreme south. Several encounters have taken place, especially in Puebla, where there was a pitched battle, with considerable loss of life. The situation is further complicated by many strikes in all branches of industry. The state of mind of many of the lower class is typified by the action of a woman in Oaxaca, who went to a dentist and directed him to treat her teeth for nothing. She gave as a reason for her demand that, as the revolution had been undertaken for "freedom" and had been successful, everything, including dentistry, ought to be "free."—The government is face to face with a serious difficulty in rewarding and pensioning the revolutionary army, for many patriots took up arms and assumed military titles, including that of general, only after the Diaz administration had begun peace negotiations with the Maderists.

Canada.—Sir Frederick Borden, Minister of Militia, has been appointed High Commissioner in England, to succeed Lord Strathcona.—A general election in the autumn on the Reciprocity Agreement seems to be certain.—Great forest fires in the Porcupine District of Northern Ontario have destroyed much property and, it is believed, hundreds of lives.—The infant mortality in Montreal during the protracted hot weather has been very great.—The number of hands required for the harvest in the prairie provinces is so large that men are being sent, for the first time, from the Pacific Coast.—Commander Stewart of the Rainbow, the Canadian cruiser in the Pacific, has resigned. Opponents of the Government naval policy say he is dissatisfied with the conditions of his ship. There have been reports of discontent in its crew. The authorities in Ottawa say that he is leaving because his wife does not like living in Esquimalt.

Great Britain.—The Liberals retain the seat of West Ham and the Unionists that of Hull, both vacant by the unseating of members under the Corrupt Practices Act. The Protestant Alliance used against Baron de Forest, the successful candidate at West Ham, the fact that he is a Catholic. His majority, nevertheless, was greater than that of the general election. Colonel Mark Sykes, who is also a Catholic, won at Hull with an increased majority. The Liberals also retain the Tradeston Division of Glasgow. The poll was small.—Lloyds quotes 25 per cent. to insure against a general election before the end of the year and business is being done, and a large insurance was taken out while the rate was only 20 per cent.—Newton, the attorney reported by the Bar Association, has been let off rather lightly with one year's suspension and payment of costs. In answering the court's decision the Judge spoke very severely of the part played by the newspapers. One of these was John Bull, the editor of which almost lives in the courts. He has just been condemned in damages of £50,000 for inveigling an old gentleman into bubble companies.—The Crystal Palace, Sydenham, is to be sold by auction to satisfy mortgages. It is the old Great Exhibition building of 1851, and a movement is on foot to acquire it as a national memorial.—Sir Eldon Gorst, late British Agent in Egypt, is dead. He succeeded Lord Cromer, and the decline in British authority in Egypt is attributed to him. Lord Kitchener has been appointed to succeed him and to restore the lost prestige.

Ireland.—The King and Queen visited Maynooth College, July 9, and were received by Cardinal Logue, Archbishop Walsh and other prelates. His Majesty's reply to the President's welcome was cordial and appropriate. Recalling King Edward's friendship for Ireland, he said: "It is my desire to follow in my father's footsteps, and to do everything that lies in my power to promote the happiness and general well-being of the Irish people." In his final message of acknowledgement of the hearty reception he had received in Ireland he wished "increased prosperity for your ancient capital and contentment and happiness for our Irish people," and promised to return at an early date. This is construed by some as an allusion to the inauguration of a Parliament in Dublin, especially as the Colonial Premiers, then visiting Dublin, had been talking freely of Home Rule. At a dinner given them by University College, Sir J. Molteno, of South Africa, attributed his country's prosperity to the free institutions which Ireland's sympathy had helped to win, and he trusted Ireland would be soon possessed of similar institutions. Mr. Oliver, alluding to Ireland's fitness for self-government, said that Irishmen in all parts of the Dominions had become Governors, Premiers, Judges, and attained high position in every department of public life. Mr. Warburton, of Canada, expected that Ireland, when mistress of her own educational system, would send forth learning to the world as of old; and Mr. Botha hoped to see scholars flocking to her again and, from within and without the Empire, completing their education in Ireland. Lord Aberdeen said the Cinderella of the Empire was increasingly assuming the desirable garments which, in the fable, she eventually acquired.—The main amendment of the Lords to the Parliament Bill excluded Home Rule from its scope, but the tone of the debate showed that the Opposition had slight confidence of success. Lord Londonderry, one of the leaders in the Upper House, warned a great meeting of Belfast Orangemen, July 12, that "Home Rule was not to be defeated without the support of the people of Great Britain, and they would lose that support if they indulged in riot and bloodshed. They must oppose Home Rule only by legitimate means, obey the law and exercise self-restraint." Last year the talk was of "100,000 rifles" and revolt.—At the opening of the Summer Assizes in Leitrim, the judge was presented with white gloves, as there was no criminal business. Of the other assizes held thus far, there was only one case in Longford, and two each in Clare, Wexford and Louth. None was of a serious character.—By a friendly arrangement, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Muldoon and Captain Donelan have been elected unopposed for North-East Cork, East Cork and Wicklow, respectively.

France.—In spite of the crushing majority in favor of Proportional Representation, the Cabinet itself, according to La Croix, is thus divided. For it: Caillaux, Delcassé, de Selves, Cruppi, Lebrun, Chaumet, Steeg and Messimy. Against it: Augagneur, Couyba, René Renoult, Dujardin-Beaumetz and Malvy. It is not yet determined how the problem of proportion is to be solved.—Outsiders have long been under the impression that there were no religious institutions left in France to be suppressed. On the contrary, during the short and inglorious reign of Monis he suppressed 499. Thus since July 7, 1904, 4,919 institutions have passed out of existence.—The cable of July 13 announced considerable excitement about the landing at Larache of 500 additional Spanish troops and six guns. The actions of the French and Spanish officers threaten serious trouble. French reinforcements are also arriving.—Parliament has adjourned and the Ministry of Caillaux is secure until October. Until then it will be occupied in settling the Morocco difficulty.—It took eight months to arrange the budget, which should have been disposed of at the end of last year. When it was at last taken up it was hurried through with alarming expedition.—On July 15 there was a celebration at St. Dié to commemorate the naming of America, which it is said was first made in that town. A tablet was erected on the house where the Vosgian Gynnasium, composed of Waldsemuller, Ringman, the Luds, and Basin met on April 25, 1507, and printed the name "America" on the Cosmographie Introductio. Portraits of the great geographers were given to the American Ambassador Bacon, who promised that they would be presented to New York. The only Americans present were the Ambassador and his secretary.

Belgium.—Van der Velde, the Socialist leader, has announced as his program (1) State control of all education. (2) Legislative reform for workingmen. (3)

Universal suffrage. The Bien Public declares that there is nothing to be feared in this declaration of war, because (1) Belgium will fight for educational freedom; (2) The Liberals are not in favor of Labor Reforms; (3) There will be a sufficient number of Catholics to offset by the one man one vote program all losses following on the rescinding of plural voting. The Liberals themselves have a large contingent of plural voters.

Germany.—Ambassador Hill's letter of recall had not arrived in Berlin up to the time of his departure for Switzerland, but he was advised that the document was on the way, and he has arranged to revisit Germany to present his letter to the Emperor. The date will depend on the pleasure of His Majesty—probably Dr. Hill will have his farewell audience at the end of July, after the Emperor's cruise to the North Cape.—Four hundred middies from Annapolis, making a training cruise in the ships Iowa, Massachusetts and Indiana, were warmly welcomed during their stay at Kiel. An interesting feature of their visit was the journey to the capital for a three days' sojourn. The appearance of the young men made a lively impression upon Berliners.—The Emperor has decided that the statue of General von Steuben, the German hero of the American revolution which the United States Congress presented to Germany, shall be erected in Potsdam, in the garden of the local military governor. It has been found necessary to reconstruct the garden and to remove a handsome marble fountain in order to give the von Steuben memorial a place befitting its monumental character.—Reports emanating from Paris that the United States authorities, through diplomatic channels, had represented their displeasure over the quasi-intervention of Germany in the Morocco troubles, alleging that American interests in Panama would be endangered were Germany to secure a naval base in South Morocco, were promptly denied in Berlin.—The Prussian Government made known to the committee of the Landtag now engaged in the second consideration of the study program for the compulsory secondary schools, its purpose to drop the law establishing these schools in case the matter of an obligatory course of religious instruction was insisted upon. The section of the bill favoring the course in these new schools had passed in the first discussion. The action of the Government led the Conservatives, who had hitherto stood with the Centrists in defense of religious instruction, to change their votes, and the course will not be obligatory. Good Christians, non-Catholics and Catholics alike, are aroused over the triumph of the Liberals. With their recent success in forcing the passage of the act favoring cremation, this victory marks a decided advance towards the goal of their anti-Christian aspirations.

Austria-Hungary.—An agreeable surprise came to the people with the announcement that Emperor Francis Joseph will preside over the great army maneuvers now being planned for September and in which 90,000 troops of the different branches of the service will take part. Latest reports from specialists in attendance on His Majesty represent him as having fully recovered his strength, and the venerable monarch has caused to be clearly made evident his intention to attend fully to the duties that belong to him.—The new parliament, which began its sessions July 17, will speedily be called upon to act in a matter likely to create a sensation. The Socialists proclaim their purpose to impeach Baron von Bienenrth, the late Premier, and his associates in the cabinet recently resigned, because of his actions following the summary dissolution of the last parliament by imperial order. It will be remembered that von Bienenrth, appealing to the famous paragraph 14 of the constitution, which provides for needed administration in time of distress, took all necessary steps to govern the country without parliamentary sanction. His right to have done so is denied by the Socialists.—The Catholics of Hungary have not for years enjoyed the equitable treatment in religious legislation to which their prominence in the kingdom fairly entitles them. Despite their numbers, they have somehow been shoved far into the background when matters affecting Church and school came to the fore in parliament. They mean not to allow the unfairness to continue. Petitions are being actively prepared to present their just claims to the legislative body. A fair sample of the sentiment now strongly ruling among Catholics is that appearing in a speech made lately by Bishop Glattfelder at a reception of the Catholic Club of Temesvar. "We Catholics," said he, "demand to be considered a very important element in the life of the Hungarian people; the very right of numbers forbids that men attempt to push us aside and ignore our claims. We have no other purpose in view, however, in our present activity than the welfare of our people in a spiritual and moral sense. To this end we claim as a right that our people be considered in every relation that arises; we desire to quarrel with no one's just claims, and we propose to interfere with no one's rights, but we proclaim our fixed purpose to use every honorable and lawful means to conserve Christian and Catholic principle and influence in the kingdom."

Italy.—Giolitti's Electoral Reform Bill adds three and a half million voters to the register, bringing up the total to 7,701,000, or 82 per cent. of the male population over twenty-one years of age. This doubling the number of voters is due to the admission of illiterates over the age of thirty. Calculations as to the result of this increase upon the different parties are contradictory.

Turkey.—A state of anarchy prevails in the Muntifek district of Mesopotamia, where intermittent fighting among the tribes has been going on for six weeks. Four battalions are to be sent by the Sultan to Bagdad to quell the disorder.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

A Royal Recluse: Princess Clotilde

Just at the time when, in consequence of the weakness and folly of the republican government, certain French Monarchists are looking to Prince Victor Napoleon Bonaparte as the possible savior of their country, the Prince, whose marriage to Princess Clementina of Belgium recently brought him before the public, was watching by the deathbed of his mother, Princess Clotilde of Savoy, who breathed her last on June 25. The story of this royal lady is a pathetic one and, apart from the interest that is attached to her as the mother of the imperial candidate to the French throne, her personal character was one of rare beauty.

She was the daughter of Victor Emmanuel II, first King of Italy, and of Adelaide, Archduchess of Austria, and was born at Turin on March 2, 1843. Her mother died in 1855, leaving five young children, of whom Clotilde was the eldest, the others being Humbert, the future King of Italy; Amadeo, Duke of Aosta; Maria Pia, the queen dowager of Portugal, and a son who died in childhood. The Queen of Sardinia (Victor Emmanuel had not at that time laid violent hands on the independent states of Italy) was an exemplary wife and mother, and her orphan daughters were carefully educated by the attendants whom she had placed about them.

Never was a princess more ruthlessly sacrificed to political interests than the eldest princess of Savoy. When a mere child of sixteen, Clotilde was chosen to cement the alliance between France and Sardinia, and was promised in marriage to Prince Napoleon Jerome, nephew of Napoleon I and first cousin of Napoleon III, the reigning sovereign. Princess Clotilde was connected with the Bourbons, her very name was French and was given to her in memory of the French Princess Marie Clotilde, sister of Louis XVI, who married a King of Sardinia; but, allied as she was by close ties of blood to the Bourbons, she had nothing in common with the Bonapartes who occupied their place, and a more ill-assorted couple never existed than the middle-aged, violent, cynical and free-thinking Prince Napoleon and the daughter of the most ancient royal house in Europe, whose traditions and surroundings were strictly conservative and religious. Their marriage took place at Turin on January 30, 1859. The bride was sixteen and the bridegroom thirty-seven. He had a handsome presence and was intelligent and well informed, but neither his private life nor his freely expressed opinions on public matters made him estimable or lovable. His attitude with regard to his cousin, the Emperor, was one of constant opposition, and it was reported that his anti-religious views led him to take part in the banquets organized by a group of free thinkers on Good Friday. Under the Second Empire the French Government was officially Catholic, and Prince Napoleon's hostile and aggressive attitude was pronounced ill-bred, if not worse. Throughout France he was distinctly unpopular.

The young bride, married to this unsympathetic nephew of the great Napoleon, probably had few illusions as to the sum of happiness that awaited her in her new home. There are still some old men living who remember her when she took possession of the Palais Royal, Prince Napoleon's Paris house: a slight, pale girl, with fluffy, fair hair and bright eyes, not pretty, but singularly attractive. Her high breeding stood her in good stead in the somewhat parvenu atmosphere of the Court of the Tuileries; she had a royal dignity all her own, and her simplicity of heart was combined with much quiet firmness. From the first she ordered her life according to the principles in which she had been educated. An early riser, even at the Palais Royal, she gave much time to prayer and to works of mercy, but her piety, says M. Emile Ollivier, a former minister of Napoleon III, "never made her tiresome or intolerant. She believed that the most useful sermon was the practice of the virtues that are taught by faith." Her husband, although so widely apart from her, acknowledged her goodness. "Clotilde is a saint," he sometimes said; "if there were many like her, I believe that I myself should end by becoming devout."

When the disastrous war of 1870 brought terror and shame upon France, the Princess was in Paris. During that fatal month of August every day came the news of a fresh defeat, and the revolution that was to break out on the 4th of September was already distinctly perceptible; the infuriated and terrified people made the imperial government responsible for the reverses that so keenly wounded their patriotic pride.

Princess Clotilde was alone at the Palais Royal; her husband was with the army, her three children she sent to Switzerland, where Prince Napoleon had an estate; but she steadily refused to leave Paris while the Empress Eugénie remained at the Tuileries. There was not much personal sympathy between the two; it was Princess Clotilde's feeling of loyalty that chained her to the post of danger as long as there was a semblance of imperial government in Paris.

In vain her husband wrote imperious messages bidding her join her children at Prangins; in vain her father sent the Marquis Spinola to Paris to escort her; the Princess, so yielding in everyday life, was unbending in her decision to remain at the palace as long as the lonely woman at the Tuileries was the nominal ruler of France; she had shared the splendors of the Empire, and it went against her noble spirit to desert the Empress.

The letter that this young woman, a stranger in a strange land, wrote her father on August 25, 1870, has been quoted by the French papers. It is a right royal letter, worthy of the daughter of kings:

"I am a French woman," she says. "I cannot desert my country. When I married, although so young,

I knew what I was doing, and if I did it, it was because I wished to do so. The interests of my husband, of my children and of my country require that I should remain here. The honor of my name, your honor, my dear father, and that of my country also demand it. Nothing will make me fail in what I believe to be my duty. I do not care for the world or for wealth; I never have cared; but I hold to fulfilling my duty to the end. . . . You know that the house of Savoy and fear have never gone together, and you would not wish that they should meet in my person."

At last, when the Empress was driven from her palace by the mob, the Princess considered that she was free to follow, but how different was the departure of the two women!

The brilliant and beautiful sovereign, closely disguised, was only able to leave Paris owing to the assistance of her American dentist, Dr. Evans; her young cousin made her exit as a princess. In an open carriage, accompanied by her lady in waiting, she drove to the railway station in broad daylight. The excited people, awed by her courage and dignity, saluted her as she passed out of their sight, a truly royal and saintly figure.

Princess Clotilde lived for some years at Prangins, near Geneva, where she devoted herself to the education of her three children; then, when her husband was allowed to return to France, the difficulties of her married life were such that by mutual consent she retired to the Castle of Moncalieri, near Turin, with her young daughter. Here, in the home of her childhood, she spent nearly forty years. They were years of peace, largely marked by sorrow. Four times only did she emerge from her retreat, once in January, 1878, when she heard that her father lay dangerously ill in Rome. She had suffered cruelly from the spoliation of the Holy See by the house of Savoy, and the remembrance of her father's part in the matter prompted her to fly to his bedside. On the way she heard that he was dead, and she sadly returned to Moncalieri. In 1891 she again started for Rome, this time to visit her husband, who lay dying at the Hotel de Russie. Those who saw the Princess during those solemn days can never forget her sweetness, earnestness and gentle patience. What passed between her and Prince Napoleon none can tell, but Cardinal Mermillod, a frequent visitor to the sick room, professed himself satisfied, after two private interviews, that the dying man was fully conscious. The Princess, whose married life, it is well known, had been a via crucis, remained near him to the end, praying incessantly for the soul that probably owes its salvation to her intercession. Again, in 1903 and in 1904, she left Moncalieri to visit her sister-in-law, Princess Mathilde Bonaparte, whose death-bed she attended.

Her life, as it neared the end, became more and more that of a recluse. Her sons lived their own lives in Brussels and in Russia; her daughter, having married a Prince of Savoy, was near to her, and their visits occasionally brought an element of joy into the silent castle. Last autumn Prince Victor Napoleon's marriage to the Princess Clémentine of Belgium gladdened his mother's heart. It was celebrated at Moncalieri, and to those who attended the ceremony the most striking figure present was the slight, gray-haired lady, plainly dressed in black, whose eyes had the far-away look of those who are nearing the eternal shore. Even in the days of her youth Princess Clotilde's spirituality struck M. Emile Ollivier. It gave her, he says, a singular insight into all questions that touch on right and wrong; she possessed the gifts of the true mystics, "who judge human affairs with a clearness and rectitude born of detachment." Her chief link with the outer world during the long, silent years of old age was her love for the poor, to whom she gave royally, with a loving kindness that made her gifts more precious. Their grief was great when they heard of her death, and their prayers will follow her remains to the royal mausoleum of La Superga, near Turin, where the daughter of the Sardinian Kings sleeps with her ancestors.

ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

Economic Conditions of the German Catholics

Numerically, the German Catholics are in the minority among their fellow-citizens, being twenty-three millions out of sixty-three, or 37 per cent. of the population. It is not generally known that as a class they are also less favored with temporal possessions. It may be of interest to see how Der Aar, a Catholic monthly, discusses both the causes and the extent of this economical inferiority. The article is written by Dr. Hans Rost, who is an authority on economical statistics.

The Peace of Westphalia in 1648 established a Germany which was almost equally divided into a Catholic and a non-Catholic section, with a preponderance of the former. The French wars at the end of the eighteenth century tore away for good the present Belgium, while Lorraine and other districts had already been lost many years before. Catholic Austria separated in 1866. But the number of Catholics was again increased when the Polish provinces of Prussia, Alsace and part of Lorraine were united with the new German Empire. These events brought the Catholics now under the sway of Emperor William II to their present number.

Heavy blows had fallen upon these Catholics in the beginning of the nineteenth century. Until then the bishops were still temporal rulers, and a large number of abbots and abbesses likewise enjoyed the privileges of sovereignty. The proverb, "Unter dem Krummstab ist gut wohnen" (good hap to live neath a prelate's crook), still testifies to the mild rule of these ecclesiastical monarchs. There was, besides, an endless number of other abbeys, convents, collegiate chapters and other Catholic institutions. In 1803 all these establishments, together with the ecclesiastical princedoms, were swept away. No charge of laxity was made the cloak of this wholesale robbery. About the same time all the secular Catholic princes, with the exception of Bavaria, also lost their territories in favor of the Protestants. Jews and Protestants reaped an enormous harvest when the sacred vessels and other possessions of the convents and churches, together with the buildings and estates were sold, as, on the whole, the Catholics refrained from buying sacred property.

Other times now began for the Catholics. The Protestant owner came, with Protestant retainers and favorites; the Protestant sovereign placed officials of his own religion over his new Catholic subjects. Positions of any importance in the Catholic cities and regions, formerly filled by the children of the soil, now went to the Protestant stranger, who was often the first Protestant the place had ever seen. In consequence, the government contracts were preferably given to Protestants. The material loss of the Church, as such, was immense, something like three hundred million dollars; serious economical disadvantages for the individual Catholic naturally followed in its wake, but this policy of the new rulers did, perhaps, still more to impoverish the Catholic population, or, at least, to make material progress at equal steps with the Protestants impossible.

Up to 1803 Catholic Germany was well equipped with educational institutions. There were eighteen Catholic universities, liberally endowed, and a more than sufficient number of secondary schools, in very many of which instruction was given gratis. Many of the latter were now suppressed or their property was applied to non-Catholic institutions. All the Catholic universities disappeared. There were no longer the rich bishops and abbots, and the many priestly establishments, with their splendid patronage of arts and letters. The poorer student had lost his born protectors. The money was now turned to other uses or at best helped non-Catholic students.

To some extent natural conditions contributed not a little to make the material competition between the two denominations difficult for the Catholic side. Bavaria, for instance, before its rapid territorial increase in the period we speak of, was entirely Catholic, but, like most of the Catholic districts in Germany, it was chiefly an agricultural country. Now it acquired, together with other Catholic agricultural districts, also some populous Protestant cities. It is but natural that the latter could much more easily supply able officials for the administration of the kingdom than the Catholic farmers. But, even aside from this, the Catholics were not much better off under the Catholic King of Bavaria than under many Protestant rulers. Bavaria freely shared in the plunder of the Church. Under its prime minister, Mongelas, it enacted scenes of vandalism, by desecrating churches and scattering precious libraries, which vie with those recently witnessed in Portugal. Two Protestants were appointed to reorganize the educational system. There have nearly always been relatively more Protestants than Catholics among the higher and highest Bavarian state functionaries; at times they had the majority in the cabinet.

In Protestant Prussia unfairness in official preferment has ever been a cherished practice. Under Frederick the Great no Catholic could obtain a position with a salary higher than two hundred and fifty dollars. The restriction was later on dropped, but what this means we see from the following notice in the memoirs of the Bishop of Breslau, written about 1820: "In Prussia, as in Ireland, there prevails the most pernicious system of Protestant preponderance; only on paper are our Catholics treated on equal footing with the Protestants, but not in reality." The system has not been changed since. The Royal Ministries and their staffs, the governorships of the eight, now twelve, provinces, the district presidents, some forty in number, are with almost no exception Protestants, though here and there some lukewarm Catholic with a Protestant wife and children was admitted. Numerous mixed marriages, purposely brought about by sending Catholic civil and military officers into Protestant districts and vice versa, and only too frequently resulting in the loss of the Catholic party and children, also turned a stream of Catholic money and influence into the Protestant camp. This has now been going on for a whole century, and it would be hard to estimate the millions which, as salaries and pensions and under other titles, have passed to Protestants, not to speak of the moral support they were, in their high positions, able to give to their friends and the government money they secured for Protestant business firms.

This unfairness is not confined to Prussia. "An observation trip through the cabinets of other German rulers," Dr. Rost quotes from the Archiv für Katholisches Kirchenrecht, "would prove very instructive. There is everywhere the same endeavor, the same systematic tendency to keep the Catholics out of all the influential positions." Nor did later years bring any change. "Never was this system so relentlessly carried out as during the first decade of the twentieth century; never were the Catholics so completely excluded." The solitary fact that the Catholic Baron Schorlemer, after being governor of the Rhine province was made Minister for agriculture, cannot change the situation.

No wonder that under these circumstances the German Catholics are not so rich as they ought to be. In Prussia they pay only one-seventh of the income taxes, though they are one-third of the population. However, they themselves are far from throwing the whole blame on the calamities they have suffered and the discrimination which is practised against them. For about a quarter of a century they have been examining their conscience, whether this financial inferiority is not perhaps partly their own fault, and they are both honest and ambitious enough to own that if they made better use of all their opportunities their condition would at least be considerably improved, though, of course, it could never be like that of the favored Protestants.

On June 12, 1907, a census was taken in the German empire of the avocations, trades, etc., of its inhabitants. It shows that the Catholics far outstrip the Protestants in agriculture, forestry and mining, but only in the socially lower ranks of workers, not among the higher managers, directors and owners. As the whole seacoast and most of the great rivers and lakes are in Protestant districts, the Catholics have small chance in the fishing business. In the building industry they fairly hold their own. But in nearly all other branches they are now represented in proportion to their standing in the population. In the chemical industry, among the manufacturers of instruments, the engravers, sculptors and other artists, the number of Catholics is very much below their normal percentage. A very honorable exception is the sacred ministry. Germany has 22,822 Protestant ministers and church officials, but 22,854 Catholic priests. This, indeed, shows a great amount of sound religious idealism—though there is still a crying need for more laborers in the Lord's vineyard.

All this is in keeping with a self-accusation which the Catholic press, especially the Kölnische Volkszeitung, has never ceased to voice, namely, that higher commercial and technical education is not sufficiently valued by the Catholics. Their sons crowd the humanistic Gymnasien fairly well, but they keep away from the Realschulen. This is partly so because the desire to see their children priests is for many Catholics the principal motive in giving them a higher education, and graduation from the commercial and technical schools, of course, does not admit to the study of theology. The generally greater poverty of the Catholics and the remoteness of many from educational opportunities is another reason. Yet competent judges hold, with the great Protestant educator, Paulsen, that "Catholics are less vividly convinced than Protestants of the importance of science as a factor in social and business life." A change for the better, however, is perceptible. The Albertus Magnus Society, founded expressly for the support of non-theological students, disburses thousands of marks every year. As far as the inferiority of the Catholics is caused by a greater contentment with their lot in this valley of tears or by their more careful choice of the means of acquisition—so far it will not cease except together with Catholicism.

Dr. Rost has treated the economical condition of the German Catholics in a book, entitled "Die Katholiken im Kultur- und Wirtschaftsleben," a second edition of which is soon to appear.

FRANCIS S. BETTEN, S.J.

Frequent Communion in Our Schools

At a time when so much is everywhere being accomplished for the physical and mental development of children, and when those without the pale of the Church are searching so eagerly, and yet so vainly, for the solution of that most vexed of all problems, the moral education of the young, it would be a strange oversight on our part to neglect the consideration of the one supreme and divine factor in the development of child-character, the Holy Eucharist.

With every day we realize more perfectly that in this age of materialistic thought and socialistic revolution the true efficiency of our schools and colleges, all else considered, must be gauged by the frequency with which the Holy Eucharist is there received, by the ardor with which Eucharistic practices inflame the youthful minds and hearts, by the eagerness and joy with which the Eucharistic life is throbbing within their walls. To the Catholic-minded and intelligent student of the social questions of our day it becomes ever more evident that there is no more powerful remedy intended by Almighty God to cure the evils of our age than the Holy Eucharist. But it is in the school and in the class-room that the frequent and daily reception of the "Sacrament must be taught, and it is through the children that the parents themselves—who often are moved but slowly by the most earnest instructions of their pastors—must finally be brought to the acceptance of the decree of the Church. Already we can behold the truth of this in countless parishes where Communion on the workdays of the week was seldom, if ever, seen before, but where now the mothers often follow the little ones to the Holy Table, and where even the fathers come in great numbers to the reception of the Sacrament. The beautiful prophecy of the Scriptures has found, as it were, a new fulfillment: "A little child shall lead them."

That the decree on frequent and daily Communion, "Sacra Tridentina Synodus," applies to educational institutions in no ordinary way, but in a most especial manner, is clearly stated by the Holy Father. Article VII thus reads: "Frequent and daily Communion is to be promoted . . . especially . . . in all Christian establishments, of whatever kind, for the training of the young." Here, then, is the charter for our work. Here is the prospectus divinely inspired, whose wisdom it would be folly to doubt and rashness to neglect.

We all understand, moreover, how universal the application of this decree is: that it refers to all the classes of every school, and that not even the lowest grades are to be excepted. This is plain from many documents. One familiar instance will suffice. Article VI of the late legislation concerning the First Communion of children thus reads: "Those who have charge of children must take the utmost care that after their First Communion the said children should approach the Holy Table very often, and if possible, even daily, as Jesus Christ and our Holy Mother Church desire it, and that they should go with such devotion as their age allows." This age is defined in the decree as about the seventh year, somewhat earlier or somewhat later. As soon, namely, as the child is capable of committing a mortal sin it has a right and a need of receiving Holy Communion and of repeating this act, if possible, even daily. Such is the teaching of the Holy Father, which no sophistry and no "explanation" can make void.

If at the present time it were possible for us to entertain any regret, it could only be that, unlike the fortunate little ones in our charge, we were not born to participate from earliest childhood in all this wondrous lavishness of God's greatest gift. But for us there has been reserved a joy peculiarly our own, and that is to extend this blessing to thousands of souls, to give to the Heart of our Master not merely the daily embrace of our own love, but to procure for Him the unnumbered Holy Communion of those beneath our charge and influence; to be, in a word, the first apostles in the great renewal of the world. The promise made by our Divine Saviour to that Good Shepherd nun, by whose instrumentality the world was consecrated to the Sacred Heart under Leo XIII, we may regard as made to us as well: that for every time she procured, even indirectly, His entrance into a heart, He would grant to her an increase of eternal glory.

Frequent and daily Communion alone can secure for us the happy result that from year's end to year's end the state of grace shall remain inviolate in the souls of our little ones; for this is the first effect of the Holy Eucharist: to preserve the life of grace, and in particular to protect the young from that sin of impurity which ever threatens them. Nothing but the Holy Eucharist can most effectually quench that fire within their veins and give to their hearts the strength to resist temptation—nothing but the wine that burgeons forth virgins. Think what it means to prevent one mortal sin, and then think what it means to prevent thousands, to prevent, it may be, tens of thousands, by our efforts. We are not speaking in figures, we are not dealing in exaggerations, but stating a plain, calm truth, magnificent though it is, of which every priest has experience. From all the world arises one voice of jubilation and wonder at the effects already produced by this most Blessed Sacrament, wherever the mandates of the Holy Father have been observed unquestioningly in any school—and, God be thanked! many are the instances we might mention where frequent and even daily Communion are the order of the day. As early as March, 12, 1909, Cardinal Mercier could write: "Already in Belgium an experience of two years, in the case of many parishes and most educational establishments, has proved that frequent Communion produces fruits of piety and morality which far exceed the expectations of the most sanguine directors of souls."

We are not stating the fact too strongly when we say that frequent and, if possible, daily Communion will supply in its fullest perfection the very primary condition for the attainment of the highest physical, mental and moral culture obtainable through education. By keeping pure and inviolate the lives of our students, Holy Communion preserves in them throughout their most trying years that joy of spirit and soundness of body which are God's dowry to a chaste generation. By giving right direction to their thoughts and supernatural motives to their will it prepares them with the best equipment for true intellectual development, such as we often find wanting in men of the most brilliant parts. And, finally, by continuing unbroken in their souls the reign of sanctifying grace, it fills them with the divine life of Christ, into whose likeness they are daily more perfectly transformed, Who is the Brightness of Eternal Light, the unspotted Mirror of God's Majesty, and the Image of His Goodness.

What Catholic educator is not quickened to activity and sacrifice at the thought of these vast possibilities? Little, indeed, would he seem to have caught of the pentecostal fire who could not be moved by such considerations, who would not give to this greatest and most providential work of our time all the encouragement and personal support that God enables him to devote.

Thackeray's Centenary

Centenaries have their use. The observance of the centenary of a man of letters is his patent of peerage amongst those who have made a sufficiently enduring name. Many of Thackeray's contemporaries, enjoying a greater momentary favor than he, have not attained to the honor of the centenary. He, born a hundred years ago, on the eighteenth of this month, dying nearly fifty years ago in the prime of life, has reached it.

He had his weaknesses. The greatest was to set himself up as a censor morum, a rebuker of shams and of snobs. The purse-proud merchant, the professional man living beyond his means, the commercial traveler who would pass as a gentleman, the spendthrift man of fashion and his kinsman, the blackleg, the poor noble in the hands of the Jews, the worldly prelate of the Establishment, the Irish aristocrat—as if the suggestion of good Irish blood were an exquisite absurdity—are over and over again the objects of his satire. But the satire is of the cheapest kind. Call a man De Mogyns, Grig, Rag, Sniffle, the Right Honorable the Earl of Bareacres and Viscount Southdown, the Earl of Dorking and Viscount Rooster of Chanticleere Castle, the Lord Bishop of Bullocksmithy, Malony of Ballymalony, or somebody else of Ballybunnion or Booterstown, and the work is half done. Give a dog a bad name, and the subsequent hanging is easy. Call a little German duchy Pumpnickel or Potztausend-Donnerwetter, or a French noble Duc de la Jabotière, and the giggling public knows that the time to laugh has come.

There were those who declared Thackeray to have been himself a great snob. The question does not concern us. Thackeray, the censor of snobs, has been dead much more than half a century. He passed away with the publication of "Vanity Fair" fourteen years before the dawning Christmas Eve, 1862, saw the novelist struggling with sudden death. We are celebrating the centenary of this Thackeray, with his fame resting secure on four great works: "Vanity Fair," "The Newcomes," "Henry Esmond," "The Virginians." With the first and second of these some bracket "Pendennis."

As for "Catherine," "Barry Lyndon" and books of their class, they interest us only as prologues to greater things. His last novel, "The Adventures of Philip," is but an echo of "Pendennis" and "The Newcomes," while its predecessor, "Lovel the Widower," is an unworthy return to his earlier method. His earliest work is so little known that not long since a storyteller could reproduce in no less a magazine than Blackwood's, undetected, apparently, by editors or readers, the extravagant plot of "Lords and Liveries," his parody of Mrs. Gore, a popular novelist, now forgotten.

The four great novels divide themselves into pairs: "Henry Esmond" and "The Virginians," dealing with the dead eighteenth century, and "Vanity Fair" and "The Newcomes" with that in which the author lived. Hence, an enormous advantage for these. Though, judged by the mechanical rules of art, "Esmond" is reckoned the most perfect work, neither in it nor in its companion have we the real people of the other two, but, rather, consummate actors presenting the teacup times of patch and skirt and hood. This may be merely an idea springing from our own limitations: we think, though, that it is the truth, that the author who could introduce to us the living found it beyond even his power to raise the dead.

Some complain of a recurrence of types in Thackeray. Lady Kew, they say, and Miss Crawley are virtually the same; Blanche Amory is compounded of Becky Sharp and the Duchesse d'Ivry, and so on. Yet, after all, is not human nature reducible to a very few types? Just as we divide mankind into the Caucasian, the Mongolian, the Semitic and one or two other races, the sanguine, the lymphatic, the bilious and the melancholic temperaments, so we can reduce to a few social types all the men and women with whom we live. But below the type come the species, with their specific differences, and below the lowest species the individuals with their individuating notes. Miss Crawley and Lady Kew belong to the class of worldly women; but unless one be very obtuse he must be able to distinguish in them specific differences and individuating notes, which make them as truly personalities as any two living worldly women. Such general resemblances, which in our own little circles we are always noting, instead of destroying verisimilitude, increase it. Moreover, Thackeray had sometimes good reasons for them. He was a moralist, not so much when moralizing as when leaving the reader to learn for himself the lessons always present in his mind. There is a strong likeness between Beatrix Esmond and Ethel Newcome. Beatrix, as the Baroness Bernstein, fell almost as low as the Duchesse d'Ivry and Becky Sharp, because she would not fight against her evil nature. Ethel had the grace to see her danger and overcome it, else she had been another Lady Kew.

Thackeray's good people vex us. So do the good people round about us. Colonel Newcome did foolishly in inviting Sir Bryan, Barnes and Sir Thomas de Boots to meet the first mate and the doctor. He had no right to seek Ethel for Clive, and Clive was utterly wrong in pursuing her while playing the artist in long hair and moustaches. Yet to call this inartistic is the height of error. "The Newcomes" is an epic, and the awful tragedies in which it involves its characters rightly find their causes, not only in the machinations of the wicked and the inevitable spinings of the Fates, but also in the defects of those who are to be brought low and purified to rise again. Another superficial remark is that Colonel Newcome was too perfect. Thackeray knew him better. His very virtues passed on to an excess and engendered vices. The tactlessness of his first dinner occasioned the first quarrel with Barnes: in the great breach he was wrong, as Pendennis and Sir Thomas told him; and so honesty, simplicity, generosity were smothered in a malignant hatred, which even Clive rebuked, and only ruin could dispel.

From the beginning some have disparaged Thackeray's good women. Amelia was priggish, the elder Mrs. Pendennis simple, and Laura a prude. But this was not always the popular mind. Thackeray and his contemporary, Trollope, won the hearts of their generation by their good women, not because they created new ones, but because they portrayed the tender, pure souls who peopled country, village and town in the middle nineteenth century. England loved Laura and Amelia and the Little Sister and Lily Dale and Lucy Robartes and Grace Crawley, for this especially: that each in his own circle, even in his own family, could find similar noble women. Sharps and Amorys and Desmolins and Beatrixes and Griselda Grantlys abounded, too; but there was no sympathy for them. Ethel Newcome was acceptable only as a brand plucked from the burning, but the heart did not go out to her as to the others. It has been reserved for the perverted sense of these later days to find the insipidity of the former class and the excellence of the latter. A well-known writer takes occasion from this centenary to attempt to rehabilitate Becky Sharp, to imagine her reconciliation with Dobbin. As F. B. says: "It mislikes me." We trust that the old breed of good women is not extinct; but one could desire no better augury for a renovated England, and America, too, than the return of the reading public to their loves of half a century ago.

We cannot close without a word on Thackeray's religion. He had no love for the Established Church. He believed in God and in prayer, which one may hope he used as did Colonel Newcome before passion had hardened his heart and after that heart had been purified in adversity. Nevertheless, his notions of faith and dogma were the narrowest. Positive religion, he seems to have thought, was for women: for men general goodness and uprightness sufficed. His men sinned grievously: their reform, as in the case of old Osborne, Pendennis, Bayham, de Florac, Honeyman, in his way, and even Kew, consisted in the putting the past behind them, with remorse indeed, but not with supernatural sorrow. His attraction towards the Church is evident. The vulgar gibe and sneer were frequent in his earlier writing; but the noble character of Madame de Florac, steeped in Catholic piety, shows that light came towards evening, and the splendid passage in "The Newcomes" beginning: "There must be moments, in Rome especially, when every man of friendly heart who writes himself English and Protestant, must feel a pang at thinking that he and his countrymen are insulated from European Christendom" rings as almost a confession of faith. Alas! That word "insulated" is the key to what his mind was then, that between England and Rome spreads out an impassable intellectual ocean. A strange persuasion! Did he ever lose it in the light of God's grace? This is a secret reserved for the last day.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

CORRESPONDENCE

Italy and the Suffrage Question.

ROME, July 2, 1911.

The week in the Italian Parliament was all life insurance. The opposition seeing Giolitti strong-set on his bill for the State monopoly took heart from some signs of defection among the followers of the Coalition first to argue and then to obstruct with multitudinous resolutions for the disposal of the bill. The Socialists, and Radicals all, on second thought, drawn by the bait of workmen's pensions and State control of wealth, have gotten together and stand as a unit for the bill. They have met parliamentary obstruction with obstruction of an unparliamentary kind, howling down the opposition speakers with taunts and obloquy. By the end of the week, what with the heat of the day and the greater heat of southern tempers, the Parliament chamber has been such a bedlam of turmoil as to renew one's suspicions that, after all, popular institutions thrive only in a northern clime. Yet there were great parliamentary debates here while all the north was still barbaric. Giolitti still stands fast, apparently convinced that there is no holding a majority without the Socialists, and no holding them without concessions; while he views this proposal of his Socialist confrère in the Ministry, Signor Nitti, as less dangerous than universal suffrage. A manhood suffrage would, perhaps, give the Socialists a Ministry entirely of their own; but suffrage is for the nonce forgotten.

By way of a counter attraction Rome has had a women's congress. From the days of the presidency of Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, women's congresses have been awesome things to behold. Here the good ladies militant stocked the convention with outsiders and passed resolutions calling for the exclusion of all religious teaching from the schools, for a constitutional amendment removing the clause of toleration of other religions because of its implication that the Catholic religion has the preference of the State, for female suffrage, and finally for a sweeping sanction of divorce. They naively justified carrying these resolutions against the will of the majority of the delegates by the obsolete method of stuffing the convention, on the ground that the invitation to the public to attend the sessions of the convention, of course, carried with it the concession of a vote.

The respectable newspapers cut out most of the discussion on divorce for reason, as they averred, of its indecency. This condition of affairs in the congress invited an inquiry as to who was the ancient and venerable Roman matron or maid who presided over this witches' caldron. Her name is illuminating,—Irma Melany Scoduk. Ancient Rome rued the day she brought the alien from the east into her councils: modern Rome only views the matter as happily anti-clerical. Yet the other day in the Piazza di San Ignazio a tame jackdaw in clerical black put a temerarious cat to flight. What a pity we have passed the day of omens!

Italy, however, this week, is mourning the loss of a truly noble woman, the Princess Clotilde, eldest daughter of Victor Emmanuel II, widow of Prince Joseph Napoleon, the cousin of Napoleon III. After a life full of strong character, devotedness and charity, she died piously as she had lived, a fervent, humble child of the Catholic Church.

On the eve of the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul the Holy Father, as usual, made his visit of devotion to the tomb of the Apostles in St. Peter's. The basilica was fully illuminated, the pontifical gendarmes lined the way, the Swiss Guard led and closed the procession, and the Noble Guard surrounded His Holiness; while a full representation of the Vatican staff of state awaited his coming in St. Peter's. He prayed at the altar of the Blessed Sacrament, then in the chapel of the Confession, and before leaving paused to kiss the feet of the famous bronze statue of St. Peter, which on this occasion is clad in full pontificals. The following morning the Roman Primary Association for Catholic Interests placed on the tomb of St. Peter its annual offering of a silver chalice in the name of the people of Rome. On the previous morning Cardinal Merry del Val presented to the Holy Father the medal struck this year, as every year, in honor of the feast. The medal bears on the obverse side the face of the Pontiff with the inscription, "Pius X. Pont. Max. Anno VIII," and on the reverse an allegorical commemoration of the renovation of the Astronomical Observatory in the Vatican Gardens. The feast drew the usual great multitudes of the faithful to St. Peter's.

The Peace Letter of the Holy Father has been well received in all the great capitals of Europe, and the reports of the Eucharistic Congress in Madrid have brought great consolation to Rome. There is even a rumor from Spain that the Ministerial Council has decided to renew relations with the Vatican and to ask His Holiness to accept the nomination of the former Minister of Finance, Señor Reverter, as Spanish Ambassador to the Holy See. This will not move so fast.

After eight months the ringleader of the republican mob, which attacked Cardinal Agliardi in Marino in October on the occasion of his visit there to administer Confirmation, has been sentenced to three and a half months' imprisonment; this is a small mouse after mountainous labor on the part of the authorities.

The Anti-Ultramontane League of Berlin, founded some four and a half years ago, has recently demanded of the German Parliament the suppression of the Prussian Embassy to the Holy See, but the Chancellor declared that the government had clearly stated its position in the matter last March and saw no reason for reopening the question now. His attitude was supported by the Chamber.

It is not pleasant to have to add that the cholera seems more widespread and virulent than it was at this time last year. There are three or four hundred cases at Naples, sixty deaths a day at Palermo, twenty or thirty cases at Venice, the denial of the American consul to the contrary notwithstanding, and a rumor of cases at Genoa. The Venetian situation is well understood here at the American Embassy and has caused some indignation. Rome confesses to no cases; at least it is announced that the lazaretto is empty, but the announcement is not accepted as reassuring. Austria has declared a five-day quarantine against all comers from Italy, Switzerland three, while Malta has closed her port to all vessels touching Italian shores. C. M.

Portuguese Politics

MADRID, June 23, 1911.

Dexterously manipulated by the Carbonari and the Republicans, the telegraph has sent out from Lisbon the most edifying reports of the popular enthusiasm manifested on the opening of the Constituent Assembly; but the reality was very different from that fanciful picture. A lively indication of the general disorder was seen in the action of the troops, who marched through the streets after the first decree of the Assembly. The soldiers paraded in fatigue dress, with no regard for ranks or military formation; they gave no heed to their officers' commands, but stopped when they pleased to chat with members of the cabinet, or with whomever they took the fancy.

When the volunteer militia were on their way to their barracks, they chanced to pass a couple of officers of the regular lancers and some members of corps of engineers, not one of whom saluted the flag borne by the militiamen. The volunteers at once protested angrily. The regulars, without any formalities, threw themselves on the color-bearer, snatched away his flag, and tore it into ribbons. Finally, the provost marshal put in an appearance and placed the offenders under arrest. That same evening, their comrades held an indignation meeting and resolved to petition the government to set the prisoners free, and to muster out of the service all the volunteer militia! Such is the lack of discipline in the Portuguese army that every soldier, every corporal and every sergeant that took part in the October revolution feels as independent of every other member of the army as if he were a field marshal in the presence of the awkward squad. With the rank and file in such an unmilitary state of mind, it is no wonder that many self-respecting officers have handed in their resignations and have retired to private life, there to lament the disorganization that prevails in the whole army.

Even the members of the cabinet realize the difficulty of their position, and have on more than one occasion signified their preference for the "simple life." Lest this may seem a bit of Spanish prejudice, we quote from A Fronteira, a Portuguese newspaper that is the exponent of advanced and unqualified republicanism: "Politicians, like women, have their whims. Just now, the fashion is for these valiant and illustrious Republicans, when face to face with any petty contradiction, to announce their resignation. What beautiful examples of sacrifice and patriotism!"

It is true. The best servants of the republic, that is, honorable and upright men who saw in the change of government the salvation and prosperity of their country, have become so embittered by the violence, the injustice, and the absurd methods of the new régime that they now curse the republic and have nothing to do with the tyrants and Carbonari who are at its head. Here is the way in which Dr. Julio A. Martins, the Mayor of Extremos, worded the resignation which he forwarded to the Minister of the Interior: "Grieving deeply over the money, the time, and the energy that I wasted for many years in striving to bring about the triumph of the Republican party, I hereby withdraw from it; for the present administration is but a discreditable mishmash of unsavory elements coming down from the old régime and others of the same brand skimmed from the new. From this moment I retire from the mayoralty, in which I did not practice favoritism, nor reward rogues, nor distort justice, nor sacrifice the dignity of my position by indulging in sharp practice for the sake of winning followers."

Senhor José Pereira Sampayo, another lifelong Republican and a writer of note, has also announced his withdrawal from all political activity, "for the republic as it exists in Portugal is not the republic of his dreams."

But what the mayor and the writer have to say about Portuguese republicanism is as hurtful to the administration as a dash of Cologne water or a shower of confetti on Shrove Tuesday when compared with the ringing words of Dr. Rodrigo Costa, another old line Republican (for Republicans, few but active and hopeful, there have long been in Portugal): "As an old campaigner in the Republican ranks, I wish to say that my feelings have been hurt at sight of the narrowminded, reactionary, and unpatriotic course that you have marked out. There is nobody of sound moral sense, or even possessed of an evenly balanced head, who is not indignant at the outrages which, with a supreme contempt for civilization and the progress of humanity, you authorize in the full light of the twentieth century. The clearest proof of your hypocrisy, of the unsoundness of your principles, and of the falsity of your ideals is seen in your having re-established the laws of the absolute and tyrannical governments of the eighteenth century. Instead of following in religious questions in the footsteps of modern and enlightened republics, such as the United States and Brazil, you have preferred to ape the French politicians who precipitated the Reign of Terror, and from that page of history, written in blood and filth, you have selected your principles of government." So think, so feel, so speak, those respectable Republicans, who toiled and suffered for the realization of an ideal, of which not even a suggestion is seen in the show which political mountebanks have put on the boards in Lisbon.

The convening of the Constituent Assembly has given all Lisbon an occasion for no little hilarity; for the importance of the matter in hand is out of all proportion to the importance of those who are to handle it. Among the delegates who are to formulate an organic law for a nation are men not only without culture, but even without education. Alcobaza is an insignificant little crossroads which could find a place only on some sectional map on a large scale; but it has a barber shop. Its present proprietor, since the day he was first able to grasp a snath, has known no other occupation than that of swinging a scythe through the stubble on the villagers' faces, the while he mastered the elements of ethics, economics, sociology, and statecraft, according to the time-honored custom in rural tontorial parlors, and others.

But he "looked good" to the provisional government, and lo! he is now manufacturing a Constitution while another wields the gleaming blade in the barber shop.

Is it at all wonderful, then, that the Lisbon cabinet, whose permanence rests upon a foundation of chronic unrest, is startled by a sneeze and terrified by a bray? Is it wonderful that the Spanish frontier is watched and that the steps of the exiled Portuguese are dogged? The fact is that Spanish sympathizers with the Lisbon government are giving them all possible aid and comfort; in a word, they are acting as a black guard to their Portuguese allies, and are making ready to stir up trouble in Spain. Premier Canalejas cannot be ignorant of the plots that are hatching, yet what is he doing? Conciliating the Portuguese and taking the rest cure, that's all.

Madrid Congressists.

MADRID, June 30, 1911.

By desire of King Alfonso XIII, a special "royal train" was provided to convey the Papal Delegate, Cardinal Aguirre, Primate of Spain and Patriarch of the West Indies, from his residence in Toledo to the capital, where he arrived on June 22.

Cardinal Aguirre is a Franciscan. Born at Leon on March 12, 1835, he entered the Order in his early youth, and such were his merits, his piety and his learning that he found himself called upon to discharge the duties of several important offices. He spent a number of years as a missionary in the Philippines. His first episcopal charge was Lugo, from which he was promoted to the archdiocese of Burgos. He was created Cardinal in 1907 and was then translated to Toledo, the primatial see of Spain. Although he is in his seventy-seventh year, such is his vigor of body and mind that he shows none of the ailments and failings of old age. The venerable cardinal is very highly respected by all classes of Spanish Catholics, for he has held himself aloof from partisan politics and has observed a strict neutrality in all such matters.

The Infanta Isabel, President General of the Eucharistic Congress, is a sister of Alfonso XII, father of the present king. She was born in 1851 and became the wife of the Count of Girgenti. She is the most popular member of the Spanish royal family. Affable, communicative, and lighthearted, she lives close to the people, and is very dear to all classes. Her fondness for sports always takes her to every event of importance. Her two chief characteristics are her intense love of country and her deep religiousness.

Sharing with the Infanta the burden of the general presidency were the Right Reverend José María Salvador y Barrera, Bishop of Madrid-Alcalá, and the Right Reverend Jaime Cardona, titular Bishop of Sion. The former was a distinguished professor of the University of Sacro Monte, Granada, before being raised to the purple as Bishop of Tarazona. A prelate of vast and varied learning, he is not less well known for his great good sense in practical affairs. As a member of the senate, his speeches are always moderate and conciliatory in tone and beautifully reasoned out. He is not particularly beloved by the Jaimists and the Integrists, whom he has at times been forced to make the object of his pastoral admonitions. They therefore look upon him as a Liberal or little better. It is well to remark, however, that as often as such controversies have been carried to Rome, the Vatican has always decided in favor of the bishop's stand.

The jurisdiction of the titular Bishop of Sion includes the royal palaces and the army. He has been for many years the most famous pulpit orator in Madrid, and the sermons that he has preached in the city churches are to be counted by the thousand.

Archbishop Enrique Almaraz of Seville is another brilliant speaker. He is simply enthusiastic in all Catholic social works, and is one of the mainstays of the Catholic press, for which he has been unremitting in his labors.

The most distinguished visitor from the Orient was his Beatitude, Paul Peter XIII, Patriarch of Cilicia of the Armenians. If not the longest, his journey to reach the Eucharistic Congress was most likely the most laborious and painful. With the exception of a few, who were incapacitated by advanced age or infirmity, the whole Spanish hierarchy attended the Congress. There were bishops, too, from North and South America and the Far East, not forgetting Archbishop Tritschler y Córdoba, of Mérida de Yucatan, who suffered shipwreck on the first stage of his journey. Yet the hospitality of the citizens of Madrid was equal to the occasion, for every visiting prelate, whether Spanish or foreign, was the honored guest of some private family.

May the outcome of the twenty-second Eucharistic Congress be the strengthening of the ties of brotherhood among all the faithful and an increase of zeal in the field of practical Catholicity!

Militant Young China

SHANGHAI, May 28, 1911.

The Confucian scholar of the past was a placid, unemotional, dignified specimen of oriental humanity. Alas! he is fast disappearing in the upheaval of the present times and his place is taken by the "new student." The latter is rather excitable, turbulent, and curious to observe, imagines himself a full-fledged politician, able to handle all national and international problems which concern his country's welfare. Such matters, much more than his class-books, have a peculiar attraction for him, and whenever a treaty is to be signed, a loan raised or a frontier question to be settled, he has the mania of interfering and clamoring for "China's rights." The recent imbroglio between the "Dragon and the Grizzly" afforded many of these meddlesome politicians scope for airing their patriotic feelings, and urging their Government to engage in the dangerous tussle of warfare.

Chinese students in Germany were the first to send out to Peking the following telegram: "Russia is coercing us by military force to accede to her demands for treaty revision, acquisition of territory and invasion of rights. The moment is most critical. Other powers do not deem the Russian demands right. Government must not give in, but resist force by force." The students in the United States urge the same policy and excited by rumors of partition forward to Shanghai a message similar to that sent from Germany: "Partition imminent; rouse popular indignation; train citizen soldiers to die for their country." This was published in all native papers and made the round of the Empire, stirring up suspicion and trouble in many places. The latest move is that of the Chinese students in Japan, who have formed a "National Volunteer Society" for the purpose of rescuing their country from impending danger. M. KENNELLY, S.J.

Germany's Insurance of Workmen

Thirty years ago the insurance of working people against loss through accident and illness became a feature of the economic system established by the laws of the German Empire. The world has since heard much of its helpful results. The plan followed, in theory at least, is an eminently sound one. Governmental protection and regulation in the German system safeguard the insured by distributing the funds required according to accepted principles of insurance. In view of the popularity of the scheme, attested by the eagerness with which economists in other lands are preparing to introduce the insurance idea, as a partial measure of social relief, one regrets to learn that an eminent specialist in the German system finds reason to criticize the actual operation of the plan with a seriousness that casts much doubt upon its beneficent working.

The criticism occurs in a contribution to the Zeitschrift für Politik, by Ferdinand Friedenburg, who a short time since retired from the post of President of the Senate of the Imperial Insurance Office, after a service that had extended over twenty years. A correspondent of the London Spectator summarizes for the benefit of English readers, now deeply engrossed in the discussion of Lloyd George's insurance project, the charges bluntly formulated in the German official's paper. Mr. Friedenburg holds: first, that State insurance, though designed to do away with pauperism, is itself an ugly pauperism masquerading under a euphemistic name. "The workmen do not seek fair and honest action upon their claims. From the beginning they began to come as beggars, asking and expecting the insurance laws to be stretched in their favor." Secondly, the system has encouraged to an almost incredible extent the peculiarly German evil of bureaucratic precisianism, and, thirdly, it has become a hotbed of fraud and graft. As the New York Times pointedly remarks in its comment on some of the incidents rehearsed by Mr. Friedenburg in illustration of his contentions, American readers of his papers will be reminded of the history of our Pension Office and pension laws.

The charges, to be sure, do not touch the principle of the system introduced in Germany to be a practical help in solving some of the blackest defects in present day social life. But we know by sad experience how intolerable a burden a wise and just provision for State aid to our veteran soldiers has grown to be through the corruption that fattens upon the opportunities it affords. It were sad to find restrictive measures forced upon the Germans in consequence of the evils Mr. Friedenburg exposes. The law itself is a splendid one, and its beneficent influence ought not to be destroyed through the viciousness of selfish men. However, as the Times observes, "the cause and principle of corruption in the German insurance system are essentially the same as in our own pension system, and the field of operation is far wider as well as more permanent."

Religion and Reforms

A lay sermon, delivered recently by Mr. Lloyd George to some of his Welsh compatriots in London, and translated in summary by the London Times, has caused that journal, which was wont to class him with the wickedest of radicals, to hail him in an approving editorial homily as a Saul among the prophets. Sincerity and disinterestedness, qualities he considers indispensable to a reformer, are accredited to the British Chancellor; and whatever may be the flaws, essential or incidental, in the comprehensive reforms he has inaugurated, this discourse bears evidence that he has a firm grasp on the fundamental principles that should govern reforms and reformers, and a clear perception of their source.

"It is necessary," he said, "to bring religion into the realm of statesmanship"; and he gives his reasons for this necessity. The first, though a local one appealing to national pride, has a general application. Other countries look on Britain as a Christian nation, "and if they see the country full of poverty, of unhappiness, of defilement, the responsibility is put upon religion, and also the disgrace." It is only religion pure and undefiled that can transform these conditions, and "therefore, for the good name of religion, religion must be the inspiration of every heart."

When he said, "all the poverty of London is at the door of religion," he overstated the case, for men in lust of gain can steel their hearts to Christian influences—even the personal influence of Christ did not extinguish the greed of Judas—but the basis of his statement is sound: "It is the responsibility of the Christian Church to look after the poor; that was the first thing Christianity did when established," and its success was measured by the unselfishness and sincerity of its ministers and members. We may add, it was the last thing the Church was doing in England when men of Mr. George's persuasion disestablished it.

The measure then, he went on, is the measure now. No true reform, spiritual or temporal, was ever effected except by the help and leadership of the disinterested, of men who had nothing to gain and who profited nothing by their labors. "One of the mistakes of the Labor Party is in thinking they will win redress through the people who suffered only." The men who carried the reforms of the last few years did so, not for the benefit, but at heavy sacrifice of their personal interests. "Where does this self-sacrifice come from? From the Christian religion. It is our life; and that is why political principles must be interpreted in the light of religious principles."

Though politically dependent on the Labor Party, the British Chancellor is not afraid to stigmatize fundamental errors in that body. Some Laborites are closely allied to the Socialists, who have become very active of late in England, and to these he next addresses himself:

"There are political reformers who believe conscientiously they will never be able to save the people till they have destroyed religion from the world. There was never a more destructive mistake. If the Christian Church was destroyed the country would be turned into a burned-up wilderness, and there would be nothing between the people and force. What is this force? It is the spirit of despotism, the spirit of cruelty, the spirit of self-seeking. There is nothing between the people and tyranny but the spirit of the Christian Church."

We commend these words to American Socialists and their political congeners.

Is He Another Washington?

If Francisco I. Madero, the triumphant Mexican revolutionist, is indeed, as has been often asserted, a dreamer and an enthusiast, his manifesto to his countrymen is far from showing it. Addressing himself "to the long-suffering and laborious people," he tells them that he expects all things from their wisdom and prudence; he wishes them to look upon him as their best friend; and he urges them to make a moderate use of the liberty that they have won, to have faith in the uprightness of the new officials, to cooperate with them for the improvement of the country, and to strive to raise themselves in the social scale. If their political condition, he warns them, has undergone a radical change, for they have passed from the condition of outcasts and slaves to that of citizens, they are not to hope that their social and economic condition will undergo a like sudden transformation; for such a change cannot be brought about by decrees and laws, but is to be sought by the constant and laborious effort of all classes of society. "The laborer," he concludes, almost in the spirit of a homily, "will find happiness in himself, in the control of his passions and in mastering his vices; he will find prosperity and wealth by practising thrift and strengthening his will by acting according to conscience and patriotism and by not following the alluring voice of passion."

There is nothing of the fanatic and frenzied partisan in such advice. If it makes itself heard and felt and heeded, it will accomplish more glorious victories than those which drove Porfirio Diaz into exile.

Protestant Hymns Again

Some weeks ago we tried to put the question of the use by Catholics of Protestant hymns on a sound basis. A correspondent, referring to our effort, asks: "Can Catholics use non-Catholic translations of Catholic hymns?" and: "What if the non-Catholic translators become converted?"

Let us apply the principles we laid down. The efficient cause of the translation is the translator who expresses with as much fidelity as the exigencies of metre and rhyme allow, the ideas of the original, which becomes the exemplary cause. The final cause is Protestant worship. Hence, considering the question as it is proposed, we should not like to say it is lawful to use such versions. Take a concrete example. The English Protestant version of the Te Deum—not the American—is sonorous, and though capable of improvement, is sufficiently faithful to the original. It has many excellent settings. Nevertheless, we should be shocked to hear it in a Catholic church. This is an extreme case; but the principles which would make it rationally scandalous, are applicable to any Protestant version of a Catholic hymn.

Should a non-Catholic translator become a Catholic, he may either put forward as a Catholic the works of his non-Catholic days, or he may not. In the former case they become the work of a Catholic translator; in the latter, they remain non-Catholic versions.

In the whole matter the principal part belongs to the formal cause, i. e., the official approbation for Catholic worship of a hymn, no matter who its author is. If this be given—it cannot be given by publishers or choir-masters, or directors of sodalities, etc., not even by pastors—it would act with regard to non-Catholic versions as a sort of sanatio in radice, healing all defects of origin coming from the efficient and the final cause.

Christian Socialists in Austria

How did it happen? It is a question that springs to the lips of many, even here in America, when the story of the Waterloo in the recent Austrian elections is told. We in the United States had come to think that the vigorous Catholic party, organized and welded into shape through the indomitable energy of Lueger, could not be defeated. For years back victory after victory had been won by them; even in the stronghold of rampant liberalism, even in Vienna, for more than a decade and a half, Christian Socialism—one never quite fancies the name—had swept the polls in practically every election.

Only once, in 1900, has the party experienced a reverse worth the mention. How did it come about that the June parliamentary elections brought its representatives such overwhelming disaster?

A Vienna correspondent gives us some explanation of the puzzle. Writing a day or two after the elections, he calls attention to the fact that it was in Vienna only that the blow fell. With the exception of a few inconsiderable districts in lower Austria, where the party has never been sanguine of victory, in the entire Kingdom outside of Vienna, the Christian Socialists achieved their old success; aye, even in Tyrol, where certain local troubles worried party leaders, not a single Conservative was elected. The results in the capital city, then, alone need to be explained. These, he assures us, had been anticipated by the wise ones among politicians and could, nay would, have been openly predicted by the party press, had the gentlemen in charge not been fearful of the discouragement such predictions might have caused in voting districts outside of Vienna.

There is no reason why we should follow our correspondent through the entanglement of division and treachery that marks his story of the awful surprise in the outcome in Francis Joseph's capital. Many of its details are purely local and contain little to interest us in America. The narrative may be briefly summarized as follows:

The elections, following a rather unlooked dissolution of parliament, were fixed for too early a date to permit effective campaigning by the Christian Socialists. The organization, chosen to direct the party once swayed by the mighty Lueger, had not had time to take firm grasp of the reins. Their authority had not made itself felt. There was the more reason for this in the fact that their selection had not been without features internally injurious to party unity. There had been divisions, petty jealousies and misunderstandings, which the Liberal press took good care to foster through slanderous charges. There had been treachery and an ensuing breaking away of an element of the party, that might have wrought worse disaster had not the better disposed come to their senses in time. The defection caused the Christian Socialists to lose the aid of the Volksblatt; and the Reichspost, although a great journal and exceedingly well conducted, could not meet all the demands a heated campaign made upon its resources. In Austria, as everywhere, the press is potent for good and evil.

The catastrophe, a wretchedly unfortunate one though it be, will have its good effects. Catholic Socialists of Vienna, the real soldiers who bore the brunt of Lueger's valiant battles, are not at all minded to sink under the disaster. They will draw in their ranks and present again a united front to the enemy. Did they need inspiration, it is ready at hand. In an exultant paean of victory following the announcements of the Waterloo, the Liberal Neue Freie Presse proclaimed its conviction that Christian Socialism would soon lose the power it still retains in the Austrian Landtag and in the Municipal Council of Vienna. "Then we shall speedily make an end," it says, "of the union of Church and State." It is the confident hope of the enemies of the Christian Socialists successfully to play in Austria the anti-Christian policy that has wrought such desperate havoc in France and Portugal, and they realize well that the destruction of Christian Socialism or an effectual weakening of its forces will make their purpose easy of accomplishment.

To Censor Billboards

The Associated Bill Posters of the United States and Canada held a three-day session at Asbury Park, July 11-13, for the purpose of forming an iron-bound league against theatrical managers and others who seek to display objectionable posters or suggestive reading matter. As the members of the association control practically all the billboard space in the country, they have the solution of the matter entirely in their own hands. They declared their intention of serving notice on the theatrical men at once. The matter of determining what is objectionable will be left to a censorship committee.

Quite recently the Committee on Public Morals of the American Federation of Catholic Societies addressed an open letter to the various theatrical producers and managers of plays in the United States requesting their assistance in the reformation of the stage and theatrical billboards. In the letter a demand, based on the sound principles of Christian morality, was made that vulgarity, indecency and immoral suggestions be eliminated from all plays, programs, advertisements and posters; and a special request was added to the Bill Posters' Union, in accordance with the promise made to the American Federation of Catholic Societies, to take notice of the demand. The energetic action of the Committee on Morals seems destined to bring about a speedy reform of the widespread evil.

In the famous international arbitration case King George has given the award in the Alsop claim to the United States. The award concedes $935,000 to the American claimants. Last August the American Ambassador and the Chilean Minister in London presented to the British Foreign Office their respective cases on the Alsop claim, which had been submitted to King George as arbitrator. The claim was based on large sums of money advanced to the Bolivian government in 1874, Chile agreeing to assume the obligations of Bolivia to the company when Arica passed to Chile. The claim amounted to $1,500,000, and the award is somewhat less than two-thirds. The United States and Chile agreed to submit the case to the late King Edward, and after his death, to his successor, King George. Chile deposited the amount claimed in London, to be paid over in case the award was in favor of the American claimants.

LITERATURE

Lands of the Southern Cross. A Visit to South America by REV. CHARLES WARREN CURRIER, Ph. D., Delegate of the United States to the International Congress of Americanists at Buenos Aires. Washington, D. C.: Spanish-American Publication Society.

Catholics who owe all the knowledge they have of Latin America to writers not of their faith should give a warm welcome to this excellent book by Father Currier. It is an instructive and entertaining account of a four-months' tour of the chief countries and cities of South America during which the author, though his stay in many places was necessarily brief, had exceptionally good opportunities, as an Americanist delegate and as a priest, of forming a correct judgment of all he saw, as those who remember the letters sent by the author to AMERICA last year can attest. For the common run of South American travelers, however good their will, are generally quite incapable of bearing true witness to the wonderful work the Church has done and is still doing to promote the happiness and prosperity of the millions of her children who live under the Southern Cross.

The book, though written in the easy, rambling style of a tourist, is so full of accurate information of all kinds that no one meditating a like journey could ask for a better guide than Father Currier. The chapters on Argentina and Chile, the antipodal counterparts of the United States, are particularly interesting. While describing the remarkable industrial and commercial progress of these lands, the author deplores the fact that American merchants and capitalists are not making more of their opportunities, and warns them to rid themselves at once of the idea that "any old thing will do for South America."

Father Currier naturally shows keen interest in the state of the Church in the countries he visited. He speaks highly of the zeal of the clergy and the piety of the people in the southern half of the continent, but in lands like Peru there seems to be something to be desired in this respect, chiefly because not all the religious orders are exacting enough in the requirements demanded of their candidates, and some of the bishops, in sore need of clergy, have been too ready to receive into their dioceses priests who left Spain to labor in the New World.

The author of "Lands of the Southern Cross" often finds occasion to pay enthusiastic tributes to the noble army of Dominicans, Jesuits, and Franciscans who evangelized the continent or built up the Church there, and gives many facts and figures that it will help those infected with the Anglo-Saxon fever to read; so many were the churches built, the schools opened and printing presses set up by those decadent Latins.

Protestant missionaries subsidized by their American brethren are reported to be quite active in many parts of South America, though the bishops seem to have little fear of the ministers being very successful. Father Currier warns these proselytisers that while "it is comparatively easy to take away Catholicity from the Latins, it is by no means an easy task to put any other form of Christianity in its stead. They ought, therefore, to weigh the tremendous responsibility they have assumed, and the danger they are running of working in harmony with infidelity, by robbing the people of their faith, without giving anything substantial to take its place. Of course, if their sole object is to destroy the Catholic faith, they will to a certain extent be successful; but such a negative work of destruction can only call forth the abhorrence of fair-minded men."

Besides being brimful of valuable information, Father

Currier's book has in it many little personal touches that add greatly to the charm of his story. When he tells us, for example, that while in the city of St. Rose, "a cablegram awaited me that, had I accepted the offer it bore, would have entirely turned the current of my life, giving me a commanding position in the Church and in society," Father Currier's friends will recall that he here alludes to his refusal of a bishopric. Some reminiscences, further on in the volume, of his childhood days in the island of St. Kitts also make pleasant reading. Catholics who feel the need of correcting their ideas about South America should read this book.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

Saint Thomas Aquinas of the Order of Preachers. By FR. PLACID CONWAY, O.P.

Saint Bonaventure, Minister General of the Franciscan Order. By FR. LAWRENCE COSTELLOE, O.F.M. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

These two dainty little books are the first volumes of the "Friar Saints" Series, which proposes to publish at intervals the lives of a Dominican and a Franciscan saint simultaneously.

He was a gracious soul who first suggested the plan of having the brethren dwell together in the hearts of the faithful. Material will not be lacking, and the attractiveness of these two brief biographies of the great Aquinas and Bonaventure ought to make the reading public ask for more information about these twin sanctities. It is a curious combination of opposites in this case; the princely Aquinas, to whose mother a prophet foretold her son's sanctity, and whom a Pope stood sponsor for at baptism, and the obscure Bonaventure, of whose early youth very little is known, not even the name of the Friary where he first put on the Franciscan habit. But both achieved a greater nobility than the world could give them. They knew and loved each other at Paris, and both rejoiced in the contumely meted out to them when Dominicans and Franciscans were driven out of the great university with kicks and curses. Fancy St. Thomas Aquinas being forbidden to teach! But that did not disturb him. He studied only the more diligently in his enforced solitude. We heartily wish for the success of the "Friar Saints" Series.

La Esclava del Santísimo, Venerable Madre Sacramento. Por el R. P. JUAN ANTONIO ZUGASTI, S. J. Madrid: Administración de Razón y Fe, Plaza de Santo Domingo, 14, bajo. Precio, 6 pesetas en rústica y 8 en tela inglesa.

Our first impulse is to wonder how a book of 762 pages, quarto, with two photo-engravings can be put on the market at such an insignificant price, $1.20 in paper covers and $1.60 in cloth binding. The object of the publication, we take it, is to make known the life of a remarkable woman and the religious institute that she founded. Doña Micaela Demasières y López de Dicastillo was born of noble parents at Madrid, Spain, in 1809, and died in Valencia in 1865. As Viscountess of Jorbalán, she was distinguished for her love of frequent Communion and for her tenderness towards friendless or fallen girls. Eventually she took the religious habit and became the foundress of a Congregation whose special practices of devotion and charity are those which she cultivated so sedulously while still in the world. Most of the houses of the Congregation are in Spain, there being but one in America, and that in Argentina.

The life of this "valiant woman," who forsook the world for the sake of devoting herself to those whom the world had forsaken, is the old and familiar story of misunderstandings with pious but narrowminded people, of persecution and calumny from perverse people, and of final triumph over ignorance, prejudice, and ill-will. Why is it that zealous souls are so often checked and thwarted by those on whom they should naturally rely for help? It is that God's work may be glorified, for if He is pleased to communicate some little authority to man, He does not thereby lose control of His kingdom.

Need we say that the life of Madre Sacramento is distinctively a Spanish life? It ought to be, for her intention was to labor for Spanish children. For many years, while she was still groping in the dark, as it were, and uncertain of God's designs upon her, she enjoyed the counsel and direction of an illustrious Spanish Jesuit, Father Eduardo José Rodríguez de Carasa, to whom, as we read with some astonishment, she, while still a secular, had made a vow of obedience! While Jesuits have often enough lent the help of their advice in founding religious Congregations, it is surely an unusual thing for them to "admit the 'obedience' of any person."

As Viscountess of Jorbalán, Madre Sacramento had wonderful influence, even over those of her sex consecrated to God, in the way of exciting them to greater generosity in His service; as a religious, her winsome gentleness wrought prodigies in the callous hearts of the little human derelicts that came under her motherly care. Her life contains precious lessons, not only for those who are vowed to a life of zeal and charity, but also for the pious faithful whose vocation is in the world.

The Practical Flower Garden. By HELENA RUTHERFURD ELY. With Illustrations. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $2.00 net.

The cover is attractive; the frontispiece is a gem; the contents are a delight. The tired eye glowers at the man-made rocky mountains where people live in tiers; and it seems to say to the heat-breathing asphaltum, "I wish you were still in that seething Trinidad lake!" Ah, well! Let it find forgetfulness and rest by feasting on the floral good things that Mrs. Ely has spread for it. Bright bits of flower beds, velvety lawns and shady nooks all done in color, full-page half-tones by the dozen, smaller illustrations by the score, altogether, a floral feast in very truth!

Even a mere picture-book of flowers is worth having, for it must inspire elevating thoughts; but what is particularly attractive in "The Practical Flower Garden" is the amount of solid floral knowledge which it presents in a pleasant, chatty way. The hardy perennials, which so seldom get their due, receive the generous treatment that they deserve. Speaking of Dianthus Barbatius, whose blooming season is put at only three weeks, we have seen excellent results from shearing the flower stalks when they begin to look ragged; for the plant quickly puts forth another abundant crop of blossoms.

It is now eighteen years since we urged the manager of a large farm to plant black walnuts along the fences. If he could have seen any reason for doing so (and he couldn't) what an addition to the value of the property they would now be! We are glad, therefore, that Mrs. Ely comes out so strongly in favor of reforestation, even if on a modest scale, for the benefit of small rural possessions.

There is a chapter on fertilizers and plant remedies which is so detailed and explicit that even the strong commercial fertilizers will no longer, as has so often been the case, kill the plants that they are used to strengthen.

The final chapter, which ought to be well thumbed, contains a long list of shrubs, vines, plants, and bulbs with which the authoress has had good success. It is long enough and varied enough to suit all moderate needs; and the details of growing, blooming, and propagating make a selection a mere matter of choice.

For those who already have a fair knowledge of flowers, the chapter on color arrangements will furnish many helpful hints. Just one more word: We rejoice that she has restored the petunia to a place in her affections, and we also rejoice that she has thrown rudbeckia out of her garden.

Jungle Trails and Jungle People. By CASPAR WHITNEY. Illustrated. New York and London: Harper & Brothers. $3.00 net.

Mr. Whitney needs no introduction to American readers, for his books of travel in various parts of the world have already made him well known; but the present volume deserves to be specially noted, for it takes us into the Far East, of which so little is known, where man and beast take on new forms and display novel qualities. Beginning with an elephant hunt, which seems easier than a cattle drive, the author describes, in his own inimitable way, his search for the rhinoceros, the buffalo, the tiger, and other denizens of Siam and the Malay peninsula, all of which is enough to enchant a sportsman or a lover of natural history; for not only are the difficulties of the hunt graphically portrayed, but the traits of the wild beasts and hardly less wild men that he met are brought out in a most informing way. We trust, however, for the sake of their feelings, that most of those odd people may never see what the author wrote about them. The excellence and the novelty of the illustrations make us regret with the author the loss of other films by the capsizing of his craft. We may read with avidity what is said of the seladang and the muntjac and the wa wa; but we may think that we have little to learn about the tiger, so long domesticated here. Let it not be thought! Great would be our error, as the closing chapter abundantly proves. Quite incidentally, as it were, the author points out why the English succeed, and why the French fail as colonizers, or rather, as administrators of colonies.

La Comunión Frecuente y Diaria y la Primera Comunión segun las Enseñanzas y Prescripciones de Pío X. Por el R. P. JUAN B. FERRERES, S. J. Barcelona: Gustavo Gili, Editor, Calle Universidad, 45.

No stronger commendation of this third (Spanish) edition of the exhaustive work of the distinguished moralist, Father Ferreres, can be found than that contained in a letter which His Holiness Pius X directed to be sent to the author; for to have caused "lively satisfaction" to the august Pontiff is in itself no small glory.

The decree on Frequent Communion "solves questions that have been debated for fifteen centuries by the most brilliant minds, and corrects in not a few points opinions that have been put forward by distinguished doctors and eminent saints." There is hardly a book on Moral Theology which has not to be revised, to bring it into conformity with the Pope's decree, and the same may be asserted of the greater part of the "rules, constitutions, spiritual directories, regulations, prayer books, and ascetic works where they treat or speak of frequent Communion." Finally, with regard to admitting children to the Holy Table, the decree "settles questions controverted for centuries, and corrects the opinions of the greater number of theologians and canonists, and reforms a very widespread practice which was in no slight degree harmful to souls."

In the course of his commentary, the author brings in not only much liturgical erudition but also many practical "cases of conscience" which are bound to rise in schools and colleges, etc.

EDUCATION

It is to be hoped that the interest aroused by the discussion of the Carnegie Foundation, during the recent meeting of the Catholic Education Association, will not detract from the attention to be given to two other points very properly urged in the general resolutions adopted by the association. The reason impelling both recommendations is the necessity of safeguarding Catholics against the naturalistic tendencies prevailing in non-Catholic schools. The first of these suggestions strongly emphasizes the prudence of seeking advanced training under Catholic auspices. With the rapid development of our schools and colleges, Catholic teachers recognize the need of advanced training to make good our boast that educational work in institutions controlled by Catholics is no whit inferior to that done in State schools, or in private schools not directed by the Church. The desire is a healthy sign of progress among us and is to be heartily encouraged. The instruction required to achieve this advanced training should, however, be sought in such a manner as not to endanger the purity of one's Catholic faith and principle.

* * *

That grave danger confronts Catholics frequenting schools, members of whose faculties are known to be proponents of unsound economic and sociological theories, is a statement so plainly and obviously true as scarcely to need mention. The irreligious tendencies, too, which flourish in most of the big non-Catholic schools of to-day have been called to our attention in recent discussions of educational methods with a clearness that gives one every reason to question the wisdom of Catholics venturing within the pernicious influence they exert. Therefore does the association urge upon Catholic teachers the necessity of directing their pupils to Catholic institutions of higher learning.

* * *

Both of these recommendations are of prime importance. We have had occasion lately to comment editorially on the vigorous efforts being made by the Intercollegiate Socialist Society to promote the study of Socialism mainly through the formation of study groups in the colleges and universities. This is but one phase of the danger facing Catholics who seek instruction in schools other than their own. Some would hold it to be the least injurious phase of the experience certain to meet Catholics in such schools. Whatever be the measure of its harmful influence, it serves as an excellent illustration of conditions that make it imperative to use every argument with Catholics to induce them to seek what they wish among their own.

The warning contained in these two resolutions might very properly have been extended to the use of school journals, of which there are a multitude published to-day to meet every possible folly fostered by "experts" in education. Just whilst penning the foregoing, the writer's attention was called to a series of articles on "State, Church and Schools in France," published in the School Review during the months of March, April, May, and June of the current year. This review is the official magazine of the College Teachers' National Association, and circulates largely amongst teachers in the public schools. It is backed, we understand, by the Chicago University. The articles, written by David S. Muzzey, have no proper place in a supposedly non-sectarian magazine. They are insulting to Catholics, and full of small, narrow bigotry that ill-beseems a journal claiming to subserve the broad interests of higher intellectual training. One is glad to know that a strong protest against the articles was forwarded by Catholic teachers of the High School of Lawrence, Mass.

Time was when a school fortunate enough to have an assured income of $100,000 to meet the expenses of a full school year was considered an enviably prosperous institution. But we have changed all that. To-day our big schools find it possible to toss out that pittance for a phase of scholastic training almost unthought of in earlier days, and for one which, even to-day, directly benefits a very small number of the students registered in them. The report of the finances of the Yale University athletics for the year ended August 31, 1910, just made public, would have caused the eyes of early eighteenth century patrons of Old Eli to bulge with astonishment. The total cost of all university athletics was $106,092, and the receipts were $107,485, leaving a net profit of only $1,393, a much smaller one, it is said, than that of the year before. Some of the expense items make interesting reading. It cost the baseball team $2,075.50 to travel, $3,514.31 for hotel accommodations and meals, and $303.43 for shoes and repairs to same. The football men spent $1,756.79 traveling, with $5,440.18 for hotels and meals. To keep them well shod $1,325.35 was expended for shoes and repairs; and doctors and medicines cost $2,651.20. Baseball and football paid expenses, but their surplus was heavily drafted upon to meet the bills contracted by the rowing and track athletic associations.

The gentlemen making up the Simplified Spelling Board have gained another eminent ally. At the annual dinner of the Board, recently held in New York, Mr. Maxwell, the City Superintendent of the schools of Manhattan, admitted practically all they claimed as to the absurdity of our present spelling. His speech—simplifiedly spelled, of course—has been put in pamphlet form and sent all over the country, and the Board's members evidently think that it is going to advance their cause a lot. Mr. Maxwell went further than do most of the defenders of simplified spelling when he said: "The loss of time, bad as it is, is not the only evil which results to our public schools on account of our unscientific spelling. The memoriter process rendered necessary in learning to read and to spell produces disbelief in reasoning as a means of learning and a lack of confidence in inference. The result of falling into ridiculous mistakes by depending upon reasoning or analogy in spelling is to make the child timorous about reasoning in arithmetic, geography, history, and grammar. The habit of depending upon memory exclusively in spelling engenders the habit of depending on memory in every other study, and so retards progress in teaching children to think for themselves."

There are certain links in Mr. Maxwell's reasoning one is surprised to find him assuming as granted. Probably this is one reason why Manhattan's Superintendent is taken to task sharply for what he affirms. An editorial paragraph in the New York Times says, referring to this contention of Mr.

Maxwell: "Not all of that would be easy to prove. There is, indeed, more than excuse for gravely doubting whether any child ever questioned the rightness of any spelling or ever had his trust in reason, logic, or inference consciously weakened by our orthographic eccentricities. Children are not made that way and their minds do not work that way—or else the sad experience has left strangely few traces in the minds of some of us."

Writing to the School Editor of the New York Globe a well known teacher in one of Manhattan's public schools pokes fun at the advocates of the new education, who for more than a decade have been promising us a new "child" after "it" should have been educated, developed, evolved, etc., on the scientific plan, instead of the rule o' thumb plan. He quotes some recent answers to examination questions, which show "the child" of to-day to be very like his predecessors since creation's dawn. Pupils will no doubt frequently make ludicrous errors, as in the past, the New York Principal concedes, but he adds, "such errors were never more numerous than they have been since old-fashioned work and effort by 'the child' gave way to numberless 'methods' of curious titles in which every possible folly in education has been fostered by the 'experts.'"

These are some instances he quotes from recent examination papers:

"Tokio is in Ireland, according to one 'child' in 8B; according to another, southern Italy is in the central part of Rome, and the Pyrenees are in Egypt, are exactly square and took many years to build.

"Over one-third of a class of fifty recently wrote that the degrees of 'three-legged' are 'three-leggeder, three-legged-est'; and several, with formal steps in mind, said 'four-legged, five-legged.'

"Probably not fifty out of a thousand 8B pupils recently examined classified correctly ten words as to their parts of speech; few had even half of them right, and no small number had all wrong, every one of the ten, after eight years' schooling.

"A large number of pupils, developed during eight years by groupdops, formal steps, apperception, departmental teaching, and every other humbug, declared that 'five ways of sending money' included (1) bringing it yourself, (2) giving promissory notes, (3) by telephone, (4) horse and wagon, (5) by trolley, and many other such ways; one wise pupil who put an extra letter in 'send' said that five ways of 'spending' money were: (1) getting married, (2) gambling, (3) playing pool, (4) going to theatres, (5) fine clothes; surely a comprehensive view of life."

MUSIC

NON-CATHOLIC INTEREST IN CATHOLIC MUSIC

To see ourselves as others see us does not tend, generally speaking, to increase our self satisfaction. The readjustment of our point of view is apt to be downward rather than upward. In the case of our Catholic music, however, the reverse is the case. Strange as it may seem, we Catholics are inclined to be overmodest in regard to the artistic supremacy of the Church. The most eloquent praise of our Catholic painting and sculpture has been wont to come from the lips of outsiders; and we ourselves, while adoring the Church's ideals in practice, have been more slow to appreciate their expression reflected in her Art. With those outside the Church the reverse seems to be true, and they are often enabled to grasp the spiritual beauty of our Catholic ideals through the medium of Catholic art. This has long been the case with our painting, sculpture and architecture, but until recently our music has been comparatively neglected, especially in this country. It is true that the Musical Art Society, an organization directed by non-Catholics, has devoted its best efforts, ever since its inception some fifteen years ago, to rendering the music of Palestrina and his school. Much of our Holy Week music is given each year by this superb chorus, if not always with full artistic understanding at least with great sincerity of purpose, and the Concerts of the Society draw crowded houses from the most discriminating musical public of New York.

That the music of Palestrina should be wide in its appeal, however, is not surprising. Apart from its liturgical value and its potent Catholic flavor, it has a certain manner and form which more nearly approach the ordinary concept of music. But it is striking indeed to find outsiders turning with keen interest to the study of our Plain Chant. Here, it would seem, is a form of art so essentially a part of the Catholic liturgy, so intimate an expression of our own peculiar symbolism, as to be remote from the outside world. Not so, however. In a thick volume published by a non-Catholic firm for the use of non-Catholics, appears a large part of the Office of the Church translated into English, with the music of the Introits, Graduals, Alleluias and Sequences for the Sundays and principal feasts of the year; also the Vespers and many of the Breviary hymns, all in Gregorian notation. This is but a single example of the growing interest in Plain Chant. We find the modern school of composers taking their inspiration, to a large extent, from the long, undulating line of the Gregorian melodies. The formalism and inelasticity of our two modern scales, the major and the minor, are driving them to study the Gregorian modes with their variety, their freshness and spontaneity, and their emotional subtlety. But, above all, the mystic element in Plain Chant seems to make a potent appeal in a world where materialism starves the soul of the artist even as that of the Saint.

Some of the most beautiful performances of Gregorian music to be heard in this country have been given in late years at the little town of Medford, near Boston, by a non-Catholic; no less a light in the musical world than Loeffler, one of the most distinguished of the modern school of composers of which Caesar Frank might be said to be the master. Loeffler has always been a great student and lover of Plain Chant. When he settled at Medford a few years ago he conceived the idea of forming a boy choir and training them in the Gregorian modes and rhythm. He offered their services with his own to the parish priest, and for the past two years has prepared a high Mass for each of the principal feasts of the year, giving the full liturgy in pure Gregorian music, with a perfection of art and a depth of understanding and reverence which would be hard to surpass. The little church at Medford has become an artistic Mecca for the musical public of Boston, and three times a year Loeffler has been compelled to give a concert with his choir boys, the proceeds of which have gone to support the little church. He spent last summer at the Benedictine monastery of Maria Laach in order to reap the fruit of the researches of its inmates and impregnate himself to the full with the flavor of the art he loved. Nor does this love confine itself to the mere value of the music as music. Like all true artists he has penetrated beneath the surface and is growing to understand and revere that which the music expresses. A few days ago, as he was playing an accompaniment by Vincent d'Indy to the Introit for Easter, he stopped to exclaim: "Ah, how wonderfully that music expresses what the text can but vaguely suggest! Those serious, pensive Alleluias after each phrase bring before us so clearly the great price at which our redemption was purchased."

There has been no more striking instance in late years of the apostolic power of music than the conversion of Huyssmans. Here was a soul leading a life not of indifference only but of sin. He describes in his great book, "En Route," the irresistible charm which Gregorian Chant began to exercise upon him, and how he used to frequent the churches where it could be heard. Drawn by its deep spiritual beauty he began to analyze and finally to understand the spirit that gave it birth. Then he became disgusted with the life he was leading and indeed, in his bitterness, with all existence, "but stronger even than his distaste for life was his love of art, and the power of this irresistible love was at last to draw him back to God." He attended the office for Holy Week with its profound symbolism, and was deeply moved. "Grace seemed to be reaching him through the eloquent splendor of the liturgy, through the veiled sorrow of the voices, and he would leave these services exhausted in body but with his temptations against faith vanishing." To this artist's soul "the true proof of Catholicism could be found in the art to which it had given birth: The art of the Primitives in painting and sculpture, of the Mystics in poetry and prose, the Roman and Gothic in architecture, Plain Chant in music; and all these separate flames blazing, as it were, from a common centre, lighting a single altar, gave expression to a group of thoughts unique in character: reverence, adoration, service, that service which lays bare before the great Giver His own gifts—borrowed but kept immaculate—reflected in the souls of His creatures as in a faithful mirror. . . . This art, nourished by the Church, seemed to reach out to the very threshold of eternity and to God. . . ." At last one day, after listening to the Credo in Plain Chant, "he felt lifted out of himself and kept repeating over and over again: 'Can it be possible that a Faith which has created this musical certitude should be untrue in itself?'" During this crisis in his life, while his soul was wavering between the new beauty which he vaguely understood and loved, and the old way of living which held him as in a vise, one of his friends induced him to make a Retreat.

At a Trappist monastery near Paris this lover of the mystic element in art and literature came in contact for the first time with the life of mysticism. Here was the very spirit which he had so often tasted and relished in the great Mystics of the past, in Saint Teresa and Saint John of the Cross, in Ruysbroek and Saint Denys the Areopagite, in Saint Catherine of Genoa and the rest: here it was enacted before his very eyes, translated into real life. It made a profound impression upon him and before the end of the Retreat the prodigal had returned to his Father's House. What astonished many people at the time was the fact that Huyssmans' return proved to be no mere emotional conversion but a true regeneration of the whole man. He remained an ardent practising Catholic during the remaining years of his life, using his pen to extol the glories of the Church and of her art, that great winner of souls.

Is it strange that music should speak so plain a language, or that the Holy Ghost should choose this medium for approaching certain souls? To the writer it has always seemed quite natural, almost a deduction, indeed, from the fact that the Church has made music a part of her liturgical functions. Moreover, when the music that charms and converts souls is the very music of the liturgy itself, bone of its bone and flesh of its flesh, then in a true sense it is the very voice of the Church that speaks, and shares directly in the divine efficacy. On the other hand, how important it is that our music should be kept immaculate and should reflect the true spirit of Catholic prayer "as in a faithful mirror."

ECONOMICS

"Consols. 78¼, the lowest quotation in eighty years." Consols, as our readers know, is the name used for the largest part of the British national debt. It is an abbreviation of Consolidated Annuities, a term introduced in 1751, when various debts at various rates of interest were brought into one definite form. The British public, accustomed for many years to see consols almost stationary at about par, has been agitated for some time over their persistent fall. Shareholders in financial corporations which invested their reserves largely in consols are not pleased at hearing in every general meeting that large sums, which otherwise could have been distributed, have been appropriated to write off depreciation in consols. The recent failure of the Birkbeck Bank, due to this depreciation, which it could not write off, has made the agitation acute, and the public is clamoring to know why consols have fallen.

It must be noted that consols, for many years a 3 per cent. stock, were reduced in 1887 to a 2¾, and in 1903 became a 2½ per cent. stock. Nevertheless this does not reassure the British public, for as a 2¾ per cent. stock they have stood at 113, and as a 2½ per cent. at over 92. Again, compared with other European stocks, consols stand high, only French stock equalling them. German 3 per cents are quoted at 82; to equal consols, they should be 93¾. Russian 4's are at 97; Spanish 4's at 94½; Hungarian 4's at 94¼; to equal consols they should be at 125. Neither does this console the British public, which has grown up in the belief that revolution and its consequence, a variable credit, is the lot assigned by a wise Providence to the continental nations of Europe, and that the same Providence has decreed the perfect stability of the British constitution and British consols.

Here we see a reason, generally unnoticed, of the depreciation of consols. The world is losing confidence in the British constitution and the British empire. The British people is pulling the constitution to pieces. It may make a better one; but in the meantime it must pay the price. Revolution, once almost unthinkable for England, is now as much taken into account in dealing with its stocks, as in dealing with those of any other European power. As for the Empire, British fatuity may imagine that England could survive it as the first commercial nation of the world; but other people see differently, and the probability of a general break up of the Empire at no distant date, which British statesmen seem to be working for, has its effect on British credit. This view of the matter is confirmed by the fact that while British stock is falling steadily, other stock, notably German, tends to rise.

Another cause of depreciation is the amount of the national and imperial debt. The national debt of Great Britain is about 800 million pounds. Since the establishment of local government by county councils, they have contracted debts amounting to about 500 million pounds, so that the total British debt is in round figures 1,300 million pounds. The Indian debt is about 225 millions, and the colonial, growing prodigiously, 130 millions sterling. A nation may be rich, but there is a limit to its borrowing power.

The Unionists are trying to make Lloyd George's financial policy responsible for the constant decline of British credit. This may be good politics; and there is no doubt that the policy of the Government has its share in the matter. The Boer War started the decline; naval expenditure helped it: but what about its persistence? The fundamental reasons are those we have assigned.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The following is the text of the Pontifical Letter on the Madrid Eucharistic Congress sent by the Pope to Cardinal Aguirre, Archbishop of Toledo:

Beloved Son, Health and the Apostolic Blessing.

With the deepest satisfaction We learn that the Catholics who are shortly to gather in Madrid from all parts of the world, to celebrate the solemn Eucharistic Congress over which you are to preside as Our Legate, are very numerous; and when We remember the zeal for religion and the faith which characterizes especially your own people, We find it easy to realize that honors of singular magnificence are being prepared among you for the Most August Sacrament.

In truth, if it be unfitting that the Spanish people be excelled by any other in aught appertaining to the Catholic profession, it were most unfitting of all that they should ever be excelled in the cult of Our Lord dwelling with us under the mystic veils, for it is the glory of Spain to have produced that Paschalis Baylon who, because of his striking zeal on behalf of this Sacrament, has been given as the heavenly patron of Eucharistic Leagues and sodalities.

We wish for you that the gathering may shine forth not only by the great numbers who take part in it and by the splendor of its ceremonies, but also and above all by the abundance of its fruits. For all your aims should be centred on that which forms the chief object of Our cares and thoughts: the bringing of men to a better knowledge and love of Jesus Christ and a closer communion with Him. You yourselves understand that all things are contained in the devout and religious communication of the life-giving Sacrament, and that for this reason it is of prime necessity that the frequent and so also the daily use of the Eucharist should thrive among Christians, and not merely among adults, but among all who have attained the use of reason.

You will have before your minds, therefore, first of all, the principal propositions regarding this matter which are contained in recent acts of the Apostolic See, viz., the Encyclical Mirae caritatis of Our illustrious Predecessor, and Our two Decrees Sacra Tridentina Synodus and Quam Singulari, so that you may consider the best means for giving them the fullest and most happy effect throughout the whole Catholic world. Moreover, it will be for your zeal and piety to propagate more and more widely all the means that have been providentially instituted for promoting devotion to the Eucharist. We greatly approve the custom that has grown up in many places of allowing no Sunday or Feast-day to pass without having Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament for the congregation in all the churches and public oratories served by the clergy of both branches; and We would have it known that We greatly desire to see this custom introduced in other dioceses. You will also be doing something very pleasing to Us if you promote by all means in your power frequent salutations, perpetual adorations, solemn supplications to the Hidden God.

But chiefly turn your attention to a matter which no worshipper of the Divine Eucharist, duly solicitous for the eternal salvation of his brethren, has ever neglected. It is known to be a thing of too common occurrence that, on account of a false conception of humanity and kindness, a very ill service is done to the dying by not calling the priest until the last torpor of the senses has blunted the mind towards external things. Thus Christians are seen to pass away without being strengthened by the Body of Christ, the only viaticum for the heavenly country. Strive, therefore, with the utmost zeal to uproot this pernicious evil and insist with the people on this precept of true charity that those great aids to a better life be administered as soon as possible to those who are lying dangerously ill.

Finally, We heartily beseech the gifts of divine grace for your deliberations and undertakings, and as a pledge thereof and a token of Our special affection, We bestow the Apostolic Blessing most lovingly in the Lord on you Beloved Son and on all who take part in the Congress.

Given at Rome, at St. Peter's, June 5, 1911, in the eighth year of Our Pontificate.
PIUS PP. X.

SCIENCE

The varying velocity of earth tremors passing through the interior has led Professor Wiechert, of Göttingen, to the opinion that the earth consists of a central core of iron or steel, about 5,800 miles in diameter, enclosed in a stony shell 930 miles in thickness. Between the outer solid rim and the inner rock layer, covering the metallic core, he thinks there is a liquid or plastic material envelope, a trifle less than twenty miles below the earth's surface.

Statistics show that soils strongly acid are more or less sterile. This acidity, in part attributable to natural causes, is greatly increased by the use of commercial fertilizers; and students of agriculture realize the need of a reliable method for its quantitative determination. Chemical methods have been tried and found inadequate. Dr. Lipman, of Rutgers College, has suggested another and a novel test, based on certain bacteriological reactions. It is well known that the development of bacteria in culture mediums is affected by acidulation. When a certain point is reached this development is either retarded or stopped. If, then, to a neutral medium increasing quantities of acid soil be added, a point will finally be reached when the acid of the soil would prevent further organism development. The quantity of acid in the soil is determined by comparison with a series of mediums of varying reaction. It is stated that the preliminary tests have shown this method far more reliable than chemical methods. Accumulated data only can establish its absolute practicability.

Japanese engineers are using volcanic ash in combination with Portland cement. The mixture, they claim, is particularly valuable for work submerged in saline waters. Besides, the combination is possessed of a greater tensile strength than ordinary cement and is far more dense. It is also more resistant to the percolation of water. If these claims prove true, they will mean much for those countries where such ashes abound.

The experiments of Professors Hart and Peterson, of the University of Wisconsin, show that sulphur in soils, hitherto considered of little importance, affects their fertility considerably, and that, on account of improper agricultural methods, it is being rapidly exhausted. These experimenters also indicate that the failure to recognize the rôle this element plays, as compared with phosphorus and nitrogen, in benefiting the soil was due to inaccurate determinations of the soil's sulphur contents. Continuous cultivation, with insufficient fertilization, results in a heavy loss of sulphur. This loss, together with that due to drainage and the low original contents of soil, cannot be compensated for by atmospheric deposits. Quantitative tests show that one hundred normal crops of barley will exhaust the necessary sulphur of eight inches of normal soil. The fact that the subsoil has a low sulphur content indicates that the capillary water cannot supply much sulphur to the surface. The conclusion is that it is necessary to apply fertilizers rich in sulphur.

In an attempt to diminish the death-rate from sunstroke in the tropics, the United States Army, on the assumption that heat prostrations are attributable more to the chemical than to the heat rays, has been carrying on a series of experiments with clothing lined with or made of a fabric of material which does not transmit these harmful rays. Captain Phalen, U. S. A., reports from the Philippines that his experience with orange-red underwear, a supposed absorber of chemical rays, has shown no beneficial effect whatever. On the contrary, it added to the burden of the heat of the system. He concludes by stating that white and khaki clothing quite sufficiently exclude these troublesome rays.

The operation of the South Dakotan amblygonite mines has, during the past two years, reduced the price of lithium carbonate two hundred per cent. This compound is used extensively in storage batteries, in fireworks and in medicine.

A study made for the Eucharistic Congress at Madrid has brought out the interesting fact that the senior parish priest in active service in Spain is the Rev. Saturnino García y González, Pastor of Menaza, in the diocese of Burgos. He is now in his eighty-fifth year: After his ordination, he was sent as assistant to Menaza. Having served in that capacity for ten years, he became parish priest on March 5, 1851, and is still at his post. His priestly career of seventy years has been spent in one and the same parish, truly a rare, though not an unprecedented record.

The senior parish priest in point of years is the Rev. Sebastián de la Puente, of the diocese of Santander. He was born on October 13, 1811, and therefore is within a few months of his hundredth birthday. His first appointment was that of assistant in his native parish, of which he became pastor in 1841. He still holds the title of parish priest, but is relieved from all care and responsibility on account of his great age. He celebrates holy Mass, and recites the Divine Office daily; on pleasant days he enjoys a stroll, and occasionally even goes out on horseback.

Ireland was strongly represented at the Eucharistic Congress at Madrid and the papers read by the Irish delegates were among the most important assigned to the foreign sections. A remarkable incident occurred at the meeting of the Irish Section, July 4, when Dr. O'Doherty, late rector of Salamanca and Bishop-Elect of Zamboanga, the Philippines, read a paper on the Irish College of Salamanca, showing how it helped to maintain the continuity of the Eucharistic Sacrifice in Ireland during the dark days of persecution. On either side of him were sitting two distinguished general officers, and at the close of his lecture he introduced them as The O'Neill and The O'Donnell, lineal descendants of the princes of Tyrone and Tyrconnell, who made the last fight for Irish Catholic liberty. Priests, ladies and gentlemen rose to their feet and the hall resounded with Irish cheers. O'Donnell, Duke of Tetuan, assured his "old compatriots" of his inherited undying love for Ireland, the Catholic faith and the Irish people. Their blood was in his veins and he and his children, as his forefathers had done, would ever cherish this love in their heart of hearts. The O'Neill recalled Ireland's struggles for the faith. The traditions of his fathers were handed down to him, and though in the lapse of ages they had become sons of Spain, he and The O'Donnell were Catholics first of all, and were proud to call themselves Irishmen. All the visitors were introduced to the two Irish princes and their families, and a body of priests sang "O'Donnell Aboo." Members of the Young Men's Spanish Catholic League responded with "The March of O'Donnell," one of the national songs of Spain.

The annual convention of the Pennsylvania State Federation of German Catholic Societies came to a close with the celebration of Solemn High Mass on July 11. All the delegates attended in a body. At the business meeting it was shown that the 275 societies included in the federation have 18,000 members, a large increase. Twenty-eight societies were organized during the year. Johnstown was chosen for the next annual meeting and Allentown for the convention in 1913. The resolutions adopted declare for: Fidelity to the Holy See and the Church authorities; higher purposes in the societies; support of the Catholic press; indissolubility of the marriage tie; religious training for the young; sympathy and legitimate efforts to better the condition of the working classes; condemnation of immoral plays and literature; perpetuation of the language of the Fatherland; strong opposition to the use of stimulants; pride in American citizenship.

The following is the official call for the coming convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies:

The Tenth National Convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies will be held in Columbus, Ohio, on August 20 to 23. The aim of Federation is Catholic unity. With a united Catholic laity the interests of our Church and our people will be safeguarded. The hope of Federation is for an exalted Catholic citizenship, which shall contribute to the prosperity of the land we love and to the perpetuity of our republican institutions.

We appeal to every National Catholic organization, Diocesan, State and County Federation to send representatives to the coming convention. Parish delegates, associate membership promoters, and representatives from individual societies where Federation is not organized will be welcomed. We request the bishops and priests of the country to attend the convention in person or to urge representative laymen to do so. Leo XIII and Pius X have approved and blessed the work of Federation. In order to secure the permanency of Federation we invite all Catholics to become Associate Members thereof.

The Right Rev. Bishop Hartley, of Columbus, is a stalwart friend of Federation. We appeal to the Catholics of the United States, by their attendance, to aid in making the convention a success, so that the good Bishop may not be disappointed. The local committee has been active for several months in preparing for the reception of delegates, who will receive a most cordial welcome in the State capital of Ohio.

As the convention this year will be held at a central point, we look forward to the largest attendance in the history of Federation. Arrange your vacation so that you may participate in the great movement, which has for its shibboleth, "God and Country." Come to Columbus on August 20.

EDWARD FEENEY,

National President.

The Catholic Laymen's League for Retreats and Social Studies will take title to its property, Fox Hill Villa, near Fort Wadsworth, Staten Island, on July 27. The first retreat will be held there Aug. 11-14. Meanwhile a moderate sum of money is being expended on the house, a very large one, so that it will accommodate forty to fifty guests. Lack of funds prevents some other improvements, but the place is most attractive as it is. The Social Studies classes will, it is announced, begin about October 15. An outline of the courses is now in preparation and will be issued by September 1. It is now planned that these studies will be conducted in the rooms of the Fordham University Law School. These rooms are to be changed from the present Vesey street address to new and larger quarters in Nassau street.

So far as the projectors know, this Laymen's League and its work are the first things of their type in this country. The Fox Hill site is not simply for New York City, nor is its accommodation exclusively for Catholic men. It is for the entire eastern part of the country, and the project has received the cordial approval of the authorities of the Brooklyn and Trenton dioceses as well as of New York. In retreats held on Keyser Island, Protestant laymen have taken part, and they are to be invited to the new Staten Island site.

The Sacred Heart Review devotes a page to a description of St. Margaret's Hospital, the latest addition to the many charities for which Boston is noted. The new hospital is the gift to the Boston archdiocese in memory of their mother, of the Rev. Peter Ronan, Pastor of St. Peter's Church, Dorchester, and the late Rev. Michael Ronan, of Lowell. The hospital is open chiefly to maternity cases, but a limited number of surgical cases, such as appendicitis and the like, according as there may be room and conveniences for them, will be received. A special feature of the new hospital is the establishment of an "open staff," which allows each patient to have the services of her own family physician, and which also extends to any physician in good standing the privilege of caring for his own surgical or maternity cases.

Bishop-elect Joseph Patrick Lynch, of Dallas, Texas, was consecrated, July 12, in Dallas Cathedral, by Archbishop Blenk of New Orleans, assisted by Bishop Gallagher of Galveston and Bishop Morris of Little Rock. Very Rev. Michael F. Ryan, President of Kenrick Seminary, St. Louis, delivered the sermon. The civic officials and citizens of all denominations attended the functions and otherwise paid special tribute of respect to the newly consecrated prelate. An account of Bishop Lynch's career was published in AMERICA, March 11, the time of his appointment to succeed the late Bishop Dunne.

The promising outlook for the Church in Korea and the vast extent of that missionary field have impelled the Holy Father to create a new Vicariate Apostolic in the southern portion. The new division will embrace the civil prefectures of Kieng-Syang and Tiyen-la, and will henceforth be known as the Vicariate-Apostolic of Tai-Kou, the name of one of the cities in the south. The remaining territory will be known as the Vicariate-Apostolic of Seoul, which will be in charge of the former Vicar Apostolic of Korea, Mgr. Gustave Mutel, appointed by the Holy See in 1890. The new territory, like the rest of Korea, will be under the Fathers of the Foreign Mission of Paris, in recognition of their heroic labors and sacrifice during the eighty years of its missionary history. In 1866 the Christians of Korea numbered 25,000, who were ministered to by two bishops and ten missionaries. A terrible persecution then broke out; the two bishops and seven missionaries were taken and executed; numbers of the laity also suffered martyrdom, while others perished of hunger and distress in the mountains. The process, or formal declaration, of the martyrdom of the two bishops, of the seven missionaries, and of twenty of the principal Christians, was sent to the Congregation of Rites in 1901. The following statistics show the state of the missions in Korea in 1907: 1 bishop; 46 French missionaries; 10 Korean priests; 11 French Sisters; 41 Korean Sisters; 72 schools for boys, with 1,014 pupils; 5 schools for girls, with 191 pupils; 2 orphanages, with 28 boys and 261 girls; 379 orphans placed in families; 2 pharmacies;

1 seminary, with 22 preparatory students and 9 theological students; 48 churches or chapels; 48 districts; 931 Christian parishes; 63,340 baptized Christians, and 5,503 catechumens under instruction.

PERSONAL.

Dr. O'Dwyer, Bishop of Limerick, celebrated the Silver Jubilee of his Episcopate, June 29. At his request there was no public celebration, but all the corporate and educational bodies of the diocese sent him resolutions of congratulation. Born in Holycross, Tipperary, 1842, and educated in the Jesuit College, Limerick, and at Maynooth, Dr. O'Dwyer was a curate in Limerick when he was elected Bishop in 1886. He was never afraid to stigmatize actions and policies which he deemed injurious, but his zeal and ability as a churchman and educationalist, and his strong defence at critical times of Ireland's social and political rights have won him the respect of all classes and the affection of his people. His public addresses and trenchant articles in magazines and journals advocating a University for Catholics, and his evidence before the parliamentary commission had much influence in securing the Irish National University. In a Lenten Pastoral he urged, on Catholic grounds, the restoration of the Gaelic language and ideals, and he issued last year one of the most convincing expositions of the necessity for self-government, and, as a means thereto, of a party united in action and supported by the people.

Archbishops Quigley, Ireland, Messmer, and Glennon, with Bishop Schrembs of Grand Rapids, Rev. Julius E. De Vos, President of the Catholic Colonization Society, and a number of Western priests interested in colonization projects, met in Chicago on July 11 to inaugurate the recently formed Catholic Colonization Society of the United States.

"A national association such as we are working out is necessary because emigration affects every class of society," said Archbishop Messmer, in explanation of the meeting, "the workman as well as the professional man, the men working in factories as well as those upon the farms. It is a national movement, and will be conducted systematically in every diocese throughout this great country. It will be a potent factor in checking Socialism; it will eliminate evils which now confront many who come to our shores, and will have the cooperation of Catholic laymen as well as clergy."

"We are here," added Archbishop Glennon, "to work out a concrete plan of nation-wide Catholic colonizations. The colonization movement is not a land agency scheme or a speculative proposition.

Thousands of Catholics of the Latin and Slavonic nations come yearly to our shores from the most civilized agricultural regions in Europe. Our plan is to have them go directly to agricultural settlements instead of settling down in congested and crowded cities."

As a result of this meeting, the projectors announce, the business of building colonies throughout the United States along the lines laid down by the organization will soon begin and proceed as fast as the land can be examined and passed upon by agents of the Society and contracts drawn up and signed by the parties interested.

In the contracts made with the land companies provision will be made for church, house, school and sisters' residence, ground for cemetery, means for the support of a priest in charge of colony, and the covering of the expenses of the operation of the Society itself.

Opportunities will soon be afforded for the incoming Catholics to the United States, as well as for those already here and who wish to move from one place to another, to take up farm land and engage in agricultural industries, to find fruitful homes in all sections of the country. Varieties of soils, products and climates will be offered to suit the various people who form the colonies, the size of farms varying according to ability to purchase and the needs and requirements of those engaged in the industry of farming.

The best possible terms will be secured for the buyers of land, and with good soil, pure water, profitable products, sound title to land, church accommodations, school facilities and market conveniences, no one should be afraid to undertake the work of farming in a Catholic colony. Provision will be made in every colony for 100 families and 100 farms. The offices of the Society are at 314-315 The Temple Building, Chicago.

OBITUARY

The Marquis Charles J. de Bouthillier-Chauvigny died in Boston, July 8, aged fifty-four. About a year ago he was invited to give a lecture or conversazione at Harvard, where he made so favorable an impression that he was offered the position of lecturer on French history. Before accepting the offer he let it be understood that he would lecture from the Catholic viewpoint, which he held to be the only true one. President Lowell declared that he wished only the truth of history to be taught and with this understanding the position was accepted. The Marquis was a daily communicant. He was well known in Canada, where for 22 years he lectured on literature, French history, politics and educational subjects.

CHRONICLE

Reciprocity Bill Passed.—By a vote of almost two to one the Senate, on July 22, passed the Canadian reciprocity bill without amendment. On the final roll-call the Senate stood 53 to 27, 32 Democrats and 21 Republicans voting for the bill, and 3 Democrats and 24 Republicans voting against it. Thus the establishment of reciprocal trade relations between the United States and Canada has been accomplished, so far as legislation in the United States can effect it. The Canadian enacting measure is still pending in the Parliament at Ottawa.

Population Moving Westward.—According to an announcement of the Census Bureau on July 17, the centre of population of the United States is four and one-quarter miles south of Unionville, Monroe County, Ind. Since 1900, when it was six miles southeast of Columbus, Ind., it has moved thirty-one miles westward and seven-tenths of a mile northward. The westward movement was more than twice that of the 1890-1900 decade. This acceleration of the westward movement is attributed by census officials principally to the growth of the Pacific and southwestern States. The geographical centre of the United States is in northern Kansas, so that the centre of population, therefore, is about 550 miles east of the geographical centre of the country.

Dr. Wiley's Statement.—Dr. Wiley's reply to the charges against him is in substance this: (1) That he did agree to pay Dr. Rusby, pharmacologist expert, $50 a day for every day spent in court and $20 a day for every day devoted to laboratory work. (2) That this agreement was approved by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Auditor, and that the Solicitor for the Department of Agriculture, George P. McCabe, had knowledge of it before it became effective. (3) That the law provides for the employment of help at $1,600 a year, and that Dr. Rusby's contract provides that he was to work only the number of days at $50 or $20 a day which at the end of a year would bring his total salary up to $1,600. In other words, that the law was not violated. (4) That the charge of technically violating the law is not the animus of the charges. (5) That the animus of the charges is a defined and concrete campaign on the part of certain officials of the Department of Agriculture to force him out of the service.

Secretary of Agriculture Wilson, in whose department the trouble arose, and who in the first instance presented the charges, with the findings of the "personnel board," to the President, has been directed by the President to pass upon the case. The President will not act until the Secretary of Agriculture assumes the responsibility in an episode which is admittedly one of the most embarrassing of Mr. Taft's administration.

Reading Railway Suit.—The Government filed a suit in the Federal Court, Philadelphia, to compel a bone fide dissociation of the Reading Railway Company from the Reading Coal Company. This is in line with the Government's determination to separate the coal carrying railroads from their virtual control of the coal business, and parallels its recent action against the Lehigh Valley.

As in the suit against the Lehigh Valley, the Government charges that the Reading Coal Company and its subsidiaries are buying anthracite from independent operators along the line of the Reading Railway, with the object of destroying competition, transporting it to market at a loss, and there regulating the selling price. The coal company loses on such transactions, the Government alleges, that the railway company may profit from the freight charges.

As additional proof that the coal company is not a bona fide corporation, but a mere adjunct of the railroad and a device for evading the commodities clause of the interstate commerce law, the Government charges that the officers of the railway company and the coal company are the same; that the railway company has advanced more than $70,000,000 to the coal company, which is carried as an open charge. The Government cites that the railway company has paid as high as 4 per cent. for money for the coal company's operations, while the coal company has seldom paid any interest at all, and never more than 2 per cent. to the railway company.

Blue and Gray on Historic Field.—How far the animosities engendered by the Civil War are dying out was well exemplified by the unique observance of the fiftieth anniversary of the first battle of Bull Run. On July 21 veterans of the Union and the Confederate Armies met on the historic battle-field and fifty Union army men clasped hands with fifty former Confederates in picturesque greeting on the spot where they once fought. The presence of the official Commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, President Taft, rendered the occasion still more impressive and significant. At the gathering were several United States Senators, the Solicitor General, 250 Confederate and 50 Union veterans, and some 3,000 Virginians and Washingtonians of later generations. Mr. Taft, in his address, took occasion to announce that England and France were ready to sign a universal arbitration treaty with the United States, that the treaty might be signed in ten days, and that at the end of that time he hoped to have three other countries join in the signing. He did not go so far as to indicate the nations that he had in mind, but it was generally believed that he referred to Germany, Italy and the Netherlands. Japan ultimately may come into the far-reaching peace pact, but the negotiations with that empire are said to be merely tentative.

Mexico.—Francisco I. Madero and his able assistant, Juan Sánchez Azcona, have received the thirty-third degree of Freemasonry, Scottish rite, the highest granted by the organization.—Owing to the corruption that had so long prevailed in judicial circles the portfolio of justice was the most important in the cabinet, for any attempt to bring the judges to an accounting depended upon the minister that held it. This important post has been committed to Señor Calero, an ardent partisan of Diaz, whose antecedents indicate immunity for the rascals who have made a mockery of the law in their official actions. "The aurora of the leader has been eclipsed," is the comment of an observer.—The work of precipitating a counter-revolution is rapidly gaining ground. Some Diaz adherents have established headquarters in San Antonio, Texas, and have emissaries at work in Mexico. Consignments of arms and ammunition have been sent to Eagle Pass in such quantities that the press are advocating an appeal to Washington for the enforcement of the neutrality laws.—The frequent armed encounters in different parts of the republic have prompted Madero to say that President De la Barra permits them in order to discredit the revolution. The incident at Puebla was more serious than was at first believed, for the Federal troops fired upon unarmed Maderists. More regulars have been sent from the capital.—The return of General Reyes to his former post as Minister of War will tend, it is hoped, to quiet the widespread unrest. He had been assured of that position in case of the election of Madero. Bloody riots took place in Oaxaca between the partisans of the rival candidates for the governorship, Juárez and Díaz. The former had the support of the Indians, and the latter of the whites and mestizos. Neither candidate has the qualifications demanded by the Constitution of Oaxaca, and both have been requested to retire.

Canada.—The Builders' strike in Vancouver is over. Employers were willing to give an increase of wages, but insisted on an open shop. The strike has been settled on these conditions. The colliery strike in Alberta and Eastern British Columbia continues without prospect of settlement, and threatens serious evil for the coming winter.—Australian manufacturers are urging the Commonwealth Government to take up preferential trade with Canada.—It is reported that in view of the increase of trade in the Pacific after the completion of the Panama Canal, a company of French and German capitalists have taken an option on waterfront properties in Victoria and Vancouver for a million and a half dollars.—As usual, the newspapers exaggerated grossly the losses in the Porcupine district forest fires. The loss of life is fixed now at between 60 and 70, and the total responsibilities of insurance companies at $250,000.—The Orangemen throughout Canada celebrated July 12 with enthusiasm. Their preachers addressed them vigorously on the "Ne temere" decree and the sins of the Pope. Our readers will not be surprised to learn that not a single one took for his text: "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor."—Canada has had an international dispute all its own with no less a power than Germany. It seems that the first lieutenant of the Bremen, now at Montreal, spoke slightly of the fighting capacity of the Canadian navy, i. e., the Niobe, and official Montreal took umbrage. The commander of the Bremen explained, however, and Germany and Canada consider the incident closed.

Great Britain.—Local seamen's strikes occurring from time to time show that the matter is not fully settled, but rather that the sailors and their friends have made a truce only. Such a strike at Cardiff has made 6,000 dockers and seamen idle and detains a large number of ships. There has been rioting and police have been brought from London.—The naval airship, Mayfly, is justifying its name. In answer to a question put some ten days ago in parliament, the Government stated that it might fly in the course of the following week.—Lord Charles Beresford and his friends are attacking the Government on account of the unprotected condition of British commerce, which exposes the nation to the danger of having its food cut off. Mr. Balfour has identified himself with them in their demand for more cruisers, oblivious of the fact that the present situation is the result of the naval policy adopted by his administration. Anyhow, even if the cruisers existed, it is hard to see how they could be manned, as it is difficult to procure men sufficient for the existing navy.—Steps have been taken to amend the treaty with Japan, so as to exclude from its defensive provisions any nation with which England may conclude an arbitration treaty. As this concerns especially the United States, which, rightly or wrongly, many Japanese hold to be their most probable adversary, the amendment is not very pleasing to Japan. It is interesting, nevertheless, as showing how arbitration treaties may be wrecked.—The extreme Egyptian Nationalists resent the appointment of Lord Kitchener as British Agent, and their newspapers give way to loud revilings of him.—The Atlantic Steamship companies have raised first and second-class fares by 10 shillings, in order to provide for the increased wages promised the seamen in settlement of the strike.—Two valuable necklaces were stolen during the coronation festivities, one at the opera, and the other at the Duchess of Westminster's ball. In both cases ladies of social standing are suspected of the theft. The police are trying to get the jewels back. But, if they are unsuccessful, there may be some scandal, as they say they have certain clues.

Ireland.—The Committee appointed by the Irish Party to consider the National Insurance Bill submitted amendments on the following lines, which were approved: Separate Irish Insurance Fund, with separate Irish commissioners and administration. Elimination of the medical benefit, the Irish medical relief system being sufficient. A smaller contribution from employers and employed, as the majority affected are a "first-class risk." Exclusion of persons working for parents, migratory and casual laborers, home workers, and houses of refuge. Limitation of unemployment insurance to the county Boroughs, and local administration through the County Councils. The savings effected by these changes to be credited to the Irish Insurance Fund. A resolution was passed condemning the Independent, the most widely circulated daily in Ireland, for insidious attacks on the Irish Party. The Independent insists that its criticism has been fair and honest, and that as a Nationalist journal it shall continue so to express itself on matters of prime importance to the nation.—Mr. Healy outlined at Mallow the attitude of the O'Brien following on Home Rule. If an inadequate measure was offered and the Irish members accepted it as a stepping-stone to better things, he would support them; but he would be no party to accepting any measure as a final settlement which did not give Ireland control of its own taxation, so that what was raised in Ireland should be spent in and on Ireland. The Irish Party was taunted with undue subjection to the Liberals just at the time that the Orange leaders were accusing the Government of "grovelling at the feet of Mr. Redmond." A striking pronouncement in favor of a strong Home Rule Bill was made by Sir Edward Morris, Premier of Newfoundland, at Galway, where he addressed a meeting advocating that port as the terminal of a line connecting Ireland with Canada. Ireland needed a measure that would enable her to protect and foster industries, whether by tariff laws or bounties, and give her everything short of separation from England, which would not be beneficial to either country.—King George made no visit to "the Dublin slums," as some American papers reported, but did enter an humble part of the city to open formally the P. F. Collier Memorial Tuberculosis Dispensary, erected by Mr. Robert J. Collier, of New York, in memory of his father. The King left $5,000 for the Dublin poor, and appointed a committee for the apportionment among the city and county hospitals of $250,000, donated for that purpose by Lord Iveagh. Lord Iveagh has also donated a site for the new buildings of the National University.

Portugal.—As a precaution against a possible monarchist invasion, the Government has a force of twenty-five thousand troops near the Spanish frontier.—After noisy and undignified protests, the Constituent Assembly adjourned for half an hour out of respect for the deceased Queen Maria Pia, grandmother of Manoel. Business is still in a panicky condition, the custom house receipts for the past month having fallen two hundred thousand dollars below the average.—In the diocese of Oporto two hundred and sixty-nine priests have rejected the proposed Government pensions and fifteen have accepted them. O Grito do Povo, a newspaper of the city, publishes the names of these fifteen "venerable brethren of the ecclesiastical [Carbonari] 'hut' of Oporto."—The aged Bishop of Vizeu, José Dias Correia de Carvalho, died on June 25, at the age of eighty-one. During his incumbency he raised the diocesan seminary to a high standard of excellence, built at his own expense a hall for the Catholic Circle, which he had founded, and established a night refuge for the homeless.—In view of the attitude of passive resistance assumed by the bishops and most of the clergy towards the Separation Law, the administration has requested them to suggest such modifications in it as they deem necessary. This is through no love for religion, but, rather, because foreign powers, including even France, have signified that the so-called Separation Law will not be regarded, as far as it purposes to affect their citizens residing in Portugal.

Spain.—Twenty armed frontier guards belonging to Portugal penetrated to the Spanish town of Villar de Vos, two miles from the border, where they seized the Rev. Augusto C. Arpais, a Portuguese priest, whom they cruelly ill-used and carried off to Portugal. It is reported that he died in jail from the effects of their brutal treatment. Canalejas has ordered an investigation.—The Government has ordered the enlistment of a native regiment in Melilla.—The attitude of Germany towards French activity in Morocco leads Spain to hope that Morocco will remain independent, or that its territory will not go to France exclusively.—It is stated that along the route of the Eucharistic procession the only important edifice that showed no decorations and gave no sign of being inhabited was the Italian embassy. Señor Norberto Torcal, AMERICA's regular correspondent at Madrid, was appointed by Cardinal Aguirre to make out the report of the Eucharistic Congress which was sent to Rome.

France.—The French Consular Agent was arrested at El Ksar by a Spanish patrol, and explanations are being demanded. The French press was intensely excited until the Spanish Government sent its expression of regret.—M. Chéron, of the Budget Commission, placed a report before the Deputies showing an actual net shortage of 125,000,000 francs between revenues and expenditures, but he expressed the hope that later payments would reduce it to about 70,000,000. The last budget was rushed through in one night.—George Duruy, the son of ex-Minister Victor Duruy, who is regarded as the originator of the lay-school, says in the Journal des Débats that his illustrious father would be shocked at the lay-school such as it has become to-day. He would have never wished it to be anti-religious, as it is to-day. He makes this declaration in view of the lay-school centenary, which is about to be celebrated.

Germany.—The Catholic teachers of Germany may be relied upon to keep clearly before the people the stand the Church takes regarding lay or neutral or non-religious schools. In its recent well-attended congress in Kaiserslautern, in the Palatinate, the association of Catholic teachers of the empire renewed its strong expression of disapproval and condemnation of a school program in which religious instruction finds no place. In passing this resolution the association claimed to be but voicing the traditional policy of the German people in the matter of state-aided schools. In the official program of studies for public or state schools religious instruction has always held an honored place, and it has always been reputed the most important branch in popular instruction. The association of Catholic teachers referred to was organized some years back to oppose the growing tendency to change this policy in the public schools. A league, composed of public or state school teachers avowedly in sympathy with lay or neutral instruction, is using every influence to have religious instruction barred from the school program. It was against the plotting of this latter body that the Bavarian Bishops issued their joint letter of protest some months ago. The Catholic Teachers' Association is a strong body. It numbers to-day 19,674 members, as opposed to 649, who composed its working body in 1890. It is particularly strong in Prussia and in North Germany, where 90 per cent. of the Catholics teaching in the State schools are on its register rolls. In South Germany, where, because of the Catholicity of the people, the need of organization was up to this not so severely felt, the association is not so strong. Recent tactics of the neutral school defenders in Bavaria, however, have given new impetus to the association's growth. The flourishing condition of the body gives excellent reason to feel assured that Catholics will not be found wanting in leadership when the fight against religion in the public schools shall have become hot. This all the more because the association makes its first rule of conduct that decree of Frederick the Great published November 3, 1765: "In the matter of religious instruction, Catholic teachers are obliged to conform to the regulations imposed by their bishops."

Austria-Hungary.—The new parliament began its sessions with the formal opening exercises at the Hofburg, Vienna, July eighteenth. Emperor Francis Joseph presided, and the customary elaborate ceremonial marked the occasion. All the archdukes were present, and a large gathering from both the upper and lower houses joined in the opening exercises. The Emperor read his speech from the throne in a strong, clear voice, and, to the delight of his people, showed little evidence of the wearing effect of his recent illness. His Majesty emphasized the necessity for the immediate reorganization of the army, to make good the deficiencies of the past and to keep pace with "the development of military forces which is everywhere progressing rapidly." He expressed the hope that the blessing of peace will continue assured to the dual kingdom, basing his trust on Austria-Hungary's "intimate relations with her allies, which are unalterably cordial, as well as upon the friendly relations which the monarchy is cultivating with all the powers." "The necessity for the creation of new financial resources was called to the attention of the new Reichsrath, and announcement was made that Government would give special consideration to the development of foreign commerce

The "Encyclopædia Britannica"

II.

At the banquet given at Claridge's in London to celebrate the birth of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" the editor-in-chief, Mr. Hugh Chisholm, volunteered the information that he "did not think there was anything in the new edition which could reasonably be a cause of offense." Mr. Chisholm should be more apologetic in presenting such a conglomerate work to the public.

It is true that in all likelihood there will not be the slightest murmur of displeasure or disapproval from the enthusiastic Encyclopædia subscribers—lawyers, judges, senators, physicians, and even professors and presidents of colleges though they were—whose letters were not only published, but photographed, and who came to grief on the word Britannica itself, some insisting upon two ts, others on one n, and others again duplicating both consonants; nor from those who rejoiced in the fact that the great work had distinction of style and was going to give them a university education, which they evidently lacked, and of whose requirements they had no conception; nor from such profound scholars as "the two sets of ex-President Eliot's grandchildren," for whom he had "bought two copies and who were delighted with the book"; nor from those who agreed with the American Ambassador to Great Britain when he informed his hearers at the banquet that he "believed it was an American definition of education to know something about everything," which implies knowing nothing well; nor even from those who applauded his extraordinary laudation of the work when, with something like an acquired British hesitancy, he again "believed that it is the general judgment of the scholars and the investigators of the world that the one book to which they can go for the most complete, comprehensive, thorough, and absolutely precise statements of fact upon every subject of human interest is the 'Encyclopædia Britannica'"—an amazing pronouncement, which, in its dogmatic positiveness, its assumption of infallibility, and the amplitude and multitude of the articles of belief which it insists on our accepting, was never equaled by all the Popes and General Councils combined. With all due respect for our illustrious fellow-countryman, the utterance is a most superlative absurdity, unless it was intended to be an exercise of that playful and elusive American humor which the apperceptions of our English cousins so often fail to seize, much less appreciate.

It is unnecessary to state that there are at least some people in the world who will balk at the universal inerrancy and completeness claimed for the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and refuse to go to it for the most "comprehensive, thorough and absolutely precise statements on every subject of human interest."

The family of Thomas Carlyle, for instance, may be credited with not being unreasonable when they find fault with the incomplete and incorrect information vouchsafed about their distinguished relative. Writing to the London Times, their indignant representative informs the public that "the article was evidently written many years ago, before the comparatively recent publication of new and authentic material, and nothing has been done to bring it up to date." "As far as I know," he continues, "none of the original errors has been corrected, and many others of a worse nature have been added." The list of authorities on Carlyle's life affords evidence of ignorance or partisanship.

Evidently the great man's family, and the public in general, have a reasonable cause of offense, and they may also conclude that if the "Encyclopædia Britannica" can blunder and mislead when handling such an approachable and easy British subject as Carlyle, it can be reasonably expected to do worse on other matters which are not only absolutely foreign, but intensely distasteful to the uninformed and prejudiced scribes to whom they seem to be so frequently, if not systematically, assigned.

Another objection may be cited from one of the laudatory letters which the publishers have given to the world to advertise this vast commercial enterprise, namely, that "the point of view of the Encyclopædia is too rationalistic"—a serious objection, we submit, especially for clergymen, in this age of irreligion. Another finds fault with "the limited bibliography of the articles; there being an especial neglect of the more recent German literature." As the editor repeatedly insists that the "Encyclopædia Britannica" is absolutely up to date, and as a perfect bibliography is essential to an Encyclopedia of any pretence, this objection is serious and ought to commend itself for consideration to the Advisory Board on behalf of the Germans. The critic goes on to say: "I examined a good many of your articles and found them with the English and French bibliographies given undue place." No doubt the scholars of other nationalities will note this reprehensible limitation of the Encyclopædia's erudition. But these are venal offenses compared with what we have in mind, namely, the shocking manner in which Catholic subjects are handled by the "Enclopædia Britannica."

It is true that in the minds of some of their enemies especially in certain parts of the habitable globe, Catholics have no right to resent anything that is said of their practices and beliefs, no matter how false or grotesque such statements may be; and, consequently, we are not surprised at the assumption by the "Encyclopædia Britannica" of its usual contemptuous attitude. Thus, for instance, on turning to the articles "Casuistry" and "Roman Catholic Church" we find them signed "St. C." Naturally and supernaturally, to be under the guidance of a Saint C. or a Saint D. always inspires confidence in a Catholic; but this "St. C." turns out to be only the Viscount St. Cyres, a scion of the noble house of Sir Stafford Northcote, the one time leader of the House of Commons, who died in 1887. In the Viscount's ancestral tree we notice that Sir Henry Stafford Northcote, first Baronet, has appended to his name the title "Prov. Master of Devonshire Freemasons." What "Prov." means we do not know, but we are satisfied with the remaining part of the description. The Viscount was educated at Eton, and Merton College, Oxford. He is a layman and a clubman, and as far as we know is not suspected of being a Catholic. A search in the "Who's Who?" failed to reveal anything on that point, though a glance at the articles over his name will dispense us from any worry about his religious status.

We naturally ask why he should have been chosen to enlighten the world on Catholic topics? "Because," says the Editor of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," complaining to AMERICA of certain strictures on the article "Jesuits" in the Encyclopædia, "the Viscount St. Cyres has probably more knowledge of the development of theology in the Roman Catholic Church than any other person in that Church."

We were unaware that the Church had at its disposal such a source of information. It will be news to many, but we are inclined to ask how the Viscount acquired that marvelous knowledge. It would require a life-long absorption in the study of divinity quite incompatible with the social duties of one of his station. Furthermore, we should like to know whence comes the competency of the Editor to decide on the ability of the Viscount, and to pass judgment on the correctness of his contribution? That also supposes an adequate knowledge of all the dogmatic, moral and mystic theologians ever wrote, a life-long training in the language and methods of the science, and a special intellectual aptitude to comprehend the sublime speculations of the Church's divines.

It will not be unkind to deny him such qualifications, especially now, for did he not tell his friends at the London banquet: "During all these [seven] years I have been busy in the blacksmith's shop [of the Editor's room] and I do not hear the noise that is made by the hammers all around me"—nor, it might be added, does he hear what is going on outside the "Britannica's" forge.

Meantime, we bespeak the attention of all the Catholic theologians in every part of the world to the preposterous invitation to come to hear the last word about "the development of theology" in the Roman Catholic Church from a scholar whose claim to theological distinction is that "he has written about Fénelon and Pascal." The "Britannica" shows scant respect to Catholic scholarship and Catholic intelligence.

Evidently no well-informed man will accept such an authority. Hence, only a few of his views may be quoted. He tells us, for instance, that the term "Romish Catholicism, which is as old as the days of Queen Elizabeth, is inoffensive to Roman Catholics"; that "St. Alfonso Liguori won for himself a dubious reputation in the unsavory field of casuistry"; that under Pius IX "the faithful were encouraged to drown all tendency to thought in an ever increasing flood of sensuous emotionalism"; that "theologians might draw fine-spun distinctions about Infallibility, but Pius IX knew that loyal Catholic common sense would brush their technicalities aside and hold that on any conceivable question the pope was fifty times more likely to be right than any one else"; that Pius IX "had fed on inspirations"; that "Christian socialism becomes a real force when it translates itself into Anti-Semitism"; that "Modernism, which was condemned in bitter and scathing language, may yet prove the opening chapter of a mighty revolution within the Church of Rome"; that "once get a sinner to confession and the magical words of absolution would make him a new man. As for most penitents, all they cared for was to scrape through by the skin of their teeth." But enough of the Viscount.

In the article on the "Papacy," by another writer, we find such morsels as the following: "Leo XIII is distinguished by the great number of persecutions, prosecutions and injuries inflicted on Christian savants, from the prosecution of Antonio Rosmini down to the proscription directed against the heads of the American Church." "On surveying the situation, certain weak points in the policy of the Vatican under Leo XIII are manifest to a contemporary observer. (1) An unmistakable decline of religious fervor in church life. (2) The intensifying and nurturing of the passions and questionable practices which are so easily encouraged by practical politics. (3) An ever increasing displacement of all the refined, educated and nobler elements of society by such as are rude and uncultured." "The worship of Mary, largely developed during the reign of Pius IX, received further stimulus from Leo; nor did he do anything during his pontificate to correct the superstitions connected with popular beliefs concerning relics and indulgences."

In the article on "Celibacy," which is written by George Gordon Coulton, M.A., we are informed that the Catholic doctrine on celibacy "was more or less consciously influenced by the Manichæan tenet of the diabolical origin of matter, including the human body, but churchmen were also naturally tempted to compete in asceticism with many heretics who held this tenet and whose abstinence brought them so much popular consideration."

Of St. Catherine of Sienna we are told that "her innate humanity and sound sense led her to give up her life of seclusion and to return to her place in the family circle." With regard to her stigmata, "it should be remembered that she and her circle were Dominicans, and that the stigmata of St. Francis of Assisi were considered the exclusive boast of the Franciscans, and hence Sixtus IV, himself a Franciscan, issued a decree insisting that St. Francis had an exclusive monopoly of this particular wonder." It would be hard to surpass that in mockery.

What Catholics will resent most of all relates to the Mother of Our Saviour. We cite a few examples, with apologies to our readers: "Of her parentage nothing is recorded in any extant document of the first century." "She became the mother of Jesus Christ and afterwards had other children." "Her perpetual virginity was of no importance in the eyes of the evangelists." "Many passages could be cited from the Fathers of the Church to show that her absolute sinlessness was originally quite unknown to Catholicism." As regards her title of Mother of God, "the religious instincts of mankind are very ready to pay worship in grosser or more refined forms to the ideas of womanhood. At all events, many pagans entered the Church with such instincts, derived from the nature worship in which they had been brought up, and the comparative colorlessness of the character of Mary left great scope to the untrammelled exercise of devout imagination."

Surely, this is more than sufficient, at least for the present, to show that Catholics have reason to protest against the "Encyclopædia Britannica." It is not up to date; it is not fair; it is not well-informed; it repeats old calumnies that have been a thousand times refuted, and it persistently selects the Church's enemies who hold her up to ridicule and contempt. We are sorry for those who have been lavish in their praises of a book which is so defective, so prejudiced, so misleading and so insulting. Many millions of Christians will consider some of its articles nothing less than blasphemous.

Echoes of the Eucharistic Congress

No vocabulary can supply the words needed to describe fitly the grandeur, the solemnity, the pomp and the splendor of Madrid's Eucharistic celebration. Any attempt to picture it would fall so far short of the reality that we can simply say that everybody was disappointed. The anti-Catholics and the systematic slanderers of religion were dumb with astonishment, and we Catholics, believers in the Holy Eucharist, adorers of the Holy Eucharist, were lost in wonderment. We had hoped that the Congress would be something grand, something extraordinary, but we had not even dreamt that it would assume the magnitude that it reached.

Picture to yourselves a great city invaded by two hundred thousand strangers, representing all the provinces and towns of Spain and many foreign nations, each one wearing openly on his breast the medal and badge of the Congress, the torrents of humanity pouring through the streets and filling the churches, the capital itself in gala attire, the houses gay with bunting, the balconies hung with rich tapestry, the streets adorned with Venetian masts and triumphal arches, the flags of the Pope, of Spain, and of all the nations represented at the Congress flung to the breeze; the Eucharistic symbols, the palm, emblem of victory, and the laurel, emblem of worth; but, above all, the intense earnestness of the faithful, dominated by the thought of the supernatural, of faith, of religious enthusiasm. Dwell in fancy upon those imposing assemblies where art, eloquence, religion, royalty, and the aristocracy of blood, of worth, of intellect and of wealth combined to honor and reverence the great mystery of faith. Venerable prelates, grandees of Spain, judges, soldiers, university professors—in a word, all that goes to make up the life, the strength, and the greatness of a nation—were there, united in the common bond of faith. As a frame for the picture, put a clear, sapphire sky, the sun in his glory, and the overflowing of life and joy in the hearts and souls of the people. Such would be a faint and imperfect sketch of Madrid during the Eucharistic week.

On the closing day, feast of SS. Peter and Paul, we may say with no exaggeration that all Spain, without distinction of social classes, took part in the solemn, majestic and imposing procession through the streets of the capital, and it was faithful Spain, believing Spain, that on that memorable day paid its homage of faith, adoration and love to the Blessed Sacrament. In perfect order, in a religious silence broken only by the notes of sacred songs, one hundred thousand men in ranks of ten or twelve abreast gave this public and solemn proof of their fidelity to the King of Kings and Lord of Lords. The route of the procession was strewn with flowers and sprinkled with rose-water.

A platoon of the civil guard opened the way, and was followed by the kettledrummers of the royal palace; then came, in seemingly endless succession, societies and confraternities of the laity. Next after the Society of St. Vincent de Paul marched Señor Maura, the Conservative leader, and many dignitaries who had held portfolios. Not one of the present Canalejas cabinet appeared. Immediately preceding the monstrance were twelve priests with fuming censers. The altar-like shrine in which it was placed was conveyed in an elaborately decorated coach drawn by twelve men in quaint medieval garb. As it approached flowers were rained down from the balconies, and many white doves were released. Some of these fluttered over the heads of the people and then alighted on the coach. His Eminence, Cardinal Aguirre, the papal legate, proceeded on foot the whole distance, although a sedan-chair was borne after him for his use should he be overcome by fatigue. The royal mahogany coach, drawn by eight gorgeously caparisoned horses, and the gala coaches of the grandees, which formed part of the procession, were simply for the solemnity of the occasion, and carried no guests.

At the corner of the Paseo del Prado and Calle de Alcalá a sumptuous altar had been erected. When the procession reached that point the monstrance was placed on the altar and the ten seises of the Cathedral of Seville came forward and danced and sung before it. As the aged Cardinal was about to give benediction the bands played the royal march, and the guard of honor gathered round him. Besides the royal halberdiers, there were three captains general, Azcárraga, Primo de Ribera, and Polavieja; the dukes of Zaragoza and de Luna, the Marquis of Velilla de Ebro, the Count of Villar, and other personages equally distinguished in Spain's public life.

Although the procession had started at half-past three, it was nearly eight o'clock before the Host reached the armory square in front of the king's palace. The king, his queen, and the queen dowager, accompanied by all the members of the royal household, knelt with lighted candles to receive Our Lord as the venerable Cardinal bore the monstrance up the grand staircase and through the hall of columns to the throne room, where a temporary altar had been erected. Then, in the midst of the kneeling throng, Father Portius, ecclesiastical secretary of the Congress, read the act of consecration of Spain to the Holy Eucharist. The Host was then borne processionally to the altar of the royal chapel, where reposition took place.

We repeat that the unbelievers, the enemies of our Faith, "anticlericals," as they style themselves, have been humiliated and crushed. For some days before the procession they had been busy through their newspapers in endeavoring to intimidate and frighten the Catholics by talking about probable attacks and collisions if they ventured on an imposing public demonstration; but nobody was alarmed, nobody heeded them. The procession itself was conducted throughout with the greatest order and decorum. There were some starts and alarms, as was quite to be expected on an occasion which had drawn such a multitude together; but at no time was the slightest disorder produced in the ranks of the marching thousands. We verily believe that if a bomb had exploded in the midst of them it would not have produced a panic, for we know that in anticipation of some unforeseen and untoward event very many of them had offered to God the sacrifice of their lives in testimony to their Faith.

Aside from its spiritual aim, namely, to inflame the hearts of the faithful with a more ardent love for Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament, we feel confident that the Madrid Eucharistic Congress will have social and political consequences of the highest import to Spain. The public and solemn manifestation of religious feeling by our king in attending of his own accord the final session of the Congress in the church of San Francisco el Grande and the words he there uttered before Spain, before Europe, before the entire world, words which spoke of his devotedness to the Vicar of Christ, of his deep Catholic sentiments and of his devotion to the Holy Eucharist; the consecration of Spain to that most sacred Mystery, which was on his own initiative; the journey of Queen Victoria Eugenia, who set out at two o'clock in the morning from the royal country house of La Granja that she might receive the Holy Communion from the hands of the legate in the monastery of the Escorial, where thousands of the faithful were spending the night in adoration; the active and earnest part which the Spanish court took in the work of the Congress—these and similar facts have tended to disarm those Catholics who thought they saw a certain incompatibility between Catholicism and the present reigning house.

The consequence is that an atmosphere of deep sympathy, great respect and fealty has developed around the young Spanish monarchs. Even the Catholics who are opposed to the present dynasty, as are the Jaimists, for example, feel disconcerted at these signs of piety and faith. Henceforth, we may safely say, the distrust and misgivings of certain Catholics about the reigning house will disappear or, at least, will lose all excuse for their existence. Premier Canalejas, on the other hand, and those who unite with him in appealing to "public desire" and "public opinion" as their justification in their policy of antagonizing the Church, have had set before their own eyes the proof that the one great, powerful and irresistible force in Spain is Catholicism, and that in the Spanish nation what is called "anticlericalism" is largely a fiction and, as far as it exists, is the stock in trade of a petty minority; and they must be convinced that it is a political blunder to wound the religious sensibilities of the nation by legislating and governing for the advancement of radicalism.

From this point of view the imposing religious manifestation on June 29 has an extraordinary significance and value, for from it are deduced two plain conclusions: First, if all those Catholics who united in a public procession to proclaim their religious belief could learn how to unite at the polls, and would do so, very different, indeed, would be the political life of their country; secondly, that the true Spain is not the turbulent, infidel, riotous and materialistic Spain that cries out against the religious Orders and the Pope, but the silent, pious, believing Spain, which assembles even from the remotest and lowliest hamlets of the kingdom to accompany the Sacramental Christ through the streets of Madrid.

The sight of this religious Spain, of this Eucharistic Spain, must have deeply moved Señor Canalejas, as it must have mightily strengthened the king, by placing before them the true spirit, aspirations and ideals of the Spanish people. The fact that this great event coincided with the appointment of an ambassador to the Holy See gives reason to think that the Canalejas ministry is desirous of renewing the interrupted diplomatic relations with the Vatican. For our part, it is our firm persuasion that in consequence of the Eucharistic Congress and in virtue of the same the politico-religious problem in Spain will undergo a fundamental change and will enter upon a new phase. Time will tell.

NORBERTO TORCAL.

A Famous Soldier*

Sir William Butler was a soldier of high achievement, a writer of exceptional brilliancy, and a Catholic of well-informed conviction, who illustrated his faith by practice and preachment in and out of uniform. From an historical and military viewpoint the story of his life is a valuable document; but the gift of style, pungent and picturesque, invests even note-book jottings and official reports with an interest and distinction that compel perusal. The individuality of the man is continually asserting its dominance over the soldier and traveler and, by reflection, inference, apothegm and incident, turning out from the most unlikely soil a golden nugget. He had read and traveled much, always with an observant eye, and pondered more; he had also written much, and in thought and style "he was," as he said of Gordon, "no man's copy; he was himself." He had a marvelous memory, an exquisite sense of proportion, the imagination of a poet united to the precision of a soldier; and the result is a masterpiece in autobiography.

Butler was a Celtic soul in a Norman setting. The Catholic Butlers of Tipperary had lost through the penal laws most of their heritage, and had saved the 1,100 acres of Ballycarron by the Suir only by their fighting qualities and their kinship with the equally combative O'Doghertys. The latter were of the Ulstermen who settled in Tipperary on the homeward march with O'Neill and O'Donnell from Kinsale. Clonoulty (Clan-Ultha or Clan-Ulster) is one of their settlements, and we heard a not too friendly neighbor describe its people as "fine fightin' min." Born in 1838, nine years after Emancipation, Butler had an object lesson among his O'Dogherty fighting cousins in the continuance of Catholic disabilities. Of two O'Dogherty brothers who entered the army, Theobald, a stout Catholic, had an unequalled record in a dozen Peninsular battles, and retired a Captain; Richard had seen only two engagements but, having dropped his religion with the "O" and "g," became General Sir Richard Doherty. Butler's instincts inclined him to a military career, though his father was not keen on a service in which lack of money was only offset by apostasy, but his home training and his education with the Jesuits of Tullabeg and at Dr. Quinn's Dublin Academy, a nursery of missionaries, had made Theobald rather than Richard his ideal.

He had weighted himself with other than Catholic disabilities. Old enough in 1847 to perceive the ravages of famine and pestilence on the Ballycarron peasantry, his father took him, in his twelfth year, to witness an eviction by the notorious "Crowbar brigade." "The thatched roofs were torn down, the earthen walls battered, the half-naked children, the paralyzed grandmother, the tottering grandfather were hauled out." The hard bed-rock facts, he says, which the famine years implanted in his mind may have compensated for the loss of education which the strain on his family enforced, but "this one scene did more to shape the course of thought than years of study could have done." Thereafter he was an Irish Nationalist, and his sympathies were everywhere with the poor and the oppressed.

Writing of Butler in AMERICA, June, 1910, the month in which he died, we said, "wherever he served he was always in line of promotion." His abilities and services put him in the line, but, it transpires, he was fourteen years, 1858-1872, in reaching a captaincy. Seven times his juniors were advanced over his head for the sole reason that they had money and influence and he had not. Later, when he returned in wasted health from the Soudanese campaign, in which he had proved the one resourceful leader, he was denied promotion and retired on half-pay, on the stated grounds that his protests against the dilatory and stupid methods, which had needlessly sacrificed many lives and sealed the fate of Gordon, "were too many and too strong." It is notorious that he was summarily deposed from the South African command, to which compelling need of his services had raised him, because he continued to protest against similar stupidities and worse iniquities. "Young man," he advises, "if you would be happy in life, if you would die rich and respected, do not see too far ahead!"

Failure to utilize Butler's abilities and heed his foresight, though unfortunate for England, was fortunate for posterity. It gave him time to travel and to write. Looking out, 1867, on a Grand River sunset in Western Canada, he had resolved "to achieve a definite thing in life; and when that resolve is fixed deep and solid, the opportunity is sure to come." He had "learned more of the secret of life from the stories of the Red Man, the old French hunter and the old soldier" than from books, and he had "built himself a mental citadel into which, when fortune goes counter, he could retire." He had a good memory and "No possession or instinct belonging to man can touch that single gift. To look back, to remember, to be young when you are old, to see the dead, to paint a picture upon a prison wall, to have ways of escape; to be free—surely this was the 'breath of life' breathed into the brain of man when God gave him 'a living soul.' And yet there are people who say they cannot see the soul."

When Government made him no award for his civil or military services, he constructed in the citadel of memory stories of his travels and explorations—"The Great Lone Land," "The Wild North Land," "Far Out Rovings," and other books, that were more honorable to him and serviceable to the world than the winning of a gazette or a garter. His "Akim-foo, The History of a Failure," redeemed the sordidness of the Ashantee campaign, and when his frank advice precluded reward for his Soudanese achievements "The Campaign of the Cataracts" and the "Life of Gordon" gave him ample consolation. When his sword was idle his lives of Napier and Colley, essays on St. Patrick and Irish questions, and a large variety of other writings, gave more worthy employment to his pen.

His exposure of the weakness of the English army system, the incompetency of civil officials, the unprincipled ambitions of statesmen, and especially of "the organized campaign of unblushing falsehoods" and "the deluge of lies" that brought about the Boer War, which, after the waste of thousands of lives and millions of money, has left things "as we were," has caused a stir in political and military circles; but his appreciations of peoples and places, original, sound, pithy, graphic and instructive, will arrest attention when the politics of the day are forgotten. He loved nature and the people who are close to her, disliked cities—"Did not a son of Cain build the first city?"—and he abominated the artificial trappings and hypocrisies of what is called civilization. He took and made opportunity to know the common people in the many lands he visited, and everywhere he found them possessed of virtues commonly unrecognized. He found the Mahometan Arabs more Christian, or at least nearer to the spirit of the Old Testament, than Protestant Christianity. He shows a fine scorn for the Christian civilizers who, after pillaging, brutalizing and enslaving the African negro, are shocked because he distrusts them and lies in self-defence, and he eulogizes the bravery and patriotism of the Soudanese whom he had helped to conquer. The history and traditions of these peoples, he complains, are commonly ignored: "History began when the first English trader arrived. Before that there was a blank. The erection of Smith's shop marks the year 1." His "leetle anecdote" of the pious Scotch Presbyterian who had the Arabs "ganging doon alang by our reelway to Smeerna whippit," until they took passage on the railway and so enabled it to pay "a handsome deevadend," illustrates the commercial side of western "ceevilization" as Butler saw it propagated in the East. "O business! business!" he exclaims, "what crimes have been committed in thy name."

But "our wars of civilization" were still more criminal. Only one, he writes, in the long Victorian era had a worthy object, and that—for the rescue of Gordon—was an utter failure. This excepted, he stigmatizes all the African wars as manipulated by unscrupulous financiers and adventurers, who, by money and mendacity, made puppets of the politicians and the public, exposed and increased the weakness of the British Empire and imperilled her future. Yet he volunteered readily for whatever war came along. Holding that war against the Boers was iniquitous, he would have fought them vigorously if commanded to do so; and his daughter, who edits his memoirs, informs us that after he had been recalled in disgrace, he offered to serve in any capacity in order to retrieve the disasters which he felt to be deserved. Such action is, we presume, natural to a soldier, but the strict moralist will find it difficult to straighten out.

Tired of "moving in a circle that ended nowhere," he had thought in the early seventies of settling on a Canadian ranch, to be stocked with United States cattle. In 1867 he had recognized the agricultural wealth of Western Canada and in an official report was the first to predict its future greatness. Having traveled much in the United States, he discerned the faults but also the sterling worth of our citizens, and entered into a partnership with one of them, which brought good returns at a critical time. The American's motto is, he says, "It's got to be done," and he does it. Such citizens will always provide "the rank and file of fighting men; and if America keeps her military school at West Point in the future as she has kept it in the past, she need not fear that either foreign or domestic wars will do her serious harm."

The Autobiography touches so many lands, peoples, wars, questions and policies, and has so much to say that is valuable, both for matter and manner, that an adequate review would fill a book as large as his own. The vital springs of his character, best revealed in thoughts on his land and religion in "The Light of the West," are epitomized in his poem published in the June Catholic World:

* * * * *

"I loved them all—the vale, the hill,
The moaning sea, the flagger-lilied rill,
The yellow furze, the lake-shore lone and still,
The wild bird's song;

"But more than hill or valley, bird or moor,
More than the green fields of my native Suir,
I loved those hapless ones, the Irish Poor,
All my life long.

"Little I did for them in outward deed,
And yet be unto them of praise the meed
For the stiff fight I waged 'gainst lust and greed:
I learnt it there.

"So give me Irish grave mid Irish air,
With Irish grass above it—anywhere;
And let some passing peasant give a prayer
For the soul there."

Similar sentiments are embodied in his tribute to Private Connor of Cork, who, having served him in many lands, died on the Plains of Abraham. Butler raised a stone to him and inscribed thereon: "His Master's Friend: His Friend's Servant." "No more faithful heart," he writes, "ever beat in body of man or master. It would be blasphemy to doubt of heaven while such souls are found on earth." Readers of Butler's story will find the saying applicable to its author.

A Signal Failure in Higher Criticism

Not long ago a jury of twelve men decided a man was sane, although a number of experts had testified to the insanity of the criminal. The experts were furious; the people heartily applauded the common sense of the jury, and jury and people were amply justified shortly after, when it turned out that the prisoner was shamming. Certain literary experts, called higher critics, have been busy for something more than a century dividing up ancient literature and distributing it among authors of their own creation. We are in a position now, owing to the recent publication of a book on Homer (The Lay of Dolon: The Tenth Book of Homer's Iliad, by Alex. Shewan; Macmillan and Co., 1911), to survey one such attempt at dissection and pigeon-holing. Professor Paul Shorey declared not long ago that the Homeric Question was a scandal in the world of scholars. Mr. Shewan has succeeded in proving that the higher criticism of Homer is a sham.

Experts, as a rule, agree upon one point only; they have supreme contempt for those not of their class. They intimidate the uninitiated with abstruse learning, inundate them with technicalities, and crush them with scarcely concealed disdain for the profound ignorance of inexpertness. But turn one expert against another, and the harmony of opinion is rudely disturbed. Mure, in his "History of Ancient Greek Literature," one of the best defenses of Homeric unity ever written and now, more than half a century after its publication, once again restored to its place of honor as an authority by Mr. Shewan, likened the Homeric critics to a famous band of outlaws, into which a new member could not be admitted except by proving he had murdered some one. It might be a near relative of another member; that mattered not, provided the murder could be established. To qualify as a Homeric critic one had to destroy part of Homer, even though it was a part dear to another.

Some higher critics of the Bible have printed what they styled a Polychrome Bible, and what others have called the "Rainbow Bible." They succeeded in controlling the arrangement of colors by putting only one expert to each part. The plan suggests a good way of realizing the discordant evidence of the literary experts in Homer. Bring out in different colors what each critic considered the proper distribution of the matter ascribed to the various authors of the poems, having, however, all of the critics editing in the same volume all of the books. Then there would be a glorious riot of colors. A wrecked dye-shop would be a spectrum in regularity when compared with a Variorum Polychrome Homer.

Another way to appreciate the failure of Higher Criticism is to read Mr. Shewan on the Tenth Book of the Iliad. Perhaps not many will follow this advice.

"The Lay of Dolon" is scientific and technical. Mr. Shewan has met the higher critics on their own ground.

Besides, he has chosen for his point of defence the most attacked part, perhaps, in all Homeric poetry. The Tenth Iliad has had few friends. Even Mr. Lang, a man of unimpeachable Homeric orthodoxy, wavered for a time and listened to the tempter, and seemed ready at the word of Monro to give over the Doloneia, unless this is a wrong view to take of Appendix B in "Homer and The Epic." It is difficult enough to get the higher critics to agree on any considerable part of Homer as original or as interpolated, but there was more agreement in the case of this book than of any other part. Mr. Shewan met the enemy at their strongest point, and took four years to write his book. So he says, but to amass the erudition of it would occupy the lifetime of an ordinary mortal. Higher criticism cannot sneer down Mr. Shewan. If they are expert, he is more expert. They count and manipulate statistics; he counts better and is a better statistician. They are minute in points of grammar; he is minuter. They use a microscope; he uses one of higher power. In one point he is clearly the superior of them all, in logical consistency.

In logic "The Lay of Dolon" scores its greatest success. Without any show of smartness or juggling, without mere mental gymnastics, but by plain and consistent reasoning, Mr. Shewan meets and overcomes every objection. Is it not the Scotch love of logic which has made its eminent Greek scholars such staunch defenders of the one Homer? Mure, Gladstone, Lang, and now Shewan are unwavering Unitarians, as they are called. Blackie is nearly orthodox. Monro is a Separatist, but not a Divisionist. Geddes might seem the only real heretic, but even he is not a Lachmannite or a Fragmentarian, if the term will be permitted. He is a follower of Grote and an advanced Expansionist, holding to one poet for all the Odyssey and some books of the Iliad. Jebb, too, a believer in the Grote theory of expansion from a nucleus, thinks it may be that the same poet wrote the nucleus and the expansion. A strange concession! The Scotch have done nobly by Homer, and Mr. Shewan is ably carrying on the traditions.

It is refreshing to see such an exhibition of accurate logic and cool common sense as displayed in his handling of the tests of the higher critics. Wolf, the arch-heretic of the Homeric Question, appealed to external a priori tests. He confessed that the apparent unity of Homer made him doubt his views. His tests were the absence of writing in the age of Homer and the barbarism of the age. The first of these tests has long ago been abandoned. The broken pottery dug up in Crete has completed the discomfiture of the "no-writing" test, and the civilization unearthed in the same place has almost destroyed the "primitive-barbarism" test. Homer is not a conglomerate of folk-lays which grew, like Topsy, without the preliminaries of parents. The Iliad and Odyssey are works of the highest art, and poems are even more exigent of progenitors than pickaninnies. A poem demands a poet.

There is another a priori test back of the Expansionists' theory, but the test has not been more felt than appealed to as a proof. The theory of expansion from an original nucleus is the evolution theory applied to Homer. A modification of the same test is now bidding for attention under the guise of comparative religion. Professor Murray is the exponent of a vaguer and more indefinite fragmentary hypothesis than Lachmann's. For him Homer did not evolve out of a nucleus or coagulate from fragments, but crystalized from a fluid state.

Mr. Shewan, however, briefly dismisses these antecedent prejudices and devotes most of his work to demolishing the tests drawn from the text. In chapter II he touches on the question of excellence as determined by individual taste, which is a test for many writers. The handling of this topic displays his vast information on the subject of his work. He quotes as many as forty different opinions about the artistic work of the Tenth Book. Nine find more to disapprove than approve; nineteen give approbation, but with some qualifications; twelve give unqualified approval.

He then takes up the various tests from language, versification, parallel passages, inconsistencies and affinities and the tests from life and archeology. The diagram, the article, the propositions, the iteratives, the quantities, the hiatus, the rare words, the archaic words, the armor, the characters, all are explained fully and thoroughly. Not a single point escapes his attention; not a single test eludes his destructive logic. Here his thoroughness is relentless. He will prove that the tests do not apply to the Tenth Book, and then he will deny the validity of the tests by citing side by side the conflicting opinions of the critics on the test or by showing the absurd consequences which would follow from its consistent application, and, finally accepting the test as valid, he successfully retorts it. Chapter XXV is a splendid example of the last process and deserves to take its place with Whately's well-known ironical application of the principles of skepticism, establishing from them the fact that Napoleon did not exist, or with Worm's less widely known application of Wolf's principles to proving ironically that Cicero did not write the speech for Ligarius. Mr. Shewan, by the use of the principles of Higher Criticism, cleverly shows that Homer did not write the first book of the Iliad.

Read one book of higher Homeric criticism and you will likely have your faith in Homer disturbed; read "The Lay of Dolon" and get a view of all the higher critics, with their mutual animosities and fratricidal wars, their contradictions and inconsistencies, their prejudices and blindnesses, their perverted ingenuities, and you will not wonder that the Homeric Question is a scandal, and you will be convinced that Higher Criticism is a failure, because a higher, saner, more reasonable criticism has shown it to be. Mr. Shewan does all this with confidence, with modesty. He is never unfair, never even triumphs over a fallen adversary. He is content with the negative verdict "not proved," although he would not go beyond the logic of his facts if he insisted on the positive verdict of proved innocent.

How rapidly things move in these our days! Seymour, in Harper's "Dictionary of Antiquities" (1896), could write: "Probably no one who has a right to an opinion on the subject now holds to the strict unity of the poems in the old sense." In his "Life in the Homeric Age" (1908) he is more reserved, and says: "These poems have such a unity as cannot be easily explained if they are the work of several poets." In his thorough examination of all the customs of both poems and splendid review of Homeric Antiquities he detects no noteworthy difference of civilization. "A Short History of Greek Literature" (Wright, 1907) declares that "all scholars are now chorizontes," believers in a separate authorship for the Iliad and Odyssey, and further predicts that all tests "tend to the disintegration of the present structure of the Homeric epic." "It is not easy," the author continues, "to imagine what convulsion of criticism should make that stream flow backward." The ways of the literary prophet are hard. That stream is now drying up. While Wright was composing his history, Blass, the greatest of modern Greek scholars, was issuing a defense of the unity of Homer. Two other German professors, Rothe and Mueller, who began as disbelievers in the unity, have both within the year issued books defending what they had disbelieved, and Rothe holds to the "strict unity in the old sense." Miss Stawell, in "Homer and the Iliad" (1909), reexamined the reasons for giving the Odyssey and Iliad to different authors, and found them unconvincing. Mr. Shewan completes the examination and confirms Miss Stawell, and the Higher Criticism of Homer is proved a failure in all its attempts, both at dividing either poem or of separating the poems in their authorship. Homer has experienced the fulfillment of the consolation of little Bo-peep; his poems have come home to him intact.

Visitors to Italy in Spite of Cholera

ROME, July 9th.

New York has had no monopoly of distressful heat. Rome for the last week has been hot, and in consequence the stranger within her gates has had to reduce his running about, or pay the penalty with a touch of Roman fever. Of course, the cholera has not lessened in Italy under the scorching sky, and that fact has brought its anxieties. The steamship lines have begun to cut out Naples and call on their southern passengers to take ship at Genoa. A citizens' committee has been pestering the local authorities at Naples against the precautions taken, loudly charging the Prefect of the city with injuring her sanitary good name (alack and a day!); but the doughty Prefect turns on them with a threat, in case they do not cease obstruction and complaint, to post a yellow flag at the harbor entrance and declare the port infected, thus effectually closing it to entrance and egress.

By what devious ways the truth will out! Down in the little watering-place of Nettuno, the villagers, who keep the winter wolf from the door with summer pickings from the city visitor, were so alarmed lest they lose their game, if not their prey, that they mobbed and seriously injured the government physician, who endeavored to isolate their cases of cholera. It was necessary to send down three companies of bersaglieri, the sturdiest of the Italian infantry, to restore order.

None the less the tourists flock to town, heat or no heat, cholera or gastro-enteritis. The Roman bureau of travel-information gives out the figures that for the month of June arrivals of strangers at Rome averaged ten thousand a day, and the cry is, "still they come." Many of these, of course, chiefly, no doubt from a spirit of faith and reverence, but a little, too, from curiosity, desire to see the Holy Father, and never pause to think that hard work and hot weather are burden enough for a man of seventy-six years, who had labored twenty-six years as a priest before he was made bishop, nine years as a bishop before becoming Cardinal Patriarch of Venice, and ten years before the Pontificate was laid upon his unwilling shoulders. The exclusion of public audiences at this time is more than reasonable, and yet the good old man has daily to meet, to hearten and to bless those who come from far-off lands to do reverence to the primacy of his See. So comes the Patriarch of the Syrian rite at Antioch, Mgr. Ignatius Rahmani, and later the Apostolic Delegate for the Orientals and vice-Patriarch for the Latins at Constantinople, Mgr. Vincent Sardi.

In Parliament the Insurance Monopoly is still going through ups and downs. At one moment it looked very much like what our wicked brethren in Albany call a "Strike Bill" (if my innocency rightly remembers the name of the foul proceeding), whereby the promoters of the bill were after immunity purchase; but the latest turn would seem to show the Prime Minister Giolitti mad clean through and set upon passing the bill at once, in the interest of the populace forsooth!

The ministerial bill for the modification, if not improvement, of secondary education, prepared after a voluminous report on the subject by a Royal Commission, has passed the Chamber of Deputies without amendment, and goes now to the Senate. It follows the modern trend in France, Germany and America, eliminating Greek, for which a modern language is substituted, while adding technical and commercial studies, under the more or less universal superstition that a youth can be educated on the basis of an industrial unit without detriment to his development as a man of character and culture, as a citizen of sound principles and ennobling force. Meanwhile, the Commune of Venice, quite content with the results of religious teaching in the elementary schools during school hours, is contending against the threatened governmental change to an exclusion of religious exercises and teaching, if not totally, at least from the regular hours of school. The problem of the parent saving his child from the doctrinaire and from the irreligious experiments of an usurping state authority has the same ear-marks the world over.

A newspaper of Pisa, with the irrational sobriquet of Reason, has just met with an accounting. In November last some Fathers came to Molina di Quosa, at Pisa, to give a mission to the faithful. The parish priest, Padre Paoli Pizzo, asked the mill-owner, Count Pozzo di Borgo, to grant his workmen a half hour's grace at the opening morning hour, so that they might attend the morning exercises of the mission. The Count granted the request, and was straightway accused in the Reason of having constrained his employees to attend morning Mass, on penalty of the loss of a day's pay for refusal. The Count sued and won his case, the Court condemning the manager of the paper to a year and ten months' imprisonment, with a fine of a thousand lire, assigning the costs of the suit for payment jointly to the manager and the editor.

For next Sunday, the feast of Our Lady of Mt. Carmel, is announced the celebration of the jubilee of the priesthood of the former General of the Carmelites, the venerable Father Simon Bernardini, whose virtue and zeal are held in grateful memory among his religious brethren.

During the past week was celebrated in the Church of St. James, the national church of Spain in Rome, the Month's Mind for the late Spanish Ambassador to the Holy See, Señor Emilio de Ojeda, who died at Pau, in France, on the fourth of June last. He will be remembered in diplomatic circles in the United States as secretary of the Spanish legation at Washington in the seventies, as secretary-general of the Peace Commission at Paris after the Spanish War, and from 1898 to 1905 the Spanish Minister at Washington. In 1906 he came to Rome as Spanish Ambassador to the Holy See.

On Thursday died Queen Maria Pia, daughter of Victor Emmanuel II, and sister of the Princess Clotilde, who was buried last week. The Queen was a god-child of Pius IX. At the age of fifteen she was betrothed to Don Luiz of Braganza, King of Portugal, and later wedded to him with great pomp at Lisbon. She was the grandmother of young King Manuel, and fled with him from Lisbon on the occasion of the upheaval last fall. To her influence, while Queen, is attributed the abolition of slavery in the Portuguese colonies. She was visited during her last illness by Mgr. Castrale, the auxiliary Bishop of Turin, and received the last rites of the church from the hands of Mgr. Brielli. At her bedside were the Queen Mother Amelia of Portugal, the Queen Mother Marguerite of Italy, Queen Helena and the Duke of Oporto. King Manuel was not present, but was said to be on his way to Turin at the time.

Your readers, no doubt, will remember the assessor, Signor Rossi-Doria, who early in May swore on the heads of his five children to right the wrongs of the scavengers of the city, if they would return to work. They called off their strike at the time, but the succeeding two months have brought them no relief. Now they are up in brooms again demanding their bond—not the heads of the five children, but the righting of their wrongs. The President of the Chamber of Labor has promised them, in case next week shows no better result, to order a general strike in the city Sanitary Department. And the thermometer registers ninety degrees.

China's New Railway Policy

SHANGHAI, June 15, 1911.

The struggle between the Central Government and the provinces in China has nowhere asserted itself so strenuously as in the matter of railway development, which it has retarded throughout the country. Funds were required to carry out the undertaking; China had not the money and could not raise it at home except at 30 per cent. interest, and the provinces were opposed to any foreign loans. In recent times, however, frontier defence on the south and west, the prevalence of plague and famine in various parts of the Empire, and the stagnant state of industry have impressed on the Central Government the necessity of breaking down provincial opposition and starting a new policy. This has now been done and may be stated briefly in the following words: "All trunk lines, past, present and future, must be State-owned," that is, the State may redeem all principal lines so far built by the provinces, and will henceforth construct and manage all future lines. The provinces may, however, build and work branch lines, as has been already declared by the Ministry of Posts and Communications to the Shanghai-Hangchow-Ningpo Railway Company.

The principle laid down above is a novel and important one, and if applied effectively immense advantages will accrue to the country. Foremost among these must be mentioned coordination and unity of scheme linking Peking with the remotest parts of the Empire; next, economy and efficiency, and finally the development of trade, so far in a backward state, owing to lack of proper communications. The full official document setting forth the new policy and the motives which have determined the Government to take this step deserve to be laid before the readers of AMERICA.

"The area of the Chinese Empire," says the Imperial decree, dated May 9, "is very extensive and its frontier territories are far apart, the distance in length reaching several tens of thousands of li (the Chinese mile, equal to one-third of an English mile), and requiring several months' time to cover it. Whenever the attention of the Throne is brought to the frontier defence we are troubled night and day. To control the defence effectively, the only means is the speedy construction of the railways. Moreover, for advice and consultation on Constitutional Government, for the transport and mobilization of troops, and delivery of native produce in cases of urgent need, we are here dependent upon facilities of communication before an improvement in our general welfare can be obtained. After careful and repeated deliberation we have resolved that the Nation must possess a complete system of trunk lines to and from the four quarters of her territory, in order to administer the government by a firm connection with the central authority. Former arrangements were not perfectly thought out, there being no fixed policy, so that our railway system was complicated without distinction between trunk and branch lines. Nor was the people's financial ability taken into consideration. Permission was usually granted, upon receipt of a petition, for any line to be privately built.

"We have now seen that for several years the funds for the Canton-Hankow line have been only half raised, and no progress in construction has been made. As to the Hankow-Chentu line (through the provinces of Hupeh and Szechuan, westward along the Yangtse river), enormous capital was embezzled, and impeachment and pressure have failed to recover any part of it. In regard to Hupeh and Hunan, the offices have been opened for a number of years, only wasting money by inactivity, and thus exhausting the fat of millions of our people. We find, therefore, waste and extravagance in many cases, and embezzlement in others, so that it is feared the longer we wait, the heavier will be the burden on the people, and the greater the ill effects and consequences of such a system.

"We, therefore, wish to proclaim explicitly to the nation that henceforth all the trunk railways shall be State-owned, and this will be the fixed policy of the Government. Whatever trunk lines in the provinces have been granted three years back, but have not advanced in construction, shall immediately be taken over by the Government as State-owned, and their building shall be prosecuted with energy. As to branch lines, they shall be allowed to be undertaken by the people, according to their ability and resources.

"With regard to the manner of recovering trunk lines and cancelling former grants to the provinces, let the Ministries of Finance and of Posts and Communications undertake the work and devote their whole attention to carrying it out fully. If there be anyone who wilfully opposes this new railway policy, creates misgivings or excites to resistance, he shall be summarily dealt with in accordance with the penalty for disobedience to law. Let this be promulgated and made known to all."

In my last letter I mentioned the formation of the "National Volunteer Society" of Chinese students. The views of the members both on home and foreign questions deserve to be recorded, and will show readers of AMERICA what dangerous elements lurk within New China and may break out all of a sudden. The manifesto reads as follows:

"In presence of the utter powerlessness of our country as revealed by the recent Russian ultimatum, and in face of the appalling dangers and difficulties which confront her within and without, the time has come for every patriotic son of China to devote himself without reserve to the salvation of his native land. We know that no real progress can be made in the reform of our country until the three following defects are remedied. In the first place, the present corrupt and inefficient official system with its bribery, its insufficient salaries and unaudited accounts, its nepotism, its uncertain tenure of office, and its sinecure posts must be radically changed. Second, financial reform, unification of currency and abolition of "likin" must be introduced. To accomplish this and carry out many other necessary public works, loans must be raised. We are not opposed to such a policy, but we object to have them forced on us, or when contracted to go and enrich corrupt officials and be expended in unproductive ways. In the third place, our Government must cease its temporizing policy of palliative half measures. A strong constructive policy must be outlined and carried out unflinchingly.

"We realize that should our country be partitioned, it will be because we have brought this disaster on ourselves."

"We believe, however, that the heart of our people is sound, but they lack knowledge and unity. What they need is to be awakened. To accomplish this is the aim of our 'National Society.' As a means to this end we want to establish a volunteer army throughout the country. At the same time we realize that there are grave dangers attending this scheme. The powers will consider the movement an occasion for raising riots against foreigners. We deprecate any such intention and are actuated only by a sincere desire to help our country. We have impressed this on our six delegates despatched, two to Manchuria, two to Central China and two to the Yunnan province.

"We call upon lovers of peace and justice in all lands; upon leaders of religion and education; upon all those interested in the peaceful development of industry and trade, to help us now and see that we have a fair opportunity, delivered from the menace of foreign aggression, to give ourselves unreservedly to the reform and regeneration of our ancient empire."

The danger of this military movement is obvious to every serious reader, despite the efforts taken to conceal its real purpose which is none else than a new phase of boxerism engineered by "Militant Young China" at home, and abroad. The Government, it is hoped, will act promptly, else trouble will ensue. Already a Censor has memorialized the Throne on the return of students from abroad for the purpose of organizing a citizen volunteer army. Such an army, says he, destitute of properly trained officers, funds and ammunition, would be a promiscuous crowd, the peace of the people would be disturbed and foreign antipathy aroused. The Censor begs that the scheme be suppressed rigorously and all well-wishers of China heartily endorse his enlightened petition.

Russian Converts

Catholicism is spreading in Russia, and, although zealous adherents of the Russian Church in its aspect of a national heritage will scarcely admit this, there is no better proof of the fact than that, of late, Russian journals are devoting many columns to the discussion of Catholic affairs in the land of the Czar. They are not at present concerned so much with the doings of the Polish priests, who are ever under the accusation of inciting their flocks to disloyalty and of carrying on a "Polonizing" campaign, but deal to a great extent with actual "Russian Catholicism." Apparently, there is not very much ill-feeling against those Russians who have found themselves in conscience bound to seek reunion with the West, but now and again there are open or covert warnings that Jesuit influence is becoming dangerous.

One journal, after printing a brief account of the personal experience of Jesuits by a Russian priest converted to the Church, adds: "this favorable statement about the Jesuits, made by a Roman Catholic priest, testifies but too evidently as to the source of Catholicism in Russia." No doubts are expressed, however, as to the sincerity of the writer, and the following extracts from his account may prove instructive. "Much is said about the Jesuits," he writes, "yet what do we really know of them? A notion is current about these true disciples of Christ as of some diabolical type. There does not exist a more banal or a weaker sketch of anything than of the Jesuit's characteristics.

"A scoundrel, murderer, intriguer, and diplomat. That is all our information about the Jesuit. Well, then, if it is accurate, the Jesuit who reconciled me with the Church could not have been a Jesuit! He was a kindly, gentlemanly person; as we say in Russia, 'correct all round,' and with that he was extremely guileless. As a non-diplomat he resembles a great many real and not fictitious Jesuits." The writer then goes on to relate an amusing episode of his first meeting with the "enemy."

"He was one of a circle of friends at Nijni-Novgorod, who were all attracted to the Catholic Faith and were on the verge of making their submission. But there suddenly arrived a member of the dire society in their midst, and without any preliminaries he sprang the awful truth upon them that he was a Jesuit. This was certainly not a master stroke of diplomacy, and the news of a plague epidemic could not have created a greater panic than this announcement."

The little party broke up, and only three of its members had the courage to allow the Jesuit Father to receive them into the Church. The writer states in conclusion that during a period of residence at the Jesuit College he had ample opportunities of studying the Order, and that he was greatly edified by everything he saw.

Again, on the subject of Russian Catholicism, the same journal gives the following sympathetic pen picture of a certain Russian priest who made his submission some years ago:

"A vigorous old man with a fine face and long hair, at first sight, one would scarcely guess that on his shoulders he bears the burden of a wife's and children's curses. They broke off with him as soon as they learned that, as father and priest, he had betrayed the faith of his ancestors. At times a look of unspeakable sadness comes over his countenance, but only speak to him of the one subject and he becomes a different man. His language assumes a tone as of a tried warrior on a familiar field, and his eyes sparkle as lightning flashes in the night. Calmly and methodically he unfolds the reasons which made him take the great step."

A keen student all his life, his desire to solve the great problems of the church increased as he grew older. There were some difficulties which appeared insoluble; to refer them to one's ecclesiastical authorities was useless; he was requested not to argue, and that was all the satisfaction to be had. Those of the clergy who were too much given to arguing and inclined to heresy would be dispatched to some lonely parish far removed from the city. And so this priest, after perusing the works of the Fathers and reading all the great theologians, gradually, as he says, saw his intellectual horizon broaden and the difficulties of the Schismatic Church increased, until he was finally compelled to acknowledge the truth of the teaching of the Church of Rome.

He made the step in spite of all the trials that it implied, and is displaying that heroism which only faith in Jesus Christ can give.

Religious vs. Lay Schools

The Rivista Pedagogica is a well-known anti-clerical publication of Italy. It is, of course, not necessary to add that it ardently supports the "lay" or neutral school as opposed to the school dominated by religious influences. Yet it sometimes permits itself so generous a measure of fairness that one is tempted to express the hope it is not an unknown educational publication in certain circles here in America.

There recently appeared in its columns a remarkable compliment to the teachers of Catholic schools, all the more worthy of our appreciation because it is penned by a professor prominent in the ranks of lay school defenders. The London Catholic Times quotes our professor in its Rome correspondence:

"Note," he says, "that the national boarding school is inferior to the majority of the clerical ones. These have the great advantage of being directed to a definite end; the question whether this is good or bad need not now be discussed, but there is always in the system a completeness adapted to give order to the action of the educated and the educator. It is undeniable that the religious in general show in this field a technical ability of which the lay teachers have never given proof. The reason is precisely this, viz., that they know what they aim at, and they can, therefore, ardently seek to attain it; whereas we, with all our shouting about lay education, positive pedagogy and the natural formation of character, have never succeeded in getting beyond vague and undeterminate negotiations."

Nor is the writer satisfied with this generalization. When we recall the campaign of calumny which swept over Italy in recent years, directed with especial virulence against certain religious bodies eminent in school work, it is a decidedly agreeable surprise to find this contention in the professor's article:

"The Salesians know how to found boarding schools for the people that are true models of their kind." And "no one can compare the lay schools . . . with those founded by the Jesuits for the upper classes."

This is praise, indeed, and we recommend the honest expression of our "lay" professor's sentiment to those among us who deem successful school management to be beyond the powers of men controlled by religion in their teaching.

Assassination of a People

Such are the words used by a correspondent of the London Times to describe the actual condition of affairs in Albania, where the Young Turks, who were supposed to be the harbingers of a new era in Turkey, are trampling under their bloody feet the unfortunate Christians subject to them. The country is lighted up with the glare of burning villages, and men, women and children are being ruthlessly massacred. It is the old war that was thought to have ended forever, of the Crescent against the Cross. People of other religions, or of none, are spared, but the Christian tribes and people are being annihilated.

There was a time when all Christendom would have leaped to its feet to put an end to these atrocities. Even Napoleon III hurried troops to Syria to check and avenge the massacres of Christians in that unhappy land, for there were still some religion and humanity left in the Governments of the world. But now we listen in vain for some protest from the kings or emperors, or presidents of the nations against these acts of savagery. Not a sound is heard, not even from the Peace Congressists, who are proclaiming so vociferously the advent of the time when the nations will disband their armies and arbitration take the place of war. Politics and commerce now dictate the course of the nations. Humanity or religion no longer counts.

Spain is Catholic

The recent Eucharistic Congress, celebrated with a pomp and circumstance nowhere possible out of Catholic Spain, was in itself and of itself a purely religious matter, yet contributing circumstances have given to it a political significance and importance acknowledged all over the Continent. The enthusiasm manifested by the Spanish people and the eagerness with which they labored to make the Congress a notable one in the history of these gatherings, has opened the eyes of the world to the crass falsehoods contained in the reports sent out from Spain for two years and more. Spain is not ready to break with Rome, Spain is Catholic to the core, despite the anti-clerical attitude the country is represented to have assumed of recent years.

Of course, the enemies of the Church, in Spain and out, the freethinking Liberals and the Ferrer following, rage and meditate vain things. But their planning and plotting will avail them nought. Alfonso's filial declaration of his respect and devoted submission to the Church's head, the magnificent public homage of Alfonso's Catholic people, which the petty efforts of a few miscreants sought in vain to disturb, the announcement speedily following the Congress of a reopening of diplomatic relations with the Vatican, all tend to show how wide from the truth have been the exultant judgments of the Church's foes. Spain is not yet prepared to imitate the folly of Portugal.

Dr. Wiley's Work

The late P. T. Barnum was charged with saying that Americans find pleasure in being humbugged. Whether or not he said it is a trivial matter, but his long and picturesque career as a showman proves quite clearly that if such was indeed his persuasion, the dear soul did all he could to give pleasure to his patrons. We recall the woolly horse, discovered by Frémont (as the Pathfinder learned long after and much to his surprise); the African cannibals and the South Sea islanders, who returned together to the bagasse after the season was over; the "talking machine," which was a wonderful contrivance of the neuter gender; the "missing link," of which dozens could be found on any old plantation. But why continue the enumeration of means that the amiable P. T. B. used to please his patrons?

Barnum's creations were agreeable and inexpensive, wherein they differed from furniture of the colonial period (manufactured at Grand Rapids, Mich.) and old masters that came into existence after the war of 1812; but there were other creations which did not stop at merely tickling the fancy or lightening the purse. There were creations that undermined the lives and perverted the conscience of the people. Such were the nostrums widely advertised as cures for drug addiction, and others for the relief of that nondescript ailment, "headache," a symptom which may spring from causes as varied as too little sleep and too much of it. With nothing on the boxes or bottles to indicate the nature of their contents, good people went on dosing and drenching themselves in blissful ignorance of the fact that they were "curing" their drug addiction with copious doses of the drug. The story is told of a highly respected individual who, for various cogent motives, did not touch wine or beer, much less whiskey or gin; yet his childlike trust in certain patent medicines as health restorers and life preservers was as phenomenal as it was disastrous, for his tongue became as thick and his knees as wobbly and his general expression as idiotic as if his bottled "non-alcoholic strength for the feeble" had been plainly labeled "extract of sod-corn," as it truly was.

By directing attention to the ingredients of many so-called "cures" and headache mixtures, Dr. Wiley has made deception, whether self-inflicted or otherwise, a much more difficult matter. He saw that among Americans life was held too cheap and he sounded the alarm. Many conscienceless dealers, and users, too, perhaps, would like to make him hold his peace, for the truth is often the most unpalatable of viands. The way of the reformer is hard.

"Motivation"—the Latest School Fad

How tremendously backward we were a generation or two ago in educational matters! One wonders how boys and girls of those days made any progress at all in intellectual development. School equipment was of the simplest, text-books were not changed at yearly or six monthly time periods, there were few fads, and teachers were agreed that the "royal road to knowledge" necessarily carried one through the thorny way of earnest and serious and long continued hard work. Yet there were good results achieved in those cramped and uncomfortable school-houses of a generation or two ago. One wonders how, when one listens to the elaborate schedule of imperatively needed educational aids and helps rehearsed by the up-to-date teacher of to-day.

Two weeks ago, in one of the sessions of the great National Education Association's Congress in San Francisco, a certain Superintendent of Schools from Illinois presented his committee's report on "Motivation of the Children's Work in the Elementary Schools." Newspaper reports tell us that, after refreshing the minds of the audience as to the meaning of motivation, the Superintendent's paper showed what things are meaningful and significant to the children of the elementary schools in their various stages of development. He explained that motivation of work is accomplished even though the motive does not operate with the same degree of intensity throughout the time a class is working on a problem; the relation of motivation to rote and systematic drill; and the effect of motivating work in securing general training. He emphasized in the light of recent studies in formal discipline that general training will result from solving specific problems to the degree in which they are motivated.

What does it all mean? the old-fashioned teacher, with his sturdy common sense and his exquisite charm of sweet and simple English, will ask in amazement. The worthy Superintendent is not proposing an abstruse problem in psychology to a university class of Hegelians; he is addressing himself, mind you, to teachers who have to deal with toddlers, or with children of the elementary grades. We may well wonder what inspiration "motivated" him to analyze for such teachers "the effects of motivation on the child, to show that it focuses his apperceptive capital upon the problems he desires to solve; develops ardor in his work; results in his manifesting more originality, greater initiative and larger independence in attacking his work and stimulates him to the attainment of greater results in all fields of endeavor." He is suggesting helps, again be it remembered, to teachers who have to train children ranging from six to thirteen or fourteen years of age!

One is tempted to ask whether, after all, Dr. Osler's suggestion had better not be followed in the case of the "old-fashioned" teacher. He himself must see how sadly out of joint he is with the progress of the day. Why should he attempt to plod along in the course dear to him, simply because it happens to be his life work? Why should he block the way which eager enthusiasts of younger years and up-to-date methods are "motivated" to tread?

Drive Out the Little Sisters

Impelled by curiosity, and also by a desire to get at the facts of the case, an Englishman named Bland, who tells his story in the Nineteenth Century, made his way to Lisbon, and among other feats, interviewed Senhor Bernardino Machado, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, whom they call in Portugal "Papa Machado," probably because the little man had been described by Costa, the Provisional President of that exquisitely funny republic, as "a fine fellow of universal paternity."

Machado looks as if he were mild mannered, but it is in appearance only; for he is possessed of a "torrential verbosity, a fierce impatience of argument or questioning, an unconscious vanity and a naïve inconsequence" of thought.

While the bold Briton was bearding the lion in his den and hearing him thunder at the venal press of Europe for telling so many lies about Portugal, a secretary entered without knocking, made his way to the Minister's desk, and without saying by your leave, or apologizing for interrupting the conversation, took himself off again, no doubt intending to show the inquiring Englishman how democratic everything had suddenly become in Portugal.

The interviewer thought it was a good chance to get in a word at that moment about the harsh treatment of the Little Sisters of the Poor. At the mention of the name His Excellency bounced from his chair: "The Little Sisters of the Poor!" he cried, "good women, no doubt, but you must know that the Republic has an unconquerable aversion to religious orders of every kind. And the good people of the North, who, above all, cherish the love of hearth and home, I assure you that whenever they see a Little Sister they say to themselves instinctively: 'she will entice away our daughters, she will break up the family.' If these poor deluded religious leave their families and abandon their domestic duties, it is simply a result of feminine weakness and impulsiveness, a longing for spiritual emotion, a desire to spread themselves, but their proper place is home."

"Look at me," he continued with a pathetic wail. "I am compelled to forsake the delights and duties of my peaceful home because of my devotion to the Republic."

Why not then expel Machado himself? Otherwise he may be a temptation to some one to leave the delights of home, and become a Cabinet Minister. But though you can abandon family and friends for politics, it is quite another thing when there is question of God Almighty or the poor.

A Royal Profession of Faith

The King of Spain was the first monarch to take part in a Eucharistic Congress. His present Government and a small, though noisy and politically important section of his people, are hostile to religion, and therefore it required no slight moral courage for Alfonso to make such open profession of his faith. His address of welcome to the Congress, written we are told by his own hand, has the true Catholic ring. Having declared that "he and all the royal family join in this tribute of faith and love to Jesus Christ in the august Sacrament of the Altar," he concluded: "May God bless this illustrious assembly, so that its labors may prove fruitful and may extend more and more throughout the world the worship of Jesus in the Sacrament of the Altar, and may tend to establish among all peoples that sacred fraternity which, without interfering with their patriotism or the glorious traditions that each preserves as a treasure, unites them all in one love and one faith, within one fold and under one pastor." The special thanks and blessing which the Holy Father sent to the King for his services to the Congress were well deserved.

Parental Ambition

The cost of maintaining Harvard University during the fiscal year 1908-1909 was, according to a news item, $2,678,936.

The current expenses of Harvard are presumably paid from its income. The amount referred to above, whatever may be its source, is equivalent to the income accruing from $65,000,000 invested at 4 per cent. The number of students then at Harvard was about four thousand. To educate these young men during a scholastic year of approximately nine months this vast expenditure was required. The amount of money in circulation about the university must have been a considerably larger sum than these figures indicate. Each student expended for his own support, and perhaps for the good things of life, an amount which was not reported to the university. In addition, athletics required large receipts and disbursements. This glance at the cost of maintaining Harvard enables us to understand the slang of the Boston tradesmen, who refer to America's richest university as "the Harvard gold coast."

Catholic parents, who forgetful of their church, send their sons to the great Protestant universities to enable them to become acquainted with wealthy young men, should consider the matter carefully. The gilded non-Catholic youth are quick to discover the aims of those whose proper place is at centres of Catholic education. Catholics are made to pay royally for the joys of Protestant society. Unless a Catholic young man is unusually well endowed with mental or physical gifts, the strength of the friendship which he forms is in exact proportion to the length of his purse. Even the most ambitious Catholic parent will admit that it is desirable for his son as a part of his education to master the difficult art of keeping money. To do this in what has been aptly termed "an atmosphere of banknotes and gold," and at the same time make friends among men of expensive habits, requires strength of character which few students possess. The net results of parental ambition in this field are usually an education without religious foundation, extravagant habits formed during an impressionable age, and a few friendships based upon monetary considerations.

We have sent to Paris for the official details of the recent marriage there of two opera singers, both previously divorced. Until these details are received it is useless to try to deal with the incident, except to state the obvious fact that, if a marriage was contracted in a church within the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Paris, all the laws of the Church in regard to a Catholic matrimonial union must have been complied with.

LITERATURE

The Summa Theologica of St. Thomas Aquinas. Part I. Literally Translated by FATHERS OF THE ENGLISH DOMINICAN PROVINCE. First Number (QQ. I—XXVI). New York: Benziger Bros.

"Here is one of the greatest books in the world; a book which has formed universities, nourished doctors and presided at councils." For this masterpiece of "the Angelical" is the most remarkable teaching work of its kind ever put forth by mortal man; its influence on the learned is shown by the number and prominence of its commentators, and the high place it holds in the Church by the fact that at Trent, the "Summa" lay on the altar beside the Holy Scriptures and the decrees of the Supreme Pontiffs.

The work is prefaced by Pope Leo's encyclical in praise of St. Thomas, and by excellent essays on the Scholastic Philosophy, the method of St. Thomas, the nature of the "Summa" and the character of this translation. The English readers, to whom the Latin of St. Thomas is a silent tongue, can get some idea of the thoroughness and depth of the Angel of the Schools by reading from this volume a few chapters on the nature and attributes of God. "Is this so?" "Why?" St. Thomas is constantly asking. Yet he never leaves his questions unanswered. He advances in all their strength 10,000 objections against the Christian religion, but conclusively meets them all. What intellectual drudgery must not this have entailed! No one surely but a saint could have borne it. When asked, near the end of his life, what he considered the choicest grace he had received, Aquinas is said to have answered: "The grace of understanding whatever I read." A grace indeed. For the office of St. Thomas was to show how highly rational religion is, by drawing from faith the intellectuality enshrined in it. Nowadays uncertainty is considered the work of a sound mind, but in the Catholic thirteenth century the sane were those who were certain.

Even in English the "Summa" is hardly a volume that will be eagerly bought at railway stations, nor is it likely to be widely read as a vacation book. But Catholics who wish to know how one of the world's greatest intellects found reasons for the faith he had, or non-Catholics who are curious to see with their own eyes whether it is really true, as their most approved authors assert, that the scholastic theologians were mainly occupied in inquiring as to how many angels can dance on the point of a needle, might profitably read this English "Summa." Switzerland To-day. A Study in Social Progress. By VIRGINIA M. CRAWFORD. London: Sands & Co. St. Louis: B. Herder. 30 cents.

The author of this little book is greatly interested in the social questions of the working classes. We suspect that her sympathy runs to the organizing of Catholics for social reform, with all sorts and conditions of men and women outside the Church, rather than to the restraining of their activity within its limits. The question is a knotty one, not to be settled except by competent authority, those whom the Holy Ghost has set to rule the Church of God with Peter speaking the last word. We think we see indications of what the decision will be, but it is not for us to forestall it.

The story of the rosy hopes of Dr. Decurtins, of the failure of his schemes and of his withdrawal from the field of social action is instructive. Indeed, all that is purely historical in Mrs. Crawford's book is such. When, however, she undertakes to deal with doctrinal matters, we can not but feel that she is going out of her province and attempting things too high for her, not without danger for herself and her readers. On page 23 we read that Dr. Decurtins "based his whole policy of social reform on the principle enunciated by St. Thomas Aquinas, that men have no absolute personal rights over their property, that they are but stewards of their wealth, and must administer it for the common good." The doctrine of St. Thomas on the subject of property cannot be summed up in three lines and a half of Mrs. Crawford's book, nor do we think her capable of summarizing it. Once a similar attempt was made to summarize his doctrine regarding the ownership of land, and it was disastrous.

Mrs. Crawford seems to think that Leo XIII approved congresses in which Catholics, Protestants and Atheists come together to discuss labor questions, giving as proof his letter to Dr. Decurtins on the meeting of the Arbeiterbund at Bienne in 1893. Such letters need careful study. They are official documents of which every word has been weighed carefully. The letter in question is both commendatory and directive. The Pope commends the Arbeiterbund meeting because Dr. Decurtins had told him that it had received the encyclical, "Rerum Novarum," with signal approval and commendation, and because it had paved the way to another congress to promote international legislation for the protection of women workers and children, and the carrying out of the ideas of the "Rerum Novarum." The directive part is more important. Leo XIII had treated the whole labor question exhaustively in the "Rerum Novarum," and he required this to be the handbook of every Catholic social worker. In a word, he approved all social action of which it should be the guide: he reprobated any social action on other lines, and foretold for it disaster. We may say here that no document, perhaps, has been more abused than this great encyclical. Within and without the Church are those who praise it. Many pick from it, here and there, what they fancy supports their own theories and ideas. Comparatively few, even among Catholic sociologists study it with absolute docility, taking it in its entire scope as their guide.

The chapters on "Recent Catholic Organization" and "Feminine Activities" are informing. It is, however, unfortunate that Switzerland is unique among the countries of the world. Mrs. Crawford says very truly that its lessons may be studied with profit. On the other hand, she evidently recognizes that the situation in England is very different, and its problems are more complex. The same is true of America.

The Great Texts of the Bible. Edited by the Rev. JAMES HASTINGS, D.D. Genesis to Numbers; Acts and Romans I-VIII. 2 vols. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

It is refreshing to find amongst the dreary crowd of Protestant writers publishing shallow blasphemies with tiresome persistency an author maintaining the old evangelical traditions. The former are heading straight for hell and dragging with them their foolish readers. The latter gives imperfectly, it is true, and mixed with many errors, what God's mercy can use for salvation, the divinity of Christ and His atonement for sin. Generally Dr. Hastings speaks with no uncertain sound: sometimes, unfortunately, he is overpowered with his environment, especially when he quotes and follows authors who, even among Protestants, have no reputation for orthodoxy. For one thing he deserves praise. He is not afraid of Rationalistic abusers of God's Word; and if his readers got from his books this certain truth, that all such are petty charlatans, making up by pride and noisy arrogance for their lack of wisdom and sound judgment, they will have got something worth having.

Like Protestant ministers generally, Dr. Hastings, despite his degree in theology, is sadly deficient in sacred science. To take one example of many, he attempts to discuss the image of God in man, as found in the intellect and will, without saying a word of the pure intellect and its adequate object, the True, and ignoring utterly the will with its adequate object, the Good.

Of course there can be no thought of commending to Catholics a work which, no matter how good its author's intention may be, is necessarily full of errors against the Catholic Faith.

H. W.

A True Hidalgo. By Don LUIS COLÓMA. Translated from the Spanish by HAROLD BINNS. St. Louis: B. Herder.

All the other stories of this Jesuit novelist are powerfully written, and this book is no exception to the rule. Taking for a text the warning: "Two women should have a place in a man's life: his mother, and the mother of his children; these two sacred and stainless affections apart, all others bring guilt or peril," Father Coloma introduces us to the tarnished hero of the story, the Count de Baza, at a masquerade ball, and soon leads us into the thick of a plot based on an intrigue and a mysterious murder, and keeps us in suspense till the tragic death of "Boy" in the last chapter. The author is a master of character portrayal; with a few deft touches he can give his readers a picture they will remember. The book sparkles with wit and so abounds in recondite literary and historical allusions that the translator has thoughtfully appended here and there illuminating foot notes which might profitably have been more numerous still. Mr. Binns has turned the Spanish into English so well that scarcely a trace of the original idiom survives, though the expression "to take preparations" should be corrected. If readers of modern novels in which illicit passion is condoned or defended have so vitiated their taste and defiled their imagination that stories by Catholic authors are now tame and insipid, would take up some of Father Coloma's books, they would see that even a novel pervaded by a Catholic atmosphere and driving home a strong moral lesson can be made interesting, for his heroines do not invariably end by taking the veil, nor do his heroes always find peace in a monastery. Are the publishers of Padre Coloma's translated works aware that "Don" is not the proper title for a religious priest?

Chapters in Christian Doctrine; Reason the Witness of Faith. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co.

This book, as the anonymous author puts it, is designed to bring out "the absolute harmony of Religion with Reason," and to arm Catholics against "the ever-ready ridicule of apparent discrepancies between their distinctive views of life and the current views of the world," that they may "turn a bolder front not only towards ignorant imputations, but also towards the liberalizing tendencies of their own hearts." The chapters are thrown into catechetical form because a "well-pointed question is worth nine-tenths of the answer"; and the questioning is admirably done, for not a word the young would find it hard to understand is allowed to pass unexplained, even if the answer seems to carry the author away from his subject. The chapters on the Mission and Work of Jesus, on Truth and Essentials, and on Purity are particularly well done, for the constitution of the Church and the philosophy of objective truth are brought down to the comprehension of children, and the necessity and nature of cleanness of heart, with some practical counsels on how the young should show their love for the beauty of God's house, are plainly but prudently set forth. The book will also clear the ideas on religious subjects of many Catholics who are children no longer.

The Little House Under the Hill. By CLARA MULHOLLAND. New York: Benziger Bros.

This is a story for school girls, by one of their favorite authors. Reverses of fortune have forced the Eastman family to give up their big town house and rent a little cottage in the country, where four girls undertake to draw their pin money from a kitchen garden. But instead of buying pins, they benevolently give a fortnight's outing to Tessy and Phillis, two poor city girls of their acquaintance. A sophisticated reader of course can see all along that Mr. Pembroke will turn out to be the rich cousin of the two orphans, and that the vain and disobedient Phillis is to be well humbled before the book ends, but little maids of twelve will doubtless read this story to the last page with breathless interest.

Les Cinq Républiques de l'Amérique Centrale. Par le Cte. M. de PERIGNY. Paris: Pierre Roger et Cie. Editeurs.

M. de Perigny has written this sketch of the five republics of Central America for the purpose of interesting Frenchmen commercially in that remote, and, as far as France is concerned, that unknown part of the world. The United States is rapidly taking possession of it, and the absolute possession of the Isthmus will forestall any union of Mexico and these republics with the countries of South America. The statistics agricultural, industrial and otherwise are an appeal to business men not to neglect the opportunity which is yet available.

EDUCATION

One does not like to appear to criticize what will be very generally held to be a deserving charity, yet it is not mere unreasonable fault-finding to suggest that Catholics, interested in safeguarding the poor and dependent little ones of their Church, should give vigilant heed to a movement that is spreading rapidly in many of the larger cities of the country. The New York press recently gave appreciative notice of its progress in the metropolis. Summer schools, we were told, were opened in thirty Protestant churches in New York City. For five days a week during the summer, parish houses and cool church basements will be kept open for two hours every morning, and 15,000 poor children of the East and West side, it is expected, will attend. They will be taught singing by girls from Barnard, Vassar, Bryn Mawr, Wellesley, and other women's colleges, and students of many universities and divinity schools will teach the boys basket making, weaving, hammock making, and other useful arts. Behind the movement, although their names were not made public, are some wealthy young women, who have given generous financial support. The active leaders in the work are Protestant students of theology and representative men of various Young Men's Christian Association centres. Prominent pastors of Protestant churches are enthusiastic in commending the enterprise.

* * *

Of course the old assuring word is passed about that the movement is essentially non-sectarian. "We do not emphasize the religious side of the schools," naively remarks Mr. W. F. L. Edwards, a Yale man and the superintendent of the schools in the New York City district. Yet after an auto bus, a forceful argument for attendance and an entirely new alluring feature in church and mission work, has made its rounds to gather up the little ones through the congested district and to give them a free ride to the school in the cool church basement, one notices that the program calls for a fifteen minutes' religious exercise as an introduction to the school work. A Catholic will not need to be reminded of the danger emerging from the well-intentioned charity of those in charge of the plan. Children are ruled by instincts, and childhood is the formative period, in which is laid the foundation of the later life of habit. Given the attractive setting arranged for the school work, the agreeable features of unwonted refinement, and kindness on the part of those in charge, the alluring temptations of a free ride, perhaps of an appetizing little luncheon, of the singing and games—the non-sectarian religious exercise is certain to impress the child-mind, and the good people engaged in the cause will use, despite every protestation they make to the contrary, the charm of it all to draw our little ones away from us.

Perhaps they have no intention to proselytize,—one may be generous and accept their assurance of this, but staid old experience assures us quite as strongly that work such as is done in these schools is bound injuriously to affect the Catholic child allowed to share in it. And, unfortunately, the congested districts of the East and West sides of New York City contain a multitude of Catholic children. Very probably the bulk of the 15,000 already drawn to these summer schools are Catholics. To be sure, worldliness will object to our implied criticism that we should be loath to deny these poor outcasts of the slums the refining influences the schools afford unless we are ready to do something equally good to help them. A Catholic might answer: it is written, "seek ye first the kingdom of heaven," and affirm that, even in the lack of the like material attractions, Catholic children should be urged to keep away from the allurements that will surely dim the priceless lustre of their faith, even if they do not entirely destroy it.

* * *

But we have a better suggestion. Why may we not imitate an example which, in many aspects, is worthy of unstinted praise? Mr. Edwards vouches for it that there are Catholics among the volunteer teachers recruited for his schools from the college men and college women eager to help in a good cause. Why may not these and others be invited to serve under the flag of their own Church? We have commodious schools, vacant in the summer time,—we have cool church basements. We have charitably disposed rich coreligionists, who would, one may believe, readily contribute the financial assistance the work demands. No doubt it would not be impossible to obtain an auto bus in which the little ones might enjoy their free ride. All that is needful, then, to equip and start summer schools for our own children is an organization eager to safeguard Catholic interests and to meet the purposes of non-Catholic philanthropists, who, while protesting the purest sentiments, very effectually conspire to do just what they claim they are in nowise minded to accomplish.

A writer in the Boston Pilot, speaking of another matter, recently said: "The union of Catholic and non-Catholic is, in itself, unnatural and unwelcome. In nine cases out of ten it leads to perversion of the Catholic party, not to speak of the irreligion of the children." The loss to the Church by reason of mixed marriages may be exaggerated by the writer—the phrase "nine out of ten" is probably a mere rhetorical turn—but surely such unions are productive of distressing lapses. Just as surely may one note perversion and irreligion among the results wrought by the many presumed well-intended movements of non-Catholic charity organizations, which offer their non-sectarian helpfulness to the needy and dependent among Catholics. But mere theory will not cure the evil. Our Catholic people—thank God the day has passed when the means at our disposal forbade the attempt—must generously meet the plans of those outside the Church and do for their poor what these cannot do for them without perilous consequences to Catholics who accept their largesses.

Catholics are blamed because of the sharp note characterizing their criticism of the public school system. They have been affirmed to be disloyal and un-American because they use the privilege conceded to every citizen to point out defects in existing civic methods, and to secure reforms which they believe to be suggested by prudent forethought for the country's welfare. One wonders what they who attack us will have to say to the criticism of public schools made in the very home of its closest friends and supporters. It will be difficult to discover more pointed and emphatic disapproval of public school instruction than that pronounced by prominent leaders of the system recently foregathered in San Francisco. "Civic sloth and depravity are general throughout the country because the schools fail to train for citizenship," was a charge made by one representative from New York. "The present pressing problem in education is to arouse in the life of each person dealing with children the conviction that the moral and religious development of the child is an immediate necessity," is a contention put forward by C. E. Hugh, associate professor of education at the University of California. Henry H. Goddard, of the school for the feeble-minded at Vineland, N. J., brought the startling charge against our modern educational practices that the blame for backwardness among school children and mental deficiency was due to the crowded and elaborate school curricula which have been current in our schools in late years. Finally, in one of the strongest criticisms of the tendency of American educational ideals and aims, Mrs. Emmons Blaine, of Chicago, called upon the teachers of the National Association to turn from the "bread and butter" attitude, with which too many of them, she affirmed, viewed their profession. She urged the imperative need to turn to higher ideals, to combat the influence of a growing materialistic age, and to teach a higher citizenship.

This year for the first time the large building of the Manila Observatory was placed at the disposal of the young men attending the Teachers' Assembly in Manila. More than a hundred teachers took advantage of this exceptional opportunity offered them and took up their residence in the Observatory. The large grounds offered ample opportunity for athletic sports. Several illustrated lectures were given by Father Finegan, who looked after the comfort of the teachers during the entire period of the Assembly. Among the means of recreation and instruction provided by the American Jesuit was an excursion to Cavite. A member of the marine corps assigned as guide to the teachers pointed out the various objects of interest in the Arsenal. Another excursion was made to the Laguna on Labor Day, May 1st. The launch made a landing at Fort McKinley to enable the teachers to visit this immense military reservation, the largest under the American flag. The teachers attended Mass on Sundays in the Seminary chapel, a choir was organized and the congregational singing was excellent. The feast of the Patronage of St. Joseph, May 7, was observed as a day of General Communion. A few days before the end of the Assembly, the teachers invited their friends to an entertainment which was given in the Observatory garden. Hundreds of Japanese lanterns strung from tree to tree gave a new charm to the section of the garden selected for the entertainment. The program was literary and musical and met with hearty applause from the large gathering present. The teachers expressed their regret that the closing of the Assembly forced them to leave the Observatory building, where they had passed a profitable and pleasant month. These interesting items are culled from the June number of the Little Messenger of the Sacred Heart, published in Manila.

SOCIOLOGY

Female suffrage has become in a surprisingly short time a real political question. Not so long ago ridicule was the only argument its opponents used against it. This no longer suffices when in England, where the agitation is most acute, some of the most influential women of the country support it. Nor can a general female incapacity be alleged any longer; for if peaceful politics be considered, it appears that in county councils and school boards women have not shown themselves inferior to men, while for violent agitation they have shown in the suffrage movement a very remarkable talent. The right to vote and to be voted for is not necessarily inherent in the people, and when granted in modern times, it is granted in a way provided for in the constitution of the state. But the granting supposes a capacity in the recipient; and women ask, what capacity have men that they do not possess? They have property which they administer. They pay taxes. They are workers, both skilled and unskilled. They are in the professions. They are authors and artists. They are teachers in every grade from elementary to university. Moreover, in times past women have played a very important part in public life. In old feudal days a woman could be a tenant of the crown, enjoying within her domain all a tenant's rights and privileges. The limiting of succession to heirs male came later; so that if one hears that in England or Scotland a woman has succeeded to a barony in her own right, one may take it for granted that the barony is of very ancient date. Among sovereigns the proportion of women who have surpassed a political mediocrity is greater than that of men; the empress Pulcheria; Eleanor, mother of Henry II. of England; Isabella of Castile; Blanche of France; Matilda of Tuscany; Elizabeth and Catharine II of Russia, occur to the mind at once. In England four queens have reigned; two are put in the front rank by universal consent, and Mary would hold a place hardly inferior were she as well known.

Nevertheless, it must be noted that such women were exceptions, brought by special circumstances into the position they occupied; and that though they exercised executive power freely and ably, women have never been called to the deliberations of the legislative power. A woman might be tenant-in-chief of the crown, but she was never summoned to parliament; and it is the legislative power they now ask. Now, women excel in a sort of practical intuition. They often see instinctively the right thing to be done but they do not so readily evolve the reasons of its rightness, so as to persuade others. Again, women are pertinacious and pushing. They have, too, a peculiar fortitude of their own; and all these qualities find their scope in executive administration; they do not qualify one for legislation. That some women have succeeded in county councils and school boards proves very little. These are few, and, as a rule, are masculine women, combining certain mental qualities of men with the pertinacity of women. They do not push their way into society, because they do not care to be there: they do wish to be in the council and the board, and so they get there.

Women are easily excited, and in the turmoil of political discussion, whether in meetings or in the streets, they lose that self control which is absolutely necessary for those who take part in legislative deliberations. We have seen this in the suffragist agitation. We know how in the French Revolution respectable old women with their knitting were transformed into furies clamoring for blood in the galleries of the Convention and the Assembly, and revelling in it at the foot of the guillotine. Every chief of police will tell us how enormously the danger of a mob of men increases when a few maddened women are in it; and any physician will bear witness to the physical evils of such excitement.

"Non omnia possumus omnes." This is the great argument against female suffrage. A parish priest feels that he has within him another Nelson, another Napoleon. But he will never lead army or fleet to victory. His state of life, his lifelong duties forbid it. A lawyer has in his soul music that Wagner would have envied. It will remain buried there. He has his family to support; for he has given hostages to fortune. Woman has her life duty laid on her by God. Politics, following the suffrage, are incompatible with it. Hence, even though she had a real capacity for them, woman as a class is excluded from them by the higher functions God requires of her.

During some years past many patents for the improving of coal briquets have been granted at home and abroad, but few have proved to be of commercial importance. A new binding agent, sulphite pitch, lately discovered in Germany, is said to have proved efficient. It is described as intensely gelatinous, of a very high binding power, burning without smoke or odor, not softening under heat, and consumed at a very high temperature. It can be manufactured as a powder, or can be ground to any degree of fineness. A great advantage of this substance is that it is manufactured from the troublesome by-products of paper mills. Its analysis is as follows: Fixed carbon 25 to 35 per cent., volatile matter 50 to 60 per cent., ash 8 to 12 per cent., and water 10 to 15 per cent.

An English patent, granted to L. Maitre, covers a new process for the soldering of aluminium. A thin layer of iron is deposited on the surface of the aluminium, which is plunged successively into boiling and cold water. It is then heated until the deposit has assumed a bluish tint, when it is again immersed in cold water, the method being akin to the hardening of steel. The result is that the iron adheres more closely to the aluminium base. On removing the film of bluish oxide with fine emery cloth, the metal will yield to any regular soldering method.

A recent study of the action of ultra-violet rays on rubber has disclosed the following facts: On rubber of the raw Para type they have no effect. A slight decomposition is noticed in plantation rubber, in others elasticity is entirely destroyed, and the gum becomes very sticky. Vulcanization greatly increases the resistance to these rays, as does the addition of mineral matter. The fact that the rubber is unaffected by this light when exposed in a vacuum indicates that the action is one of oxidization. The rays possessing the largest coefficient of refraction are the most active. These observations have a special importance in regard to aeronautics where rubber coverings are used; for it is a well-established fact that the higher atmospheric regions abound in ultra-violet rays.

It is proposed to utilize the immense peat deposits in the north-western part of Germany as fuel to be employed in the development of electrical energy for agricultural purposes. A conservative estimate places the horse power hours derivable from a ton of peat at 600. Ammonia may also be obtained in considerable quantities.

The Right Rev. Joseph Schrembs, Auxiliary Bishop of Grand Rapids, Mich., preached an eloquent sermon at the laying of the corner-stone of the new St. Anne's Church, Lenox, Mass., on July 16. In answer to the charge that Catholics are a priest-ridden people, he said in his sermon: "Well, let us see. The New York Independent, a leading Protestant weekly journal, shall give us the answer to this objection. Here is what it says: 'From the elaborate statistics of the diverse Christian denominations published, we gather the result that the adjective, "priest-ridden" attaches not to Catholics, but in its fullest sense to Protestant denominations. These very statistics show that the Catholic priests have the largest parishes, and the Baptists the smallest; that the Methodists have four times as many churches and three times as many ministers; the Baptists nearly five times as many ministers as there are Catholic priests in the country, although they have little more than one-half the communicants. The result is that there are only 90 Baptists on an average to one of the churches; 110 Methodists to each of their congregations while the average number of Catholics to one church is not less than 763.'"

Sunday, July 16, the Feast of our Lady of Mount Carmel was made memorable in the history of the Diocese of Springfield, Mass., by the laying of the corner-stone of two fine churches. One of these is for the Italian Catholics of Springfield and will be known as the church of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, of which the Rev. Anthony Della Porta is the first pastor. The ceremony was performed by the Right Rev. Thomas D. Beavan, Bishop of Springfield, and was attended by the rectors of all the Catholic churches in the city. On the same day, at Lenox, Mass., in the extreme western limit of the diocese, the corner-stone of St. Anne's was laid by the Right Rev. Joseph Schrembs, D.D. The design of the new church as given in the Springfield Republican shows that the church as projected will be one of the most beautiful ecclesiastical edifices in New England. The Rev. William F. Grace is pastor.

The Rev. Joseph Grimmelsman, S.J., former president of St. Louis University, and later provincial of the Missouri Province of the Society of Jesus, has been appointed president of Marquette University, Milwaukee. The presidency of St. Xavier's College, Cincinnati, which Father Grimmelsman vacates, will be filled by the Rev. Francis Heiermann, S.J., recently president of St. John's College, Toledo. The Rev. John A. Weiland, of Chicago, has been made president of St. John's College, Toledo.

and the Rev. William F. Dooley, S.J., president of Detroit College, Detroit.

August promises to be a very busy month for the members of the leading Catholic societies. According to the programs now arranged, these gatherings will be held:

1-4. National Convention Catholic Order of Foresters, Cleveland, Ohio. 1, 2 and 3. National Convention of the Knights of Columbus, Detroit, Mich. 8-11: The Forty-First National Convention of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, Scranton, Pa. 20-24. National Convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies, Columbus, Ohio, followed by a conference of the editors of the Catholic papers.

PERSONAL.

Apropos of the seventy-seventh birthday of Cardinal Gibbons, the Baltimore Sun, July 22, touches interestingly on the life story and daily habits of His Eminence.

"Cardinal Gibbons will be seventy-seven years old to-morrow. Away from the city's strife and among friends at a beautiful spot about fifty miles from Baltimore he will spend the day quietly. There will be no observance of the event by the venerable prelate.

"To see the Cardinal stepping along the streets of Baltimore, with his cheeks aglow with the joy of living and with his bright eyes bespeaking his keen observance of the things about him, one would scarcely believe that the leading representative of the Catholic Church in this country is a near-octogenarian. His life, however, has been spent in such strict observance of those laws which are conducive to health that time rests lightly on his shoulders. As a young curate, the Cardinal was delicate, and grave fears were entertained by his parishioners lest he break down under the strain of work. Memories of those days bring smiles to the Cardinal's countenance.

"The Cardinal was the eldest son of Mr. Thomas and Mrs. Bridget Gibbons, and was born on Gay Street, near Fayette Street, July 23, 1834. At that time the residential section centered about the neighborhood in which he was born, and Baltimore was an entirely different city from the Baltimore of to-day. When he was four days old he was taken to the Cathedral, the future scene of the many notable events in his life, and was there baptized by Rev. Dr. Charles I. White, whose funeral sermon was preached by Archbishop Gibbons just forty-four years afterward.

"The Cardinal went to Ireland with his parents when three years old, returning to this country with his mother after his father's death, about ten years later.

"After working for some time in a grocery at New Orleans the Cardinal entered St. Charles' College, and then began his long career crowded with honors. The Cardinal has always taken the same interest in wholesome recreations as he did in boyhood days, and is now one of the leading advocates of clean, healthy sports. A sound mind in a sound body has been a maxim successfully followed by him."

Of the Knighthoods conferred on the occasion of the coronation of George V, one that will interest Americans is that bestowed on Vice-Admiral Sir Henry Kane, who, as Captain Kane, saved a large number of American sailors in Hawaiian waters twenty-two years ago. A terrible storm, which wrecked three German and three American cruisers then in port, burst on Apia harbor, and Captain Kane, seeing that no anchor or mooring would hold, sailed out in the teeth of the storm, saved his ship, and rescued the survivors of two American vessels, while his ship's band played, by his order, "The Star Spangled Banner." Admiral Kane is a brother of Brother Kane, Superior of La Salle Institute, Waterford, who spent several years as an architect in the United States before he entered the Christian Brother congregation; and a first cousin of Fathers Robert, Patrick and William Kane, of the Irish province of the Society of Jesus.

Right Rev. Mgr. O. E. Mathieu, D.D., former rector of Laval University, has been appointed first Bishop of Regina, the new see that takes its title from Saskatchewan's capital.

Judge John Gibbons of the Circuit Court of Chicago is quoted as declaring that he will never again perform a marriage ceremony. He is a Catholic and gives as his reason that marriage belongs to the Church. "I am weary," he adds, "of all this turmoil and trouble which the daily grind of divorce cases has unfolded to me. No judge or jurist can stand on the bench from which he may some day grant a divorce to one of the parties to a marriage and lend the proper sanctity to a marriage ceremony. If every marriage were performed with church rites the divorce evil would become an occasional marital tragedy instead of a national disease."

OBITUARY

The Rev. Thomas J. M. Hanselman, rector of St. Mary's Church, Jamaica, L. I., was run down by an automobile on Wednesday, July 19, and, as a result of his injuries, died two days later at St. Mary's Hospital, Jamaica. At his bedside when he breathed his last were his brother, the Rev. Joseph F. Hanselman, S.J., Provincial of the Maryland-New York Jesuits; Sister Vincent of the Order of St. Dominick of Brooklyn and Sister Thomasine, a member of the Order of Sisters of Christian Charity, of the Bronx, sisters of the dying priest. Father Hanselman was born in Brooklyn on March 11, 1868, and was educated at St. John's College, Brooklyn. He was raised to the priesthood in 1893. Eight years ago he was put in charge of St. Mary's at Jamaica, where he built up one of the largest and most flourishing parishes in the diocese. There were originally six brothers and two sisters in the Hanselman family, five of the brothers becoming priests and the two sisters nuns. The Rev. George M. Hanselman, who died in 1887, was assistant at the Church of the Holy Trinity, Brooklyn. The Rev. John M. Hanselman, rector of the Church of St. Benedict, died in 1906. The Rev. James J. Hanselman is pastor of St. Barbara's Church, Brooklyn. Father Thomas was the youngest of the priests, and regret over his untimely death as well as sympathy for the surviving members of the family is widespread.

Sister M. Cecilia O'Connor died at the mother house of the Sisters of Mercy, New York, on July 20. Sister Cecilia took the religious habit in 1858, when the mother house was in Houston Street, New York, and was professed two years later by Archbishop Hughes. She was elected Mother Superior in 1882. An accomplished musician, Sister Cecilia was still more remarkable for her deep humility and childlike simplicity. The Rt. Rev. Mgr. Mooney, V.G., said the Mass at her funeral, assisted by the Rt. Rev. Mgr. Edwards, V.G., and the Rt. Rev. Mgr. McGean. The deceased religious leaves in the community a surviving sister, who is also a golden jubilarian. The late Rev. Charles O'Connor, S.J., for many years connected with St. Francis Xavier's, New York, was her brother. Another brother, Edward, who had also joined the Society of Jesus, died many years ago.

Sister Madeline O'Brien, for forty years one of the prominent teachers at St. Joseph's Academy, Emmitsburgh, Md., died in Baltimore on July 9th. She was seventy-three years old and rounded out a religious career of more than half a century.

The death at Hot Springs, Ark., is announced of Sister Mary Loyola Breareton, one of the oldest members of the Sisters of Mercy. Sister Loyola was eighty-six years of age and had been in the convent for fifty-five years.

President Praises Democrats.—President Taft, in his first authoritative statement on the passage of the reciprocity agreement by Congress, makes full acknowledgment of the part played by the Democratic party in working and voting for the agreement. "I should be wanting in straightforward speaking," says Mr. Taft, "if I did not freely acknowledge the credit that belongs to the Democratic majority in the House and the Democratic minority in the Senate for their consistent support of the measure in an earnest and sincere desire to secure its passage. Without this reciprocity would have been impossible. It would not have been difficult for them to fasten upon the bill amendments affecting the tariff generally in such a way as to embarrass the Executive and to make it doubtful whether he could sign the bill, and yet to claim popular approval for their support of reciprocity in its defeat. In other words, the Democrats did not 'play politics,' in the colloquial sense in which those words are used, but they followed the dictates of a higher policy." This manly and candid declaration, whatever be the outcome of the arbitration pact, is another proof of the President's determination to rise above party interests and party policy whenever the greater good of the greater number appeals to his high sense of duty, and his feeling of responsibility as Chief Executive of the nation.

Pelagic Sealing Prohibited.—The fur seal treaty to which the United States, England, Russia and Japan are party is in a fair way to become effective by December 15, the date set for its coming into operation. The Committee on Foreign Relations was unanimous in reporting it favorably, and the Senate ratified it without asking a question relative to the terms of the agreement. Under the terms of the pact the killing of seals in the open sea, known as pelagic sealing, is absolutely prohibited, north of the thirtieth degree of north latitude, for fifteen years, and the various Governments are given power to regulate and even to stop seal-killing on the islands within their jurisdiction. The treaty does not go into effect until ratified by all the signatory Powers. Neither delay nor failure is anticipated.

Sweeping Rate Decision.—Decisions have been handed down by the Interstate Commerce Commission affecting all freight rates between the Atlantic Ocean and the Pacific Coast. The Commission lays down the principle that hereafter railroads will not be permitted to fix arbitrarily market limits, and that for the future commercial conditions rather than the will of railroad traffic managers shall control rates on transcontinental transportation. In the Spokane-Reno-Pacific Coast cases the Commission orders material reduction in freight rates from the East to points between Denver and the Western terminals of the great transcontinental railroads. The Commission recognizes the right of a railroad to meet water competition to Pacific Coast points, but practically wipes out the back haul charges from the Coast to stations along the line. It lays down what in the West it considers would be fair and just rates to various freight zones, and gives the railroads until October 15 to adjust their tariff accordingly.

Wreck of Battleship Maine.—The work of clearing the wreck of the Maine continues unabated. On July 25 the remains of three or four bodies were uncovered, piled in a confused heap. They were all found lying near the place where recently were discovered remains of other members of the crew, who are supposed to have been sleeping on the open deck on the night of the explosion. The forward part of the battleship is a confused mass of ruins, but there is now fairly good reason to hope that the main bulkhead immediately aft of the central superstructure of the ship, and constituting one-third of its total length, may be floated. Derricks are being erected above the wreck for the purpose of removing the masses of metal as fast as they are dissected by hydro-acetylene blasts, which will shortly be put into operation.

Mexico.—Deputy José M. Gamboa lodged with the permanent committee of the Mexican Congress a formal complaint against President De la Barra and his cabinet, the object being impeachment proceedings. The committee ignored the complaint and passed a resolution of confidence in the President. Gamboa's motive seems to have been a desire to see his name in print.—The proprietors of a cotton mill in Guerrero have asked the President for an armed guard. Their establishment was sacked last April, and they have been unable to resume work, owing to the continued presence in the immediate neighborhood of the armed men who were guilty of the outrage.—The Government reports that the number of soldiers "killed, wounded or missing" during the revolution was eight thousand; in other words, fully one-half of the Federal army, which, when hostilities began, numbered sixteen thousand men in all.—The employees of the custom house at Ciudad Juárez under the Diaz régime escaped to the American side of the river, taking with them all the public funds, when they saw that the city was in danger of falling into the hands of the Maderists. Their places were at once taken by sympathizers with the revolution. Now that peace (?) has been restored they clamor for their former positions, but the substitutes prefer to retain them. A petition has been sent to the Government to secure their return.—Signs of a widespread conspiracy to discredit the administration of De la Barra are looked upon as an attempt to bring about his resignation before the election. This would leave the country with no legal executive, and would pave the way to an uprising of the Diaz faction and to the so-called election of a member of the old régime. Answering the question, Why did Diaz resign? El Tiempo says that it was not to save the country but to save his own life, and adds that if he had waited twenty-four hours longer he would have been killed, and his corpse would have been torn to pieces by the infuriated people.

Canada.—The elections overshadow everything else. Parliament was dissolved July 29, and polling is set for Sept. 21. Should the Nationalists prove strong in Quebec, they may hold the balance of power.—

The Bank of Montreal has added $1,600,000 to its capital stock, which now becomes $16,000,000.—A cold wave had the extraordinary effect of causing snow on July 25 in some parts of Ontario and in Western Quebec. Ottawa was among the places in which it fell.—The railway companies propose to bring harvest laborers from England, provided the Government will suspend in favor of these the immigration law requiring all entering the Dominion to have a certain sum of money.—The report on the Chinese immigration frauds at Vancouver shows that there has been for a long time great laxity in the administration of the law. It is tender, however, when it comes to charging corruption against officials.—A large field of very pure magnetic iron ore has been discovered in Vancouver Island, and a strong company, chiefly American, has been formed to work it.—The Canadian Pacific steamer, Empress of China, is ashore near Yokohama. The company has been operating the Pacific line for twenty-five years and this is its first wreck.

Great Britain.—Notwithstanding the grave constitutional crisis, the by-elections are singularly uninteresting. Liberal succeeds Liberal; and Unionist, Unionist, with very little change in the votes. The Unionists retain West Somersetshire by 204, on a poll of 9,446.—In the Trades' Union Congress next September, one of the chief subjects under discussion will be the army. Socialists wish it to be replaced with a citizen army, which will defend them and those carrying their ideas into practice, but will do nothing for others, capitalists especially. The breaking of railway strikes in France and Italy by the recalling of reservists to the colors, and the use made of soldiers in the South Wales strikes, move them to indignation.—The Review of Reviews has published an interview with Mr. Fisher, Premier of the Australian Commonwealth, which, if authentic, shows that while at the Imperial Conference he was practising company manners, and that his language during it requires interpretation. He is reported to have said: "Don't talk to me of the Empire. We are a very loose association of five independent nations willing for the time being to remain in fraternal union with Great Britain and each other, but with the right to haul down the Union Jack and hoist our own flags." This sentiment is also expressed in South Africa by the Afrikaner Bund, and it is that of the Canadian Nationalists.—The House of Lords question is approaching the inevitable solution. The Peers sent back to the Commons the Parliament Bill with their amendments to it, which they knew would be rejected. There was great diversity of opinion as to the course the Government would pursue. Some held that they were divided among themselves as to the practical constitutionality of swamping the House of Lords with new creations. Others were sure the King had refused to consent to such a measure, and that in fostering the idea that he would yield to their counsels the Government was running a huge bluff. These differences were not confined to the Unionists, but were shared in by not a few Liberals. However, Mr. Asquith put an end to them by a letter to Mr. Balfour, giving him the substance of the statement he was to make on the subject in Parliament, namely, that the Peers' amendments would not be accepted; that unless they passed the Bill in its substantial form, the Royal prerogative would be invoked to insure its passage, and that the King had consented to follow the advice of the ministers in the matter. Two or three days afterward he rose in Parliament to make the formal statement, but was howled down by the more aggressive Unionists, led by F. A. Smith and Lord Hugh Cecil, Mr. Balfour's cousin. This performance was not only unbecoming, but also injurious to the cause of the Peers, which, however, seems to have been grossly mismanaged from the first.—Lloyds announces that its ordinary policies cover no war risks after August 15, and quotes a war risk rate of 6 per cent. for three months and 10 per cent. for six months, in view of the dangerous Morocco question.

Ireland.—Referring to the recent assertions of Messrs. O'Brien and Healy that the contemplated Home Rule scheme is a meagre one and will necessitate another general election, Mr. Redmond says: "I have been in close touch with the British public and am quite convinced that Home Rule has the good-will of an overwhelming majority of the British people; and by Home Rule I mean a bold measure of self-government which will give to the Irish people control of their own purely local affairs through a freely-elected Parliament in Dublin, with an executive responsible to it, subject, of course, to Imperial supremacy. Such a measure will be introduced into Parliament at the commencement of next year and will be carried by an overwhelming majority of the House of Commons." Mr. Healy's statement, that the essence of Home Rule is finance, was pronounced a national heresy. "The finance of the Home Rule Bill is no doubt of supreme importance; no government in its senses would propose to set up a system which would become bankrupt, and there is no danger of this happening; but the national question is not a matter of money but a matter of freedom." The Dublin Independent insists that "the mind and brain of the country should be directed to the financial feature of Home Rule, because in it is involved the amount of freedom we are to get." This freedom could be in no sense complete unless Ireland is given full control of all her own taxation, including customs and excise. Should these be reserved to England, as in the Gladstone measures, Ireland would be denied control of seven-tenths of her taxes, and thereby of the same proportion of her freedom. Moreover, Lord McDonnell has proved and British commissioners have conceded that England owes Ireland $1,625,000,000; a considerable portion of this must be returned if the Irish Parliament shall have freedom to make good the damages effected by the depletion. "Give the nation a good financial equipment at the beginning, entrust to her the duty of levying all her own taxes, not merely control of one-fifth or three-tenths, and a spirit of self-reliance, independence and contentment will at once become visible. 'If we do not get a right budget,' said Parnell, 'all will go wrong from the very first hour.'"—A return issued last week shows that up to March 31 thirty-six thousand cottages were provided under the Laborers' Act, and some five thousand more are under construction, at a total expense of $39,000,000. The loans are gradually repaid by the tenants on easy instalments.—The freedom of Dublin has been conferred on Canon O'Leary of Cloyne and Dr. Kuno Meyer because of their eminent services to the Gaelic language. Canon O'Leary, who has written numerous books of sermons, stories, plays and Gaelic text-books, is considered the purest writer of modern Gaelic. Dr. Meyer has translated and published many valuable MSS. and otherwise stimulated the cultivation of the language.

France.—The people are growing daily more impatient about Germany's designs with regard to Morocco. It is thought that she is going to ask for the French Congo as the price of her withdrawal from Morocco, and also the right to take the Congo Free State in case Belgium gives it up. As this vast African possession of many hundreds of thousands of square miles would interfere with England's aims and aspirations, it is concluded that Germany's claim will not be allowed. The official silence in Paris, Berlin and London is increasing the anxiety, which shows itself in the Stock Exchanges of Europe. Asquith has been asked to enlighten the public, and he says if anything occurs he will announce it. Lloyd George's explosion has helped the anxiety which is felt all through Europe.—When the Prime Minister Caillaux entered the House of Deputies for the second reading of the budget, a Socialist member demanded the immediate settlement of the question of the railway strikers. The wildest disorder ensued. When Caillaux could make himself heard he protested that he would do all he promised to do, but would not yield to demagoguery.

Portugal.—The soldiers quartered in the Montariol convent, Braga, from which the religious had been driven, made their way into the convent library and possessed themselves of the books. On the weekly market day, they went out on the streets and sold the books at four cents apiece. A distribution of good literature under such circumstances may be a part of the campaign of enlightenment which the republic has undertaken.—When making the inventory of the parish church of Santo Antonio do Tojal, although the pastor gave his word of honor as to what was contained in the tabernacle, the lay commissioners opened it and uncovered the ciborium which contained the Blessed Sacrament.—By a "decree with the force of law," issued November 4, 1910, the provisional Government granted amnesty to all persons who up to that date had unlawfully shirked military service by taking up their residence in foreign parts. This decree was followed by a circular from the war department to the effect that all who wished to profit by it should present themselves not later than May 4, 1911, at the recruiting station to which they belonged. Many who heard of the decree knew nothing about the circular, which was not widely distributed. When they returned to their homes, they were arrested and sentenced to six years in the army or to a fine of $300, an enormous sum for a Portuguese peasant.—The friends of some of those prominent citizens who died suddenly under suspicious circumstances petitioned the authorities for an autopsy to determine the cause of death, but in no case was the request granted.—The uncertainty of what a day may bring forth has brought commercial transactions to a standstill, for business men are afraid to buy or sell on time. During the last two months homesteads have been disposed of, at what was in realty forced sale, to the amount of four million dollars, presumably by people intent on leaving the country.

Germany.—The present has been a record summer of the American tourist tide. Much of it flows in the direction of the cure resorts, which have never done greater business.—The heat during the last two weeks of July was much beyond the normal. Its terrible effects throughout the country are shown in the unusual number of deaths and prostrations reported.—The German press revived the story of American industrial "spies" again at large in German manufacturing districts, bent upon despoiling the Fatherland of its important trade secrets. It is alleged that the "spies" adopted a plan of seeking information regarding the wage conditions in Germany with the view of making innocent comparisons with similar conditions in the United States, but that the real object of their investigations is to secure information with which to enable the American Customs authorities to "practise fresh atrocities" at the expense of the German exporters. Berlin newspapers state that a public warning against giving the prying Americans any information is urgently needed. Messrs. Emory and Stewart of the American Tariff Board recently have been making inquiries in Germany, and the outbreak in the German press is very likely directed against them.—Professor Hugo Münsterberg, of Harvard University, concludes his nine months' career as Exchange Professor at the University of Berlin this month. His farewell lecture to the university classes was announced for July 27. On that date he finished his course on "Freedom of the Will" in the presence of the Lord Rector and other dignitaries. Professor Münsterberg's sojourn in Berlin has been marked by characteristic energy. One of the projects to which he has been giving considerable attention of late is the establishment of a great German-American news agency, which shall give Americans a more intelligent idea of conditions in the Fatherland, and vice versa, than the Harvard psychologist thinks is now the case.—The German Government has finished its study of the American-German arbitration treaty proposals and has formulated its comment thereon. This comment has been forwarded to Washington as a basis of negotiation. An official statement of the nature of the German views cannot be obtained, but there is reason to believe that they are favorable.—Emperor William returned from his outing in the north five days sooner than had been his announced purpose. At Swinemünde he met Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg and Foreign Secretary von Kiderlen-Wächter, and conferred with them on the latest phases of the Morocco question.

Austria-Hungary.—There has just been published in Vienna a change of program, recalling the official announcement, made in the second week of July, that the Emperor intended, as usual, to preside at the great September maneuvers in Hungary next September. The present despatch from the office of the Imperial chancery makes known that the Heir-Apparent, Archduke Francis Ferdinand, will represent him on that occasion. The change is generally accepted as the result of a precautionary policy on the part of the Emperor's physicians, who are fearful lest the excitement of these military exercises might prove too much of a strain upon his physical resources so closely following upon the Emperor's recent illness.—Police interference prevented what might have been the occasion of violent collision between the Christian Socialists and the Social Democrats in Vienna. Both parties were holding immense mass meetings at the same time to consider legislation thought necessary owing to the meat famine. Heated speeches were made, and the mutual recriminations by speakers at the meetings had so inflamed the minds of their hearers that hurried calls for the guardians of the city's peace were sent in.—Emperor Francis Joseph journeyed from his summer residence in Ischl to Gmunden to pay a visit to the Duke of Cumberland, summering at that place. The aged monarch appeared to enjoy excellent health and his trip down was marked by an unbroken series of ovations from the people of the villages through which he passed.—The cholera situation in the great port of Trieste appears to be a serious one. Fifty-one suspicious cases were under observation early last week. The "suspects" were isolated and every sanitary precaution was being used to stamp out what threatened to become an epidemic.—German manufacturers of machinery and heads of other iron industries have won notable success in the Iron and Steel Industrial Exposition recently held in Budapest. Ten gold medals, first class, with many silver and bronze medals and diplomas of merit marked the excellent character of their display, and it is reported that they returned home with large contracts for future work. Other foreign exhibitors were amazed at the advances made in late years by German iron-workers.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

What the Japanese Think of Universal Suffrage

When the Bill for universal suffrage was introduced in the lower chamber its two principal promoters were Messrs. Hinata and Matsumoto, both of whom have passed ten or twelve years in the United States. The first is a business man, and the second, after studying Financiering and Economics in the University of Pennsylvania and Brown, became connected with the press of Philadelphia, and with several magazines such as Harper's, the Century, Lippincott's, etc. He is at present one of the distinguished publicists of Japan. The two speakers against the Bill were Mr. Arakawa, a man of no particular note, and Mr. Watanabe, a young publicist, who is a son of the present Minister of the Imperial household, and a nephew of a former Minister of Finance. He studied law in Tokyo and England.

Immediately after the Russo-Japanese war, Mr. Matsumoto addressed an open letter to Parliament in favor of universal suffrage. His principal argument is as follows: "In order to triumph in this gigantic war, the entire people made enormous sacrifices in money and lives. It supported a million soldiers, who fought like lions, and underwent with joy the most terrible sufferings. Nevertheless, the Government will accord no political rights to a large number of these brave and loyal patriots. Could there be anything more inhuman than to refuse a share in the affairs of the Government to men who defended the country as they did?"

It is clear that this kind of talk might be a dangerous instrument in the hands of a demagogue, and, indeed, one may ask where would be the glory of the Emperor and the Government if the army had not poured out its blood without stint, if the people, already impoverished, had not contributed its money and submitted to terrible privations? Are the people good only to suffer, to be slaughtered, and financially bled just as a despotic government may choose? However, the purpose of Matsumoto was not to appeal to the people, who for the most part keep away from politics. It would be unsafe even to affirm that it is longing for universal suffrage, or that it feels the need of it, and up to the present there has been no urgent movement in its favor. Hence, Mr. Matsumoto addressed himself to the members of Parliament. In his discourse on the 11th of last March he devoted himself chiefly to refute the objections urged by different classes of opponents. After remarking that the countries of the west possessed universal suffrage for men, and that women were clamoring for the right to vote, he appealed first to those who consider the matter only theoretically. "You think that universal suffrage ought to be rejected because of the difficulties in the way. But there is nothing in this world, no matter how excellent, into which some abuse may not creep."

To the Conservatives he said: "You are unwilling to admit a change of any kind. When, in 1880, a demand was made for a Constitution, you protested that if the Emperor granted it all sorts of misfortunes would follow. Can you point to any in the twenty years since it has been granted?" To the Government officials he protested that their interest consisted in perpetuating feudal despotism, and that no reason would ever convince them of the utility of universal suffrage. To the members of the House he declared that he was astounded that men who represented the nation, and who were supposed to be supremely occupied with the interest of the people, could oppose a measure whose purpose was to increase the power of the people, and by that means to increase the importance of the deputies.

"You seem to forget," he said, "that if ever Constitutional Government is to achieve a complete development here, the members of the Chamber will be the instruments in bringing it about. To accomplish that object the most expeditious means is Universal Suffrage. Do you fear that if it is established your position will become less sure and less solid, or do you imagine that the expense of the electoral campaign will become so great that you will be unable to present yourselves as candidates? On the contrary, those who have any acquaintance with the countries of the west will inform you that the electoral campaign costs less in proportion to the extension of the franchise. I have here in my hand statistics to prove the truth of this assertion." Finally, in order to settle the doubts of those who fear that universal suffrage would be a means of promoting socialism, he maintained that it was an error to believe that such would be the consequence. As a matter of fact it ought to be proclaimed on the housetops that there was no country in the world where socialism, without being called such, had taken such a hold on the people as in Japan. From the fourth century the Government was based on socialistic principles. To fear that Japan would be invaded by socialism is to shut one's eyes to the evidence, and to ignore the essential character of our national organization.

Those who spoke against the Bill were, in the first place, Arakawa, who protested that it was an error to fancy that universal suffrage was a guarantee of good government. It was an error to suppose that in proportion as the people occupied itself with politics, it became better. On the contrary, there are too many people at present who are losing their time discussing political theories, and it would be unwise to increase the number. The prosperity of nations, like Germany and America, is not due to universal suffrage. To demand universal suffrage in Japan because it exists in the west is to forget that our national Constitution and our patriotic system is differentiated essentially from those of other nations. What the lower classes have need of is, not more extended political rights, but an amelioration of the conditions in which they live.

To make the suffrage depend upon the possession of a certain fortune is eminently just. Those who want to obtain the privilege of voting have only to labor to acquire the necessary competence. But to grant it to tramps and idlers before they have done anything to increase the riches of the country would be a fatal error. Nor would the extension of the franchise diminish corruption. The experience of Japan itself proves that since the number of electors has tripled, corruption has increased enormously. The tone of the second orator, Mr. Watanabe, was philosophical and juridical, and he sought to prove that the right to vote is not essential to liberty, and that a law restraining that right is neither unjust nor immoral. "It is impossible to compute with any certainty, from the statistics given by Mr. Matsumoto, as to the decrease of the expenses of the electoral campaign." He then added that the people have no desire for the franchise, and are altogether indifferent to politics; that the actual system of voting is in nowise responsible for the powerlessness of the Deputies in dealing with the beaureaucracy of the Government. The extension of the suffrage will not have the effect of bringing better representatives to the Chamber, and will, therefore, be useless. "We, members of Parliament," he concluded, "are the servants of the State and the Emperor, and not merely of the people. No one will convince us that, were we elected by a greater number, we would fulfill any better the duties imposed upon us. Everyone knows that the evils from which the world is suffering will not be removed by universal suffrage; nor is our country prepared for the adoption of such a measure." It may be worth while to point out here the remarkable distinction which the Conservatives insist on making between the State and the people. In their mind the people are made for the State, and not vice versa.

Real Japan is represented in the House of Lords. On the 13th of March the Bill for universal suffrage was sent up from the Lower House, and was immediately referred to a committee. As a preamble, however, some questions were addressed to the Speaker, and it was declared that the project was based on very dangerous principles, and was incompatible with the very idea of Monarchical Government. It could never be realized, except by violence and by the tyranny of the lower over the upper classes. On that account the Government demanded the rejection of the Bill. These remarks, of course, evoked some bitter words in the House of Deputies, but on the 14th of March the Bill was taken out of the committee by the Lords and unanimously rejected. On the following day it was returned to the Deputies. The chairman of the committee simply said in returning it: "If the Lower House desires to know why we have rejected this Bill, it will be sufficient to say that in our opinion it would be premature to adopt it. I have nothing else to say." As one of the Peers remarked at this moment that the reply was vague and superficial, the chairman was asked to explain the matter more at length, but he refused to do so, and asked Mr. Hozumi, who was one of the members of the committee, to state the views of the Lords.

Mr. Hozumi is the most famous jurist in Japan. He was born in 1860, and studied in Germany from 1884 to 1887. To-day he is Dean of the Law College at the Imperial University at Tokyo. He is also Secretary of the Privy Council, and legal adviser of the Bureau of Legislation. His authority is of the highest, and he is one of the most ardent upholders of conservative ideas and of national jingoism. Moderation is not one of his characteristics. He has shown that on many previous occasions, but the present one gave him a new opportunity, and if his remarks did not create a bitter conflict between the two Chambers, the reason is that Japan does not really possess a Parliament according to European ideals, and that the Chamber of Deputies is held in little esteem by the Government.

Mr. Hozumi began his discourse by declaring he did not speak in the name of the committee, and that he was merely giving vent to his personal opinion. "Although the motive for which the Bill was rejected could not be explained at that moment," said he, "I will rehearse the argument which I presented before the committee. I do not admit that the principle of every constitutional government essentially implies universal suffrage. I deny that universal suffrage ought to have as a result the sending of better or more able men to Parliament than those I now see before me. An election is only a means for an end. The end in this instance is merely to have capable deputies, and universal suffrage will not attain that object any better than the system which is now in force. There has never been any reason presented to me which would incline me to believe that there is any need of changing the law as it exists at the present moment. I regret infinitely that such a Bill ever passed the doors of the Lower Chamber. I think that it is not only our duty to reject it unanimously, but that we ought to affix to the door of this chamber a placard forbidding the introduction of any such bill."

No one said a word, but the insult was not forgotten. The President of the University Keio, at Tokyo, did, indeed, reply to him outside the Chamber, insisting chiefly that the representatives of the Lords forgot that the Lower House represented the people, to which attack Hozumi replied: "I do not say that in fixing the manner of election of the Deputies we should make no account of the need of affording the people means of manifesting its wishes; nor do I maintain that the Deputies should not represent public opinion. But the question before us is, are we to concern ourselves only about the will of the people? If, besides the will of the people, there is nothing else to consider, I might ask why the Chamber of Lords exists, and why its members are chosen in such a variety of fashions? It is nowhere said in the Constitution that the principal object of the creation of a Parliament is to give expression to the will of the people. According to the Constitution the members of the Lower House ought to be thoroughly conversant with political questions and the business of the State, in order to fulfill their rôle as legislators. That is the only way of interpreting the Constitution. I trust that Mr. Kamada will not forget this, and I beg him to no longer urge the matter."

Kamada did return again to the fight, but without any result. He merely reaffirmed his position, and objected to what Hozumi had said, viz., that it was of no importance whatever that the people should be represented, as long as the Deputies were capable and well informed. Such is the general attitude of the upper classes in Japan on the question of universal suffrage.

Frequent Communion Guild

Organization is the lever which can move the world. No great enterprise, temporal or spiritual, can be carried on to the best advantage without at least some organized effort. The application of this principle in promoting the frequentation of the Sacraments is no innovation in the Church. Organization has been found by her the most effective and, in many cases, the only means for securing the regular reception of the Holy Eucharist. Of all her established associations, however, there seems to be none which answers directly and primarily the present need: the promotion of frequent and daily Communion among all the faithful. Monthly Communion is usually the highest requirement for admission into the existing organizations; nor can we hope that there shall here take place any universal change within the near future. Undoubtedly, the frequency with which the Holy Eucharist must be received, as a condition for membership, will be increased in many societies, and we are happy to note that this progress is already taking place; but it is local, more or less dependent upon the vote of enrolled members and cannot correspond to the instant demand of the Church for frequent and daily Communion, especially in educational institutions—a work upon whose success is conditioned the greatest of all enterprises, the conquest of the world for Christ.

It is evident, therefore, that a need exists. It is evident likewise, as we have observed, and as has been pointed out so clearly by the Vicar of Christ, that while our zeal must extend to all in urging upon them frequent, and if possible, daily, reception of the Blessed Sacrament, it must most especially be devoted to the young, the coming generation of the Church. Would it not then seem in accordance with the workings of the Spirit of God, if we may so speak, that from our schools and colleges there should originate and spread an organization whose sole object should be to bring into immediate effect the decree of the Holy Father on frequent and daily Communion—an organization so simple that it could be everywhere introduced with the least delay and circumstance, and which, if so desired, might likewise be taken up by any pre-existing league, sodality or society of whatever kind and made part of its own work, including at first its most zealous members and by them spreading throughout the entire body? Such an organization, although it might well be begun within our schools could not, of its very nature, be limited by them, but would extend beyond their walls and widen ever more and more its blessed influence.

Associations partially answering to the ideal we have here described, and proposing to themselves the decree of the Holy Father as their sole object, have actually been founded in various educational establishments, and have thence extended their sphere of usefulness far and wide. Although the bond of a great unity which should hold them together in one mighty organization has hitherto been wanting, we have reason to hope that even this shall soon be supplied. But in spite of all the shortcomings and defects of newly hazarded attempts the results have in every case been so gratifying, so encouraging, that no one who has had experience in the work is not thrilled with the marvelous response it has everywhere elicited and with the wonderful fruits it has already produced; but above all, with the magnificent possibilities unfolding themselves at the thought of a completed organization, canonically erected and indulged by the Holy Father. This alone can set upon our labors the stamp of authority and give to them the sanction and the method for which we have so ardently longed and so earnestly prayed in the past. Nothing now is more evident than that the hearts of men are being prepared by the Holy Spirit. A word of zeal is like a pebble dropped into still waters, the ripples whereof shall long continue, and a work undertaken in this cause, dearest to the Heart of the Saviour, is like a seed sown in good soil, which shall spring up and reproduce itself a hundred fold. The experience of all who have undertaken this apostolate of organization is everywhere one and the same: it has grown beneath their hands and prospered, they knew not how; their efforts seemed so insignificant compared with the vastness of the results which they obtained.

We are well aware that in not a few institutions, through the untiring labor and ceaseless prayer of zealous priests and religious, not merely frequent, but practically daily Communion on the part of nearly all the inmates has been attained without special organization. But even in these cases the Frequent Communion Guild is not to be deemed superfluous. It will render the work more easy and permanent, less dependent upon the initiative of individuals who can, perhaps, with difficulty be replaced, and will, above all, ensure its continuance beyond the days of school and college life. It will add, moreover, the spiritual blessings that come from association in good works, and, what is even more, it will give to pupils and teachers a most powerful means for extending their apostolate to countless other souls, who can thus be most sweetly compelled to partake at least weekly of the Banquet of the Lord. The ties of the Guild which they have entered will be the surest pledge of their perseverance and will, perhaps, lead them on even to better things.

The existence of various students' associations of frequent and daily Communicants in our colleges was recently brought to the notice of Pope Pius X. The result is reported in these significant words: "When the Supreme Pontiff heard this, not only did he show it was very pleasing to him, but he also imparted a special Pontifical Benediction to all and each of the members of the various associations, and to the directors of the same." Thus, therefore, with the approval of heaven, with the blessing of the Vicar of Christ, the work has made its most auspicious beginning.

It would cover pages to speak in detail of all the good which has already been accomplished by these existing organizations during the past two years. A few practical instances must suffice.

In a day college, where the total number of Communions registered by the Eucharistic Association of 240 members during the first month of its existence was 800, rose during the last month to 2,480, yielding an average of more than ten Communions for each member during the closing month of the school year. The work, of course, is now to continue, as far as possible, throughout the entire vacation. At a boarding school, where greater facilities exist, the monthly average mounted to about twenty Holy Communions for every student in the college. Even in day colleges, however, similar results have been attained by an entire class, while in other instances two-thirds of the boys received the Sacrament at least three times each week, including daily communicants. The total number of Communions at another day college for boys was 2,846 during the month of May; at a High School for girls, likewise a day school, it ascended to 3,800, while in the parochial school during the same month the total registered was 4,500 receptions of the Most Blessed Sacrament—truly a royal gift for any school to offer to its Queen of May.

These are only a few of the many and great results of the first crude attempts at organization. The ardent hope expressed by all who have knowledge of the work is that the completed and approved Frequent Communion Guild may be sent forth as soon as possible upon its divine mission of making popular and effective everywhere the decree of the Holy Father and the desire of the Sacred Heart.

The work, of course, as we have often hinted, is not to be restricted to our schools, but should rather originate with them and thence spread on through parish or through city. University professors and students, working girls and members of sorority clubs, parishioners in churches conducted by priests who welcomed the movement, pupils in convents and in parochial schools, inmates of charitable institutions and neglected children from the streets, are all even now gathered together into these attempted organizations, blessed by the Supreme Pontiff and already existing in various institutions throughout the United States and Canada.

The only condition for admission to the Frequent Communion Guild, as it has practically been in existence hitherto and as by the favor of the Holy Father we hope to see it approved, indulgenced and canonically erected, is, together with registration, a minimum of weekly Communion. This simple condition is intended to make the Guild accessible to all; but it in nowise expresses the perfection aimed at. Weekly Communion is only the first degree of membership, while a second and a third degree are to give opportunity for the zealous director gradually to lead the members, as far as possible, to the complete fulfillment of the desires of the Sacred Heart. The second degree, it is suggested, shall consist of those who communicate at least twice a week. The third degree, however, which is ever to be kept in view and which in many schools can easily become a very common practice, consists of daily Communion. This last is understood in the sense of at least five Communions a week, since this frequency will make possible the gaining of plenary indulgences without weekly, or even monthly confession. (Decree of Feb. 14, 1906.)

Until canonical establishment can be secured it may be well for those interested in the work to act upon the few general suggestions here given, obtaining whatever authorization may be needed. If deemed advisable they may confer special Eucharistic buttons or medals, or keep count of the number of Communions in various classes, etc. Constant activity is the condition for success.

Much, of course, remains to be said in regard to the solution of practical difficulties, some of which we may consider at another time. One thing, however, we would add: that, while carrying out the letter of the decree, we must not overlook its spirit. We must strive by every means in our power to draw all who come beneath our influence ever more closely to the Sacred Heart of the Master, beating with love for them in the Blessed Sacrament; to multiply their visits to the Tabernacle; to increase their attendance at the daily Sacrifice; to promote ever greater reverence for the august Presence in their midst; to spread among them and by their own apostolate the Eucharistic literature which now so fortunately abounds; in one word, to make of the Most Blessed Sacrament the centre of school and college life.

By uniting, therefore, our counsels and endeavors, all can profit by the experience of each, what is good shall be preserved, what is wanting shall not again be tried in vain. Organization, moreover, will give to the individual the conscious assurance of that strength which comes from union with a mighty body devoted to the same cause and fired with the same sublime ambition. Priest, teacher, student, each will profit in his own way by the power, wisdom and experience drawn from organized effort, to spread more effectively or accept more loyally that great decree which is intended for the renewal of all things in Christ. This, therefore, is the more than epic, this is the divine enterprise set for us by our Holy Father, for which we desire to unite the noble and generous souls of the young into a mighty Guild of frequent and daily communicants, able to take Heaven itself by storm.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Catholic Holland and the Holy See

The Italian semi-centenary and what it stands for, perforce call to mind the seemingly futile but brave and heroic stand in the late sixties of the Pope's little army against the overwhelming odds of invaders of the Papal States. A few historical data may be recalled. In 1848 Pope Pius IX quelled the revolution in Rome by granting a number of administrative concessions which, however, did not satisfy the revolutionists. As early as 1852 the archplotters, Cavour and Mazzini, were found working at a realization of their various schemes of political plunder. As a first result of their efforts, Naples and Sicily and the larger portion of the Papal States were annexed to the Piedmontese Kingdom by force of arms in 1860. Thereupon, in 1861, the Parliament at Turin proclaimed Rome the capital of United Italy. A further step was taken in 1864, when the capital was removed from Turin to Florence, hitherto the government seat of the Dukes of Tuscany. In spite of the royal disclaimer that Piedmont would not further interfere with the government of what was left of the Church's territory, the evacuation of the Papal States by the French troops in 1866 aroused Catholic sentiment all over Europe and carried it to fever heat.

France then declared the Italians should never be allowed to take Rome, and dispatched five thousand of her soldiers to protect the city. Nevertheless, in 1867, Garibaldi was permitted to start on his freebooting expedition in what remained of the Papal possessions, in which, however, he was effectively checked at several points, and completely defeated at the battle of Mentana, November 3, 1867. Finally, in 1870, when the opening of the Franco-Prussian war afforded Napoleon III a pretext for withdrawing the French garrison from Rome, a fresh attack was begun, this time by a Piedmontese army of over twenty thousand men which, under General Cadorna, entered the City of the Popes through the breach of the Porta Pia, on September 20 of the same year. In order to avoid the useless shedding of blood Pope Pius IX forbade all active resistance, and, ceding to superior force, he retired within the precincts of the Vatican.

When Garibaldi in 1867 was about to start on his filibustering invasion of Papal territory hundreds of Catholic young men from all parts of Europe began to wend their way via Marseilles to Civita Vecchia and Rome for the purpose of enlisting in the Pope's army and to take up arms in defence of the Holy Father and the Church's territorial rights. This led to the formation of a foreign legion, known as the Papal Zouaves, commanded by the French general, Baron de Charette. This corps young Hollanders joined in large numbers; indeed, to little Holland, two-thirds of whose population is outside the true fold, belongs the enviable distinction of having furnished the greatest number of the men that made up this historic body of troops. During the years '67-'70 nearly four thousand of them joined the ranks.

They came mostly from the humbler walks in life, but proved they had in them those characteristics which, irrespective of geographical lines and national divisions, are among the noblest traits of our race. They were noted among their comrades for undaunted courage, and for such piety and singleness of purpose as to excite the admiration of their fellows. When in action their companies and battalions were ever well to the fore, as may be gathered from the lists of casualties in the various battles and skirmishes in which they took part, and which show in every instance, both among the killed and wounded, a preponderating percentage of Dutch patronymics. Castelfidardo, Bagnorea, Monte Rotondo, Monte Libretti and Mentana in turn witnessed their feats of valor.

The assault of Monte Libretti, October 13, 1867, has been for ever made memorable by the heroic death of a young Hollander, Peter de Jong, a man of gigantic stature and herculean strength. The town had been occupied by twelve hundred of the enemy, who were safely intrenched behind its walls. A detachment of eighty-four Zouaves was sent up against them, and in the fierce fight that followed de Jong became separated from his comrades. He found himself surrounded by a swarm of the enemy; his ammunition had given out, and, using the butt of his rifle as a club he handled it with such telling effect that fourteen of his assailants were laid low before he finally fell, mortally wounded. When his old mother in Holland was told of the noble death of this, her only son, the sole regret she uttered was that she had not a dozen other sons to take his place in the ranks.

At the battle of Mentana the Pontifical army fought in front of the French troops, and the Zouaves covered themselves with glory in the crushing defeat suffered by the enemy. A French general, who was present, gives this as his impression of Dutch bravery and fighting qualities: "Under fire the Hollanders are genuine lions. Their cold natures do not flash out suddenly, but once started nothing equals their irresistible courage and their tireless persistency. I know no better soldiers."

Not only on the field of battle, but likewise in tending the sick did the Holland Zouaves make a record that for Christian heroism challenges both past and present.

The cholera, in addition to the horrors of war, was raging at the time in the country districts around Rome. At Albano especially the scourge carried off its victims in appalling numbers. A detachment of Zouaves was called upon to nurse the stricken and to bury the dead. Among those who volunteered three young Hollanders succumbed to their devotion to duty and Christian charity. Their names have been engraven on tablets of marble: they are undoubtedly also engraven ære perennius in the Book of Life.

That the spirit of the Papal Zouaves, now that some forty years have gone by, is still alive in Holland to-day, may be seen from the the annual September reunion of the veterans of the regiment, who, ever since 1871, have banded themselves together in a society. They and their children seem to be as willing and ready as of old, if needs be, to take up arms and die in defence of the Holy See. Their sentiments, in fact, remain such as to render the motto on their official insignia, received from Pio Nono, no idle boast, but a true reflection of their faith and courage: "Fidei et Virtuti."

An imposing monument to the memory of the Holland Zouaves fallen in battle during 1867-'70 is to be unveiled with appropriate exercises this coming September in S. Hertogen Bosch, the provincial capital of North Brabant.

V. S.

[The example of Holland in this direction should not be lost on the present admirers of the comrades in the ranks of the Papal Zouaves who went to Rome from Ireland and from Canada, and whose bravery also contributed to the glory that "guards with solemn round the bivouac of the dead" of de Charette's Foreign Legion. The Way to Do It

A letter from an indignant reader, printed in AMERICA (July 8), called attention to an advertisement that has been displayed for some time on the billboards of the stations of the elevated railroads of this city, and which is an outrageous public insult to Catholic ideals and feelings. Notwithstanding the fact that this offensive placard is viewed daily by thousands of Catholics, nothing seems to have been done to banish it. Another reader of AMERICA, a zealous Passionist priest, the Rev. Wilfrid Avery, of Louisville, Kentucky, jealous of the dignity and fair fame of his calling, saw the same advertisement printed in the leading daily paper of Louisville, the Courier-Journal, and he at once took the practical step to have it removed. He wrote to the business manager of the paper, calling attention to this insult to its Catholic patrons and received the following reply:

"DEAR SIR:

"Your very kind and friendly letter of the 12th is received. We certainly appreciate your interest in us and the suggestions made that would be of benefit to us.

We feel, as you state, that it is not our desire or wish to offend in any way, or to publish either news or advertisement that is in the least offensive.

"We would have answered your letter sooner, but as we are under contract with the Coates Co. to publish their advertisement, it was necessary for us first to communicate with them before we could agree positively to do anything. We have now heard from these people, and they say that if the advertisement or cut is at all objectionable, to discontinue the same. That cut will not appear again.

"We hope that you will always feel at liberty to criticize, or to offer any suggestions as far as our business is concerned, as we wish to please the greatest number of our readers.

"Very truly,
"Louisville Courier-Journal Co."

Now, the advertising privileges of the New York elevated railroad stations are controlled by the well-known firm of Ward & Gow, No. 1 Union Square, and they can be reached easily. The Catholic Club has an imposing "Committee on Catholic Interests"; the Federated Catholic Societies has the incentive of its recent victory in the somewhat similar case of Watson's Magazine as a guide; the Knights of Columbus, in both district organization and individual councils, are potent and resourceful—there is no lack of effective machinery, if once set in practical motion, to have this vile caricature of the religious orders removed from the highways, where it has too long been an offence to the public eye.

Individual effort counts also, as can be seen from Father Avery's success, and as indications point is resulting in the direction of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." A well-known lawyer of Fernie, British Columbia, recently sent the following communication to the publishers of that enterprise:

"Cambridge University Press,

"10-12 E. King St., Toronto.

"DEAR SIR:

"I have received your circular of notification re despatch to me of Volumes I to XXVIII, inclusive, of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica.'

"I regret to notice by an article in AMERICA that the publishers evidently have been most careless in the handling of facts when they came to deal with subjects pertaining to the Church of which I am a member. Had I understood that this was a feature of the Encyclopædia, I assure you that I never would have thought of purchasing the work. As it is, I feel quite certain that persons of the faith I profess, will, many of them, hesitate to place in their libraries a work which is not authentic, although the want of authenticity may be confined to one subject and its ramifications.

"Yours faithfully,

"_____."

Another letter from a Sister in a Chicago convent reads:

"TO THE EDITOR OF AMERICA:

"Allow me to express my grateful appreciation of your article on the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' in AMERICA of the 8th inst. Such warnings cannot be given too frequently, nor too early, as past experience teaches. The simple and unwary are often entrapped before they are aware of the situation. In this case, fortunately, we have not yielded to the repeated invitations and importunities of 'Britannica's' publishers, and we are thankful, indeed.

This, as we have it continually dinned into our ears, is the age of “interests,” and the “interests,” big and little, have their eyes on the main chance. Insults to Catholics from seekers for public patronage can be made very unprofitable. No “interest” willingly endangers its profits.

CORRESPONDENCE

Holy-days of Obligation

ROME, July 16, 1911.

The Holy Father has issued under date of July 2d, a Motu Proprio, concerning the holy-days of obligation. In view of the difficulty coming to the faithful from the interruption of their daily work by frequent holy-days and holidays, at a time when the high cost of living, the necessities of rapid transit and the demands for time in which to handle the business of rapidly increasing commerce make too frequent obligatory abstention from labor or business a hardship, the Holy Father has reduced the general holy-days of obligation to eight, namely, the feast days of Christmas, the Circumcision, the Epiphany, the Ascension of Our Lord, the Immaculate Conception, the Assumption of the Blessed Mother of God, Sts. Peter and Paul, and All Saints. He has also removed these days from the law of fast and abstinence, in case by coincidence in the “Ordo,” they should fall under the same. This does not add two days for the United States, as the ordination provides that where any of the above days have already been legitimately suppressed as days of precept they are to remain so. For Rome, however, and the greater part of the world it removes the obligation from the feasts of the Annunciation, Corpus Christi, St. John the Baptist and the respective patrons of different countries, dioceses and parishes, where such patronal feasts have been holy-days of obligation. The celebration of the feast of St. Joseph is set for the Sunday after the 19th of March, that of St. John the Baptist for the Sunday before the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, and Corpus Christi for the Sunday after Trinity Sunday, the feast of the Sacred Heart, however, remaining in the same place, to-wit, on the Friday within the octave of Corpus Christi.

Monsignore Cottafavi and Count Zileri Del Verme, commissioners appointed by the Holy Father to superintend the expenditure of the money contributed from and through the Holy See for the sufferers from the earthquake in Sicily and Calabria, have just rendered their final report. More than a year ago a report was published of the first expenditures to meet the immediate needs of the sick, starving, orphaned and homeless, which amounted to about 4,000,000 lire. The present accounting adds to the amount nearly another 4,000,000; to be exact, 3,796,651 lire and 62 centesimi. With the latter amount were put up new buildings for 218 churches, 156 dwelling houses, 26 schools, 21 orphan asylums and colleges; while there were rebuilt or repaired 187 churches, 19 schools and 6 convents.

The salaries and expenses of the thirty-eight persons employed in the administration of the funds during eighteen months over the wide area of the ruin totaled 84,666 lire and 8 centesimi, about two and a quarter per cent. of the amount expended. Moreover, a part of the funds was given to many schools, asylums, convents, local charitable institutions, workmen's and students' cooperative associations for initial maintenance. The vast amount of ground covered and the immense good accomplished is almost inconceivably out of proportion to the sum expended. It is pleasant to be able to add that the report notes with acknowledgment the co-operation of the general government and the local civil authorities in facilitating the work done by the administrators. Throughout Calabria and eastern Sicily the name of the Holy Father is held in benediction as the source of their rising anew from the ruins of the memorable disaster.

Invitations have been issued for the anniversary memorial service for Leo XIII, in the Sistine Chapel, on Thursday, July 20th, in the presence of the entire Papal Court. Cardinal Vincenzo Vanutelli will sing the Mass, and the Holy Father himself will read the absolution.

Canon Augusto Taggiasco, parish priest of Santa Maria in Trastevere, the titular church of Cardinal Gibbons, has resigned and Canon Enrico Pucci has been appointed in his stead.

On the eve of the departure of Colonel Hamilton Lewis' party from Naples to come to Rome, Mrs. Rose Douglas, of Atlanta, Ga., the mother of Mrs. Lewis, was received into the Catholic Church by Father Talbot McEwan, chaplain of the English-speaking residents at Naples.

The fine old Cathedral of Conversano in Apulia, on the shore of the Adriatic, was completely destroyed by fire during the week. The venerable and artistic structure, much admired by visitors of taste, dated from the thirteenth century and adjoined the ancient monastery founded in the eleventh century by the Norman count, Godfrey of Hauteville.

On Monday Parliament adjourned till November, after giving the Ministry a vote of confidence by passing through its first stage the bill for a monopoly of life insurance by a majority of 171, the vote standing 289 yeas, 118 nays, not voting 19. This does not argue the complete security of the bill or of the Ministry. The end of the session was riotously stormy; party lines were broken here and there, and many of those who voted in the affirmative explained in the Chamber that their vote meant merely confidence in the Ministry (Giolitti having expressly made the vote a question of confidence), and that they condemned and would work against the bill. The Socialists on the one hand fear that Giolitti may drop the question of universal suffrage, and they proclaim that the panem et Circenses of the workingman's pension connected with the bill is not sufficient bait to draw them away from the vital question of suffrage. A group of insurgent liberals, familiarly dubbed “Young Turks,” anticipating a Socialist victory at the next elections and unwilling to put the power of the Monopoly Bill in their hands, are planning a vigorous campaign in opposition to the bill. Meanwhile, to conciliate the clerical element, Giolitti speaks no more of the divorce measure which he had originally included in his program, and in fact it is said that the old fox of an opportunist will at the last moment drop the Monopoly Bill if he comes to fear the disintegration of his following and his consequent loss of power. Meantime, we have a four months' rest from debate and can forget all about the matter.

Some $35,000 worth of bogus shares in the De Ferrari-Galleria Aqueduct, were, the other day, successfully negotiated on the Roman Bourse, but fortunately were detected before their price reached the creators. The middleman is under arrest. The entire staff of the registry division of the Post Office was searched one day this week for a registered letter containing three hundred lire, abstracted in transit through the office. "Ast frustra!"—which is Persian Latin for "Nothing doing." Down at Itri, a village not far south of Rome, the Sardinian laborers on the direct railroad line between Rome and Naples have had a bloody battle of knives and revolvers with the natives. The returns after the carabinieri had put the combatants to flight report numerous fatalities on both sides, with an odd one or two for the carabinieri. This might, perhaps, happen anywhere, but does not indicate the adaptability of the natives of different parts of the country for amalgamation into one citizenship of United Italy.

Protestant Notice of Catholicity

STOCKHOLM, June 20, 1911.

To hear, in Sweden, any approbation by Protestants of the activity of the Catholic Church, is very rare, and more so when there is question of the religious Orders; but to speak favorably of the Jesuits is altogether astounding in the country of Gustavus Adolphus, where so little is known about the Church. A recent instance of it, however, occurred in a very interesting article written for the Protestant Review, "Christianity and Our Own Times"; in which the Protestant pastor, Harald Falk, who is a Licentiate in Theology, launched forth in a eulogy of the Church for its activity in social matters. The attitude of Leo XIII, and the principles set forth in his famous encyclical, "Rerum Novarum," made a deep impression on the pastor, and especially when he saw those principles put into practice. "Most of us who are far removed from the activity of the Catholic Church are quite unaware of the manner in which she addresses herself to her task, in the modern industrial world", he said. In order to give his compatriots an idea of this social activity he chose the principal industrial center of Europe, Belgium, and set about describing the Retreats for workingmen which are organized there, which, though very modest in the beginning have now taken on a most remarkable development.

In 1890, forty-two workingmen were invited to pass some hours a day in the seminary of Charleroi, in order to make the spiritual exercises. In 1891 they had, at Tayt Les Ménages, a building devoted exclusively to the work. By 1908, five more establishments were inaugurated. Up to the present time, 22,000 men have been received in these establishments, spending some days in spiritual exercises, which, as everyone knows, had their origin in the celebrated Manresa of Saint Ignatius. These exercises the Jesuit Fathers have been developing and adapting to the needs of laymen. For this retreat of three days the time is arranged as follows: They rise at six in the morning, then after prayer made in common, the retreatants hear Mass in the Chapel, and after breakfast read a pious book for a short time, and then take recreation, during which they walk in the garden, play billiards, or bowl. At a quarter after eight they go back to the Chapel and for half an hour listen to an explanation of some elementary points of the Faith, afterwards returning to their rooms to meditate on what they have heard, and to read a pious book, the "Imitation of Christ," or the life of some saint. At half past ten there is another instruction, following upon which they are free to pass the time as they wish. In the afternoon a similar order of exercises is followed, and at half past nine, the bell rings for bed. They pass three days in exercises of this kind.

As the Minister remarked, the results are quite remarkable. When the men return to their ordinary occupations, they address themselves to their task in quite another spirit and exercise a most salutary influence upon their comrades. The formation of an organization by the men who have made these Retreats is one of the most important results that follow. The members set aside one day of recollection every month, when they renew the good resolutions of the Retreat. "From a religious point of view," writes the Protestant author, "the results are most striking. Some churches which, a short time before, were almost abandoned, are now crowded, and religion has become the mainspring of the workingmen's lives. Going to Mass and Communion, organizing processions which number hundreds of participants, with banners and music, in localities in which, a short time before, Materialism was making great headway, are very common occurrences."

But it is not only the masculine part of the working population which is the object of the maternal solicitude of the Church. Similar Retreats are organized for the women. The article of the Protestant pastor describes a Retreat organized in Liège for working girls. They arrived in divisions, each one under the direction of a lady, who was appointed for that purpose. In fact, in each parish, one or two ladies take upon themselves the duty of getting into relations with the priests and employers in order to induce the young girls to make these Retreats, and to accompany them to the place designated for that purpose. Of course only young girls of irreproachable character are invited. At this particular Retreat in Liège two Protestant ladies of Stockholm were permitted to assist. Describing the gathering they said: "One of the principal causes of the satisfactory results obtained by this Retreat was the remarkable ability of the Jesuit Father Wierdt who directed it. He was just the man for the occasion. Although he gave four instructions a day, the interest in his discourses was so great that everyone was eager to hear him, because his practical counsels for the formation of character were given in such a manner that every one immediately set about following his advice. What he attempted chiefly was to make religion the motive force in their everyday life. It was impossible not to see the beneficent influence which these few days, taken out of the habitual surroundings of the retreatants, exercised on these young working girls. When we hear with what conscientiousness and courage they overcame the difficulties which met them in their factories and elsewhere, we were convinced more than ever of the immense utility of works of this kind."

BARON G. ARMFELT.

Socialism in Holland

MARIENDAAL, July 15, 1911.

As in many other countries, our Socialists held their annual congress this year. The speeches made were of no consequence, but some declarations made by the orators on that occasion afford an opportunity to give some information about the condition of socialism in this country. At the first congress in 1896 the Socialists numbered about 1,000 members, and were classified in 30 divisions. Now they have 230 divisions and over 10,000 members. Thus in fifteen years they have had an average annual increase of 600. The principal growth, however, of the party occurred in the first years of the organization. Latterly the accessions have not been considerable. They publish a daily and a weekly, and in certain industrial centres they have other publications which, however, are somewhat local in their character.

The president of the congress said that he was not satisfied with the progress the party was making, when he compared it with what was going on in other countries, as for example in Belgium, which is but a small country like our own, but in which, nevertheless, socialism is advancing rapidly. There are 11,000 divisions and some 200,000 members there. They publish eight papers, and have about sixty weekly, monthly and bi-monthly publications.

The reasons why socialism does not prosper to the same extent in Holland are various. The fundamental cause is doubtless the calm and moderate character of the Dutch. Foreigners, especially those of the south, misunderstand them. They are regarded as indifferent, inert and apathetic. But such a view is absolutely false. We interest ourselves in everything that is correct and good, but before acting we reflect seriously, and if the proposal is impracticable or doubtful we do not consider it, or put it off for future consideration. If, on the contrary, it appeals to us, we act with energy and tenacity, but always calmly. We are not subject to sudden explosions, and are not prone to embrace chimerical enterprises. Consequently, we are not enthusiasts or idealists, or revolutionists, and that is the class of men needed for the rapid success of socialism. Before taking his stand under the red flag the Dutch workingman considers attentively the pro and con of the means at hand and the success that is to be expected, and he is not easily led away by the appeals of socialist oratory, understanding perfectly well as he does that a single bird in the hand is worth many more in the bush.

Of course, this way of looking at things may have its disadvantages, and I have no intention of troubling you with a dissertation on that subject. My purpose is only to broach the question in order to explain why socialism is not as progressive in Holland as elsewhere. There are, however, other reasons more efficacious than those I have stated, and the first is the fight against socialism which is made by Catholics in certain parts of the country. To understand this we must grasp the fact that the growth of socialism is not the same in all the provinces. In those that are Protestant it makes progress, especially in north Holland and Friesland, and in some cities, notably in Amsterdam, Rotterdam and Gravenhage, as well as in Zaandam. In the south it meets with slight opposition. In the two Catholic provinces, namely, North Brabant and Limburg, the Socialists are chiefly to be found among the non-Catholics, who come from outside provinces to get work in these great industrial centres. They, of course, are a great danger for lukewarm Catholics, some of whom are already to be found under the red flag.

This danger is especially great in the southern part of Limburg, where the City of Maastricht has its great glass and pottery industry, which gives work to thousands of men. There also is the village of Heerlen, where the coal mines are every day growing in importance. In that part of Limburg there are many non-Catholic Socialists, and the danger of infection is greater there than elsewhere, because the character of the Limburgers is quite different from those of the other Netherlands, resembling somewhat the passionate and restless temper of the Belgians. But happily the Socialist propaganda is energetically combated in both these Catholic provinces by the clergy and the workingmen's associations which they have founded. Without this bulwark of defence many a Catholic would have fallen victim to the seductions of the movement.

At Maastricht and Heerlen the struggle is often very fierce. In the first named city a short time ago an unfortunate priest, who had apostasized, became the apostle of socialism, but he met with such energetic opposition on the part of the Catholic workingmen that he had to decamp, and after his departure the Socialist propaganda lost its most important factor of strength. At Heerlen, Doctor Poels, the former Professor of Exegesis at the Catholic University of Washington, threw himself into the fray. He was made ecclesiastical advisor to the miners of that district, and by his personal influence and oratorical powers achieved splendid results. A few weeks ago he held a public controversy with a Socialist lawyer of Maastricht, and was wildly applauded by hundreds of workmen.

A third reason for the small success of socialism in Holland is to be found in the constitution of the Socialist party itself. In every association where the devil presides there is sure to be trouble. Our Socialist party in Holland is no exception to the rule. Indeed, disagreement seems to be greater there than elsewhere. The party is broken up into several factions, and last year the fight between the Marxists and the Revisionists was so bitter that the party was threatened with disintegration. At present these party troubles seem to have abated to some extent. But, nevertheless, there is still a goodly amount of strife between them. Its leaders are not men of great authority or talent, and exercise no influence in the cause of peace. The best known among them are the seven members of the Socialist factions, who are in the Dutch Parliament. Of these men the leader is Mr. Joëlstra, who enjoys some distinction, having made regular university studies and being the possessor of a certain vigorous eloquence. But the others are of no account. In the House of Deputies they are guilty of all sorts of absurd utterances and stupid acts, and keep up a most extravagant opposition against the other side. Such is my resumé of socialism in Holland.

What they are aiming at chiefly is universal suffrage, and they are endeavoring to start a regular movement for a general petition from the people to effect that change in our electoral system. At the recent congress they maintained that they were satisfied with the results already achieved, although it is commonly stated that a good many people were forced to put their signatures to the petition. This petition will be presented to the Government with all sorts of demonstrations in the month of September, when her Majesty the Queen solemnly opens the session of Parliament. But it does not seem probable that the Government will grant permission on that occasion to organize the great procession which they are talking of as being one of the factors of the demonstration, in order to impress the people with the importance of socialism.

The Nation's Shame

With considerable reluctance, on account of the delicate character of the subject, we call attention to the official Reports just issued by the Surgeons-General of the United States Army and Navy. They reveal a condition of things which is not only a national shame but a national infamy. The number of men in the service suffering from the consequences of vicious lives surpasses that of any of the armies and navies of the civilized world. The peril, says the Surgeon-General of the Army, "has come to outweigh in importance any other sanitary question which now confronts the army, and neither our national optimism nor the Anglo-Saxon disposition to ignore a subject which is offensive to public prudery can longer excuse a frank and honest confrontation of the problem."

We may well hang our heads when we glance at the charts accompanying the statement, for whereas there are almost 200 such cases for every 1,000 men in our army, there are only 75 in the British—though that is reproach enough; 37 in the Japanese; 18 in the Prussian, and 15 in the Bavarian army. Americans are thus confronted with the fact that the Government is obliged to devote a large part of the army and navy budget to support and care for men who disgrace the uniform, who would be worse than useless in war, and who in time of peace encumber the hospitals in numbers that almost suggest a disastrous battle. The blacks, we are told, are one-third worse than the whites, while the brown men in the Philippines are more than four times superior to their white conquerors.

"It is now believed by most sociologists and sanitarians," continues the Report, "that the evil, being primarily a social one, can only be reached by a propaganda of public discussion and education."

No! not public discussion! at least not so public as to be indiscriminate, which would rather attract the prurient and evil-minded than save the innocent and pure. Education! yes, but not an education that reveals to mere children the mysteries of life by school manuals of physiology, which perhaps have had their share in this national disaster. There should be instruction of course, but instruction by prudent, pure-minded and competent men and women, the parents and teachers who are responsible to God for the care of youth; devoted guardians who will be ever watchful over their charges, who will wisely chose their time and shape their language so that in the effort to preserve they may not poison.

For Catholics, there must be added the sanction and the sacraments of their religion to sustain the instruction; and they must be impressed profoundly with the obligation of heeding God's mandate to be pure both in body and soul. For them fear of God and the use of the sacraments are the only prophylactics.

The dreadful condition of things which is thus officially declared is not, as the Report says, "primarily social." That is avoiding the issue. Its source is the absence of religion in the education of the rising generation. We are bringing up a race worse than pagans. For let it be noted that the Japanese are higher in the scale than American youth. A pagan has some natural restraint left; but those who have thrown aside supernatural helps throw aside also all natural decency, and the ravages are greater than in those who knew no better. How long are we going to wait before we open our eyes to the necessity of religious education in schools? Only that can check this dreadful torrent of youthful depravity.

Peace Among Nations

AMERICA has been criticized by some too impulsive spirits for the stand it takes in reference to the universal peace movement among the nations. These claim that "our half-hearted words of appreciation of the zeal of Mr. Carnegie and others for peace argue an inimical disposition towards a movement which should enlist the hearty cooperation of every Christian." The impulse ruling our critics, we answer, may have blinded them. No one to-day is so rash as to accept a brief for the waging of war. Yet, while we admire the zeal of those behind the world's peace movement, we must recognize that universal peace is not among the feasible things the world's condition to-day allows us to hope for. We have not reached that stage of national development where, much as the thought may appeal to one, war is impossible or out of the question. Perhaps men may come so to love justice that the dream of a permanent court for the settlement of international disputes will be effectively realized—but it requires no deep study of the selfishness of nations to satisfy one's self that the happy day has not yet dawned. But a few days ago an illuminating evidence in point has been vouchsafed us.

England just now is eagerly intent upon an arbitration treaty with the United States, and those engaged in formulating its provisions assure us that its enactment will at once and forever eliminate the danger of an appeal to arms between these two peoples. England just now, too, is passing through a period of worryment because of her fears that Germany's move in Morocco means serious invasion of Britain's influence in the far East. The apprehension aroused by the German occupation of Agadir occasioned some plain speaking on the part of Lloyd George in a recent address delivered at the Mansion House in London. And we would recommend his utterances on that occasion to the attention of the enthusiasts who profess to see in the proposed arbitration treaty-making the end of war's barbarism and savagery. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said:

"I believe it essential in the highest interests, not merely of this country, but of the world, that Great Britain should at all hazards maintain her place and prestige among the great Powers. Her potent influence has been many times in the past, and may yet be in the future, invaluable for the cause of human liberty. It has more than once in the past redeemed Continental nations, who are sometimes too apt to forget that service, from overwhelming disaster and even from national extinction.

"I would make great sacrifices to preserve peace. I conceive nothing that would justify the disturbance of international good-will except questions of the gravest national moment; but if a situation were to be enforced upon us, in which peace could only be preserved by the surrender of the great and beneficent position that Great Britain has won by centuries of heroism and achievement—by allowing Great Britain to be treated, where her interests were vitally affected, as if she were of no account in the cabinet of nations—then I say, emphatically, that peace at that price would be a humiliation intolerable for a great country like ours to endure."

It was a brave message sent out to his countryman by the man who is commonly reputed to be the real leader of the English Liberals to-day, but it is not a message that will give much cheer to the enthusiast who looks for the speedy realization of universal peace in the world.

Federation's Opportunity

A stirring appeal to the nations of the world is made by the New York American, not only begging, but insisting on the Great Powers putting an immediate end to the atrocities that are being committed by the Turks against their Albanian subjects. An editorial in our last issue, under the heading "Assassination of a Nation", had already called the attention of our readers to the conditions that prevail in that unhappy country, and as far back as April of this year our correspondent in Turkey had given a graphic description of those frightful barbarities whose purpose is apparently to exterminate from the face of the earth the last remnants of those faithful and heroic Christian tribes. Shall we hear from the American Federation of Catholic Societies, which meets in Columbus this month?

The Pope and the Aviators

A few weeks ago the papers were weeping with delight over the romantic scene of the sad Pope in the gardens of the Vatican gazing in rapt attention at the bird-men flying in the far away ethereal blue above him. Beaumont was the first to appear, and the hand of the Pontiff was raised to bless the daring conqueror of the clouds as he winged his way to the Eternal City.

It is all very lovely, but the Paris Temps says it is all "a fake", a genuine simon-pure make-up by the press. The Pope didn't bless Beaumont, the excited Cardinals weren't pointing field glasses towards the chug-chug of the motor, and the only flurry in the entourage of the Vatican occurred next day, when the paper's in double headers recorded the fact which never occurred.

Why, then, was it not denied? The Pope and the Cardinals are too busy at other things, and fabrications of a worse kind have to be let go unchallenged. Besides, if the story had been denied, if the Pope had not blessed Beaumont, perhaps he would have been held up as condemning aviation, or opposing material progress, or perhaps even refusing to bless rebellious France, which Beaumont represented. Some kind of a cock-and-bull story would have been invented.

It only goes to show how "the boys" on the press can pass in a good story, which has not the slightest foundation except in their own fertile imaginations. If it is catchy, it will attract notice, make the paper sell, and help their importance on the staff. In this case the yarn was innocent; it pleased everybody, and set a good many pious people into raptures. On other occasions, however, very serious lies may be sent soaring aloft, to go unlicensed and unchecked around the world, appearing in a dozen shapes, gaining strength as they speed along, filling men's minds with wrong impressions, or false views, and often inspiring feelings of hatred and distrust that may remain for years or perhaps never be removed. The famous scene of the Pope blessing the aviators turns out to be fiction, and the same is true of many another story which the press has made the world believe. It is a part of wisdom not to conclude immediately that a thing is true because you see it in print. Skepticism is often a virtue. Perhaps even the Temps is getting up another sensation, and the Pope may have, after all, blessed the aviator.

Training the Harvesters

"At no time in the history of the American railroad has foreign labor entered as largely into nearly every branch of construction and maintenance as at the present time." This statement, opening a thoughtful article on "Our Foreign Laborers," by A. M. Clough, in the July Railroad

Men, might be extended to mining and many other branches of unskilled labor. Seventy per cent. of these laborers, we are told, speak no English, and for that reason they are often misunderstood and ill-treated, but "they are very susceptible to good treatment if we could only take the time and trouble not only to instruct them at work, but give them some attention in their camps, boarding houses and homes."

This treatment they do not get, if Mr. Clough's experience is typical, not only from their overseers, but from those who should be specially concerned in their spiritual interests. "It is a fact, though almost incredible in this day and age, when the Church and its societies are sending missionaries to all parts of the world, that I have had many times a camp of from 50 to 150 men in one place for over a year, and not one single priest, padre or layman, ever went near them to inquire of their civil and religious welfare. The wonder is that they are as good as they are."

As no mention is made of place, time or circumstance, we have no means of verifying the statement, but undoubtedly there are too many instances in which men of this class, many of them Catholics, are neglected, with the result that they or their children are lost to the Church. This neglect is often unavoidable, especially in the case of movable camps. Half a dozen languages and as many patois are often spoken in one mine or camp; the priest in such districts is usually hard pressed to attend to his permanent parishioners, and even if he has some leisure, not every priest is a Mezzofanti. There is scarcely a diocese where priests have not been secured to meet the linguistic needs of the foreign population, and where this has been found impossible we have known the local clergy to equip themselves for the task. We could mention many hard-working priests in Texas, Arkansas, South Carolina and elsewhere, who, after their ordination, acquired several languages in order to be able to address their polyglot congregations in German, Bohemian, Polish, Lithuanian, Hungarian, etc.

These conditions, which have long prevailed in the North, where foreign immigrants chiefly settled, have of late been extending Southward. There are numerous colonies of Germans, Poles, Bohemians and Italians in Texas, and nearly every country in Europe is represented in the mining districts of Alabama. Catholic colonists are in great demand with the land companies, who, with the aid of the American Catholic Colonization Society, are establishing agricultural colonies of Catholics in many parts of the South. To meet the needs of the new immigrants, the Benedictine Fathers, who have charge of St. Joseph's Seminary, La., are making special preparations. In cooperation with Archbishop Blenk and other Southern bishops, they have arranged to secure and train students with a view to the growing demands of immigration. They have among them or have secured English speaking professors who teach Polish and the other Slavic languages, German, French, Spanish, Italian, etc., according as capacity and utility suggest. Vocations among the immigrants are encouraged and fostered, so that in a brief period, it is hoped, these people will have their own children to provide for their spiritual needs.

Similar plans have been put into execution elsewhere. Their extension and development will help to solve the difficult problems which the inpouring of immigrants of many tongues and races has presented to the American Church. There will be priests sufficient in number to seek out and care for such foreign laborers as Mr. Clough describes, and sufficiently equipped for so arduous an apostolate. Meanwhile there is much that priest and layman and Catholic societies of men and women can do for the instruction, and the religious and civil welfare of our immigrants. Charity, inspired by faith and impelled by zeal, will always find a way of making itself intelligible.

Railroad Massacres

In the accident bulletin just issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission it is shown that on interstate railways, during the quarter ended March 31 last, there were 2,124 persons killed and 16,430 injured, including 706 employees killed and 10,974 injured. Comparing these figures with those of the Federal loss at the battle of Antietam, it will be seen that the record for the three months is more appalling than that for one of the bloodiest battles of the Civil War, more men being killed on September 17, at Antietam, than on any other day between 1861 and 1865. General McClellan's loss on that day was 2,010 killed, 9,416 wounded and 1,043 missing. Yet a certain sort of satisfaction is expressed because the total number of casualties for the quarter ended March 31 shows a decrease of 229 in the number killed and of 2,908 in the injured as compared with the corresponding quarter last year. The death of a solitary aviator sends a thrill of horror through the civilized world, while the death and maiming of thousands is accepted stoically as a necessary tribute to the juggernaut of modern progress.

A Marriage Lottery

Some months ago we called attention to the shocking exhibition of levity by a number of Presbyterians who auctioned off to the highest bidder a free marriage license from the civil authorities, a free marriage by the minister, and a promise of a free divorce by a condescending lawyer. It was scandalous, but after all somewhat comprehensible for those people who regard marriage merely as a civil contract.

We thought that Catholics could never descend to performances like that. But the daily papers inform us that something of the kind, with the exception of a free divorce, recently occurred at a Catholic church fair. If it be true, and we hope it is not, it cannot be too emphatically denounced by all right-minded men. For Catholics, marriage is a sacrament, a channel of sanctifying grace, the most solemn engagement in life, to be entered into only after the most serious reflection and prayer. To make it a matter of a lottery for the sake of increasing the exchequer of the church is a scandal. It is idle to say that it was only a joke. There are certain things that cannot be treated even with familiarity, much less be used as material for a joke. Just now with a great many people marriage is regarded as little else than a joke. It is dissolved for the most ridiculous reasons, or for no reason at all, and our ever multiplying divorces make us the reproach of the civilized world. Catholics are supposed to be the only safeguard of the nation in that respect, but if such performances are permitted at church fairs or elsewhere, we shall very soon lose the regard in which we are held, and perhaps we too will be invading the divorce courts.

LITERATURE

FOGAZZARO AND HIS NOVELS

The perturbed spirit of Fogazzaro still walks the earth. More holy water should have been sprinkled on his grave. In the beginning of the year the Civiltà Cattolica had an article chiefly on the religious intent of "Leila"; in July the Catholic World gave a rapid review of all his works, and the Etudes of the same month discussed both his literary and religious divagations and achievements.

The Civiltà's contribution is already too old to listen to now in these rapid times. We get nearer to the actual by putting together the two latter discussions, even if some cacophony ensues.

The writer in the Catholic World is a lady, and informs us that "Antonio Fogazzaro—let us at once clearly state—died as he had lived, an ardent Catholic, devout in the ordinary sense of devotion, regular in the practice and profession of his religion. . . . All Catholics are familiar with the history of his novel 'The Saint,' and are aware that, though no one at the Vatican ever doubted the excellency of the author's intentions, this work was finally placed on the Index Expurgatorius, owing to the Modernist trend of some of Benedetto's opinions. He accepted the decision of the Church with the simplicity, courage, and dignity that all who knew him expected. He promulgated erroneous doctrines, but he never wavered in his belief that 'the Church is the inexhaustible treasure-house of Divine Truth.'"

After this preamble there follows a review of Fogazzaro's contributions to literature, beginning with the last, the much-talked-of "Leila," which is merely an epilogue to "The Saint." It also was condemned. Had Fogazzaro lived, the writer assures us, he would again have bowed to the decision of the Church.

As a student in Turin he had studied Darwinism and evolution, and all his life he continued to occupy himself with the problems presented by the apparent conflict between reason and faith. In "Malombra," as in all his subsequent works, he depicted the conflict between carnal and ideal love. Another work, "Daniele Cortis," at once secured him European fame. It represents the hero in love with his cousin, Helena di Santa Giulia, the childless wife of a profligate, and though Helena, we are told, might have sought consolation for her wretched life outside the marriage bond, yet in spite of the fact that she and Cortis were thrown continually together and subject to much temptation, they resist, believing that, by keeping their love unsullied here below, they will earn the right to enjoy it in eternity.

"The Patriot," or "Piccolo Mondo Antico," is his most artistic work. In it a difference of religion exists between Franco Maironi and his wife Luisa, who, after the death of their child, indulges in table rapping and other such practices, whereas The Patriot, who has been a poor Catholic up to that, accepts the trial with proper resignation, and after years of separation is united to his wife, whom he converts to the Faith. The son of this couple is the hero of Fogazzaro's subsequent novel, "The Saint," and he is evolved from the worldly man and the libertine into the Saint who instructs the Pope about reforming the Church.

The article in the Etudes is more searching. The writer calls Fogazzaro "a curious mixture of the most contradictory elements; an irritating and disconcerting enigma." In the same sense the Civiltà had said: "he was like a fair lady, one of whose eyes was more beautiful than the other." If he attracts so much attention at the present time, it is not on account of his literary ability, but to solve the question of his orthodoxy.

His last book, "Leila," shows his Catholicity in a bad light. The clericals are held up to ridicule, while the antis are saints and heroes. Fogazzaro's excuse is that he thinks it helpful to religious sentiment to show in their nudity the decadence and ignorance of the country clergy; the "country clergy" in question being no other than the priests of Vicenza, in whose houses Fogazzaro was received as a guest.

The heroine Leila lost her faith because of the way she was brought up in a convent of the Sacred Heart. The hero Massimo lost his faith for reasons that are made clear in the book, but he retained all the essential qualities that believing and practical Catholics lack. Both of the lovers recover their faith when they find they are able to marry. "Darling," cries Massimo, "we shall seek a Faith together," while the lady "demands a God whom she can adore in the forests, in the ravine, in the cascade, in the waters of the lake, which do not impose official mediators on me."

"This large place given to sentiment in the solution of grave religious problems," says the critic, "explains how, as far back as 1893, Fogazzaro could write: 'A clear voice in my soul tells me that the question of the origin of man is largely a matter of sentiment and taste.'" "Leila," though not liked by some of the Modernists, is a very objectionable book for Catholics.

The question arises how, if he was a devout Catholic, Fogazzaro could publish "The Saint" and "Leila," not to speak of his other books? The explanation is found in the fact that he was educated by an uncle who was a hardened Rosminian, and by the poet Zanella, who taught him to admire Heine, Victor Hugo, and the rancorous old un-Christian Puritan, Milton. His tampering with spiritualism also counts for something in the muddle. He was sixty-eight years old when he wrote "Leila," and yet the Stampa of Turin—a Liberal sheet be it noted—in the issue of November 16, 1910, described "Leila" as made up of "religiosity and eroticism"—two bad traits for a Saint on the edge of the grave. He was reconciled to God, it is true, but, reviewing the romancer's career, his critic concludes: "If light abounds in the work of this writer, who is to some extent genial in his character and disposition, the shadows are too deep to admit of unstinted praise."

Leaves From My Diary, 1894-1896. By the RIGHT REVEREND ABBOT GASQUET, O.S.B. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price 75 cents.

Some time ago we reviewed the Rev. J. A. Lacey's "Roman Diary," in which he gave his version of the history of the Commission on Anglican Orders, and of the doings in connection with it, of himself and other members of the Church of England. Abbot Gasquet now gives his side of the case, which confirms the judgment we passed on Mr. Lacey's extraordinary book.

Abbot Gasquet tells some strange things about the Abbé Portal, who was chiefly responsible for the whole business; how, for instance, he passed in Rome as Lord Halifax's chaplain; how, under this relation, the two were received in audience by the Holy Father; and how they walked, carrying candles, in the Holy Thursday procession. He tells, too, of visits he received from the Abbé, who actually hoped for a conference between Roman theologians and English bishops, and how in the last of these visits the Abbé had so little to say in defence of his position, that, taking discretion to be the better part of valor, he ran away. He promised to return to the interesting discussion, but managed to forget his promise.

We learn from this book, too, how anxious the Pope was to give Anglicans every chance to make out their case. The first idea was to submit the question to the Holy Office. This was given up, as it was thought certain that its result would be an unqualified condemnation. Then a commission of cardinals was proposed, and abandoned for the same reason. Lastly, the commission which actually discussed the question was decided on as most favorable to Anglican hopes; and Father Scannell, more inclined to advance them than Mgr. Moyes and Abbot Gasquet, was brought to it at Cardinal Vaughan's expense.

Anglicans claim that the Commission was none of their seeking. Who, then, was responsible for it? Cardinal Vaughan and the English bishops did not want it. They were satisfied to leave things as they had been. Cardinal Mazzella and others of the Curia who understood the question were against it. We must apply Cicero's principle, cui bono, and ask, for whose advantage was the Commission? Evidently for the Anglicans'. They did not seek it directly, but through their French allies. They did not apply for it openly, but they circulated pamphlets in Rome which could not but lead to it. They did not want it in the form it received eventually, but in another more agreeable to their pretensions. But, after all, Rome had to be allowed some say in the matter. One asking his sovereign for an estate in freehold, could not say the business was none of his seeking because he received only a grant in serjeantry.

People outside the Church often speak of it as a machine, suggesting that the Pope and the bishops, without faith in it and its dogmas, use them to enslave men's souls and to enrich themselves. Two good things came out of the Commission. The refutation of that slander was the first. Had not Leo XIII and the Roman Curia believed, as absolutely as the simplest peasant, that the Church is the one ark of salvation, and that its dogmas express the truth which God revealed to it in the beginning to promulgate with his infallible authority, they could not have held it impossible for men professing to seek God's truth, to consider before Him the claims of His Church, only to reject them. Had they not been convinced of this impossibility, they would not have lent so ready an ear to Portal and accepted as the most obvious thing in the world the notion that the English people, bishops, clergy and laity, under the impulse of a great grace, were returning to their allegiance to the Vicar of Christ. Leo and his counsellors were not enthusiasts. They knew the English to be a practical people, not led by dreams, but yielding only to intimate conviction. Yet that idea was so fixed in the minds of those who had not experimental knowledge of the case, that it was almost as hard to disabuse them of it as it was to put right the Bishop of Salerno and the religious communities who were looking every morning into the papers for the announcement of the conversion of England.

The second good thing was that the Commission afforded one more example of the indwelling of the Holy Ghost in the Catholic Church, leading it into all truth, and, in this case, saving it against, we may almost say, a tremendous conspiracy.

St. Cecilia's Hymn Book, with Music. Compiled, arranged and edited by ARTH. DE MUELEMEESTER, Organist and Choir-master of the Redemptorist Church, Belfast. Dublin: Cahill & Co., Ltd.

Of the making of Hymn Books there is apparently no end. Yet the present work, "St. Cecilia's Hymn Book," claims a bid for popularity. In the Preface Mr. de Meulemeester, a Belgian organist in Belfast, makes the amazing statement that an adequate Hymn Book "is now offered to the public for the first time in this country." Surely Mr. de Meulemeester is not serious. And yet he complacently adds that he has now furnished the public (Irish) with "a book of music which may fittingly take its place beside his book of prayer (prayer book?)." This announcement does not err on the side of overweening modesty, but it is very typical of the usual method of foreign organists in Ireland, for, unfortunately, some of the best organ appointments are given to Germans and Belgians, to the exclusion of native talent. But, let us hear Mr. de Meulemeester:

"The Hymn Book on which my choice has fallen, as containing the best material to be set to music, is 'St. Cecilia's Hymn Book, compiled by the Rev. Father Hogan, C.S.S.R. The variety and excellence of the hymns which this compilation embodies encouraged me to do what little I could to advance, though in a humble way, the interests of sacred song.'

Majora Canamus. Mr. de Meulemeester unburthens his soul as to the quality of his own work:

"With regard to the quality of the music to be found in the manual, I trust that I will be deemed not presumptuous if I write that it appears to me to be well in advance of anything met with in compilations of this kind. It contains over one hundred original tunes, as well as several adaptations from prominent musicians still living—a fact which, I think, may claim for it the merit of freshness. . . . Some few tunes have found a place in this collection which can scarcely be said to lay claim to anything like artistic value. Time-honored associations have, however, given them rights which may not be set aside without rudeness; but, in some instances, a second setting has been added, for the benefit of those who find no trouble in making tradition give way before other considerations."

"St. Cecilia's Hymn Book" contains 206 hymns, including six Irish hymns by Father McHugh, C.S.S.R. As regards the authors of the hymns, no clue whatever is furnished, but a reference to the word-book—which is sold separately at one penny—gives the desired information. Exclusive of the Irish hymns, and the Benediction Service, there are 187 hymns. Of these more than half are by Redemptorists, including Fathers Vaughan, Bridgett, Hall, Doyle, Berghmann, Thompson, Macnamara and Collier. No doubt many of the verses are devotional, but that is as much as can be said of them. Yet, if the provenance of the book may be taken as an excuse for the preponderance of Redemptorist verse writers—and nobody can find fault with the inclusion of Father Bridgett's or Father Vaughan's hymns—there is no excuse for the appearance of hymns by non-Catholic writers. In this professedly Catholic work it is certainly strange to find hymns by Rev. J. M. Neale, Jane E. Leeson, Mrs. Sarah Adams, Charliot Elliott and the Rev. T. R. Taylor. If "Nearer My God to Thee" is admissible, why not include "Rock of Ages"? No author's name is given for the "Snow Lay on the Ground," but it was written by the erudite Rev. Dr. Lingard, who also is responsible for "Hail, Queen of Heaven!" Some people may like "Heaven is Our Home," but it is from the pen of a Congregationalist parson, named Taylor, who died in 1815. Father Henry's "Long Live the Pope" is substituted for Rev. Dr. Murray's popular lyric—but I suppose it is a case of de gustibus, etc.

It is more congenial work to praise the inclusion of hymns by Faber, Caswell, Husenbeth, Lady Georgiana Fullerton, Father Matthew Russell, S.J., Adelaide Proctor, Canon Oakley, Cardinal Newman, Father Burke, Father Bittleston, Father Stanfield, Bishop Chadwick, C. M. Caddell, R. Montheith, Father Christie, S.J., and Matthew Bridges. We are also glad to find Rev. Dr. C. C. Pise's beautiful "Hymn to St. Cecilia" ("Let the deep organ swell the lay"), which was rescued by Father Caswall, and appeared in the New York edition of "Lyra Catholica" in 1851. Dr. Pise was chaplain to the United States Senate, "the only time the post was ever held by a Roman Catholic," as the Rev. Mr. Mearns writes in Julian's "Dictionary of Hymnology," and he died pastor of St. Charles Borromeo's, Brooklyn, on the 28th of May, 1866.

And now as to the music. Mr. de Meulemeester has composed fifty tunes—most of which are pleasing. Father McHugh, C.S.S.R., has written music (as well as words) for six Irish hymns, and three English hymns. The tunes have an Irish flavor, but the frankly modern setting is inartistic. Father J. Cleere, C.S.S.R., furnishes thirty-six tunes, and shows a real gift of fluency. His setting of Father Faber's "We Come to Thee, Sweet Saviour" is one of the best in the whole book. We cannot commend the musical powers of Father Oddie, or Father Haagh, or Father Vaughan. And why is it necessary to include musical settings by Dykes, Bunnett, Patton, Baker, Holloway, Reinagle, Calcott, Martin, Benedict and others?

Naturally, out of the fifty original tunes a few might seem worthy of special praise, but truth compels us to say that Mr. de Meulemeester's melodies are neither strikingly original, nor, in some instances, suitably mated to the English words. Not infrequently the harmonies will not bear close scrutiny, and occasionally there are some cacophonous discords. It would have been wiser to retain more of the "old" tunes, and to include some plain chant melodies, even to the exclusion of tunes by Storer, Tozer, Belleus, Smith, de Prins and Urquhart. Cardinal Newman composed at least half a dozen good tunes, and these might have been reprinted without infringement of the copyright.

It is surprising that no reference is made to "St. Patrick's Hymn Book," issued by Father E. Gaynor, C.M., less than twenty years ago, and yet Mr. de Meulemeester includes the settings "Ave Maria, thou Virgin and Mother," and "I Rise from Dreams of Time," directly and professedly taken from this work. In Father Gaynor's book—published by Browne & Nolan, of Dublin, 1892—there are 200 tunes, forty-five of which were written expressly for the editor, including twenty-nine by himself. In the preface Father Gaynor wrote as follows: "Compared with the splendid hymnals of other Christian bodies, how grotesque do some of our collections of so-called hymn-tunes appear—operatic and orchestral fragments duly worked up, secular duets and quartets more or less 'adapted', popular airs of all kinds, from Irish melodies to Christy Minstrel ditties."

In conclusion, while acknowledging the merits of "St. Cecilia's Hymn Book," it is much to be desired that a really good collection—on the lines of the new edition of "Hymns Ancient and Modern"—was provided for the Catholic churches in Ireland. Of course, for the votaries of St. Alphonsus, a book containing so many of his hymns, translated by Father Vaughan, and original verses by so many other Redemptorists—quoted above—is sure of a cordial reception, and I am certain that it will be welcomed in the Redemptorist churches in Limerick, Dundalk, Belfast, etc., as also in the houses of the Order in England and Australia. A word of praise is due to Father Thomas Hogan, C.S.S.R., who collaborated with Mr. de Meulemeester in the compilation of the book, and it must also be added that the music type and letter press and binding are all that can be desired. Last, but not least, the price of the work is but half a crown, and it is excellent value, considering the 224 pages of music.

May we suggest, in view of a second edition, that the names of the authors of hymns be added at the heading, as also in the Alphabetical Index. Also the pitch for congregational singing ought to be medium, and the range should not be higher than / D on the fourth line of the treble clef. Not a few of the hymns in the present collection go up to F on the fifth line.

W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

The welcome announcement is made that the "Life and Letters of John Lingard," the leading Catholic historian of England, is in preparation and will soon be issued by Messrs. Herbert and Daniel. As the publishers in their prospectus observe: "It is something of a reproach to English letters that, beyond Canon Tierney's short memoir, prefixed to the 'History of England,' no biography of Lingard has hitherto been published." The authors of the "Life and Letters" are Martin Haile and Edwin Bonney. Father Bonney has written the biographical notice of Lingard for "The Catholic Encyclopedia." As Lingard's "History of England" is now out of print, the publication of his Life may lead to a new critical edition of his historical classic. The London Tablet observes that "in more ways than one an annotated edition of such a work as that of Dr. Lingard will have some advantage over any newly-written history of England. Thus, the number and nature of the corrective notes might serve as a sure test of the author's accuracy and freedom from bias; and, what is more, the additions might show how much real progress has been made in the field of history during the past sixty years."

An edition of Lingard's History such as is here spoken of would be appreciated by a large number of readers.

EDUCATION

Writing in the American Catholic Quarterly in 1905 Father Timothy Brosnahan, S.J., touches upon the question whether the profession and practice of religion has grown with the growth of the American public school. And he vouches for what may be considered "a curious aftermath or at least coincidence of popular education" as imparted in these schools. "To-day," says Father Brosnahan, "seventy years after the introduction of the public school system, more than two-thirds of the American people profess no religion. Making due allowance for the errors and defects that exist in census returns or computations, conceding even that many who profess no definite form of belief acknowledge vaguely the existence of a Supreme Being and a future state of rewards and punishments, and entertain in their hearts some undefined Christian religiosity, the fact remains that illiteracy has uniformly decreased with the extension of the public school system; and that the profession and practice of religion has diminished with an increase of literacy."

* * *

The writer's conclusion is "that whatever other beneficent results the public schools have produced, they have failed in what is fundamental," because they have failed "to promote either directly or indirectly an elevating force that is the leaven of civilization and the marrow of good citizenship." One may ask whether this contention of the Catholic educator is beginning to seep into the minds of those to-day most interested in the welfare of the public school here in America. It was claimed in the recent meeting of the National Education Association in San Francisco, that civic sloth and depravity are general throughout the country because the schools fail to train for citizenship. It was affirmed, too, that the present pressing problem in education is to arouse in the life of each person dealing with children the conviction that the moral and religious development of the child is an immediate necessity. And one, who is declared to have aroused the enthusiasm of all who heard her in the coast city congress, urged "the imperative need to turn to higher ideals, to combat the influence of a growing materialistic age, and to teach a higher citizenship."

* * *

In view of the apparently awakening sense of the fundamental defect of the non-religious school system, it may not be without use to call attention to a book recently published in France, which in an even-tempered entirely judicial strain recounts the story of the workings of the neutral school in that unfortunate republic. Its author, H. Maze-Sencier, was admirably fitted to tell the tale. A well-known writer, distinguished as a clear-headed objective student of affairs, Maze-Sencier has for years been head of the central news bureau furnishing correspondence to the newspapers. This position enabled him to keep in closest touch with French affairs, and afforded him naturally excellent opportunity to observe the workings of so important a factor in the social development of France as is the neutral, non-religious school system. His book, "L'Erreur primaire," is more than a charming literary production; it is first of all a profound study in the social-political life of the French people.

* * *

When Jules Ferry and his anti-Catholic allies, in 1882, introduced the neutral state school in France, the magic word used to cajole the people was freedom. Up and down the country the praises of free education uninfluenced by the narrow control of clericalism were chanted, and the fools that listened followed Ferry blindly. Maze-Sencier shows us from authentic documents how cruelly the freethinking plotters used their chance to deal a blow to religion. One is amazed at the citations he quotes from school books, from newspapers, magazines and reviews; from popular histories and philosophical works; from directions laid down by the Minister of Instruction in the cabinet of the republic, and detailed reports of the manner in which these directions were observed by district and local school authorities;—nothing escapes the author's research, and everywhere does he find evidence that the system which he is investigating is a well thought out plan of campaign against God, Church, State, family and country. His work reveals a striking historical illustration of the thought some one has expressed that there is a solidarity about the good things Providence bestows upon human nature.

* * *

One may not move to banish God from the public life of a nation without at the same time exposing to destruction the social and moral good qualities of the people. The cold facts rehearsed in "L'Erreur primaire" serve as an emphatic endorsement of Price Collier's recent characterization of France as a land accursed by "the diabolical misfortune of an education without morality." The quotations of Maze-Sencier, drawn from school books and magazines and newspapers and educational literature in general, are full of the cant that betrays apostasy from the faith; they are full, too, of the spirit of rebellion against the army and patriotism and country and family and society and the blessing of children and authority.

* * *

The first result of it all has been a deplorable split among the French people. Heads of families who still retain the old religious sentiment of the French nation will, of course, have naught to do with these State schools, and there is, in consequence, developing in the country what Waldeck-Rousseau used to term a dual France. Side by side the generations now growing into manhood and womanhood pursue their ways with a wide yawning abyss between them, destroying forever any thought of harmony of social relations. And the abyss is widening and deepening, now that the atheistic leaders of the neutral schools, supreme in the control which they have achieved, openly sneer at the neutrality they once proclaimed and hold it to be an absurd conception and one impossible to be realized.

* * *

This was not their stand when Ferry's school law was first discussed in the Palais Bourbon. Then it was the Catholic leaders who decried the attempt to foist lay schools upon a Catholic people as an undertaking to establish the impossible. Ferry and his associates in those days were feeling their way. They had not as yet the assurance that came with the later complete triumph of their scheme. They, therefore, argued and temporized and solemnly assured their opponents that, in the event the law should be passed, every religious belief would be respected, and fairly treated in the law's execution. Now, however, the glory of undimmed victory in the struggle rests with the anti-religious school leaders, and their language is changed. To-day Payot, the successor of Ferry in lay school agitation, openly proclaims the fact that his party is not in favor of neutrality in religious matters; "neutrality in school-training," he says, "is not what we seek, since we grant it is impossible."

* * *

This, of course, involves no new development of thought. It is what Christian apologists have been insisting upon throughout the ages. Education without religion, without an insistent regard to the child's formation according to the relations binding him to his Maker may train his intelligence; it will not, however, suffice for the right formation of character. And Maze-Sencier's great work, with an objectivity of treatment that is undeniable even by those he scores so bitterly, affords unanswerable proof of this drawn from the official records of France.

AMERICA has already cited editorially some of the documents which the author of "L'Erreur primaire" uses to prove his thesis. And vividly, indeed, do they paint the hideous disaster following upon an educational system that excludes religion. A shocking increase in juvenile criminality, a notable cooling of the patriotism that used to distinguish the sons of France, a constantly increasing trend towards the worst features of the Socialistic propaganda, a lowering of moral standards, a blunting of the moral sense and a deplorable blinding of the public conscience,—these are the phases of the indictment Maze-Sencier writes against the non-religious school system that prevails in France to-day. No wonder the land is in a perpetual turmoil of unrest. No wonder the millions stolen from the Church have disappeared. Riotous living and plain unadorned dishonesty have squandered the wealth which official France promised to use for the social betterment of the people. Verily there is "diabolical misfortune in education without religion."

While writing these paragraphs there came to us a letter recently received by the Hon. Bird S. Coler, whose excellent work in the furtherance of religious training in our common schools is just now arousing much attention. The letter was addressed to Mr. Coler by a non-Catholic lawyer, well known to the members of the profession here in New York. It is a genuine pleasure to be allowed to quote his words: "I have received and read with interest your second pamphlet on socialism in the schools, entitled 'The Residuary Sect.' I think that you are doing a very valuable service in pointing out what I agree with you in believing is the very great danger, that of our Godless schools. I have not time to write as fully as I should like on the matter, but in glancing over a little book containing some addresses of the late Bishop Wescott (who, I suppose, ranked very high both as a thinker and a scholar in the English Church) and showing how his thought on this question tended, I find an address which he made in 1898 in Birmingham, reviewing his life from his first recollection of the public meeting in 1831 down to the time of his speaking in 1898, sixty-seven years, in which he said:

'These were stirring years. Political, economic, social, religious changes came in quick succession, and looking forward already to the work of a priest (Anglican) and a teacher, I watched them with the keenest interest. I saw how movement acted upon movement, and how all the movements pointed to something deeper than any one showed: so I recognized that I was bound to study the problem of the new age no less than the lessons of the old world if I was to take a just view of the office to which I aspired. I seemed to discern as I looked on the events which were a large part of my training that all life was one; that no part lay outside of my sphere; that national life, social life, civic life, were all forms of the religious life which was the embodiment of the Gospel.'

"And then again in another address, having more special reference to public education, Bishop Wescott said:

'It has been said: Look on thy heart and write. As far as I have been able I have done so. I have looked back upon my school time and read afresh the lessons which have lived with me through all my days. I have looked back upon the years when I endeavored to teach, and noted again the causes of results below hope and sometimes beyond hope. In both retrospects alike, I have been assured that Education is, so far as it is true, of the whole life by the whole life. I have been assured that the highest is for all in Christ, and not for any privileged class. I have been assured that when we narrow our aim, we wrong our Faith.'

There is in the Bishop's words an easily recognizable echo of the argument Catholics have ever advanced against the non-religious school system.

ECONOMICS

Perhaps the greatest evil of the continuous fall of consols is the loss of capital to investors. Consols are not usually a speculative stock; neither have they been looked upon as an income producing stock. Their great value was their presumed stability. It was supposed that one might put any sum into consols to-day, and sell out ten or twenty years hence for about the same amount of money. Hence they were the usual investment for trust funds, insurance companies' reserves, etc. Now, the state of affairs is this: Suppose that ten or fifteen years ago a lady had a marriage portion of £10,000, which her trustees invested in consols. To-day the investment is worth less than £8,000; and, should she die, her children will be the poorer by £2,000. What makes matters worse is, that on account of the supposed stability of value, she has been getting only £250 a year of income. No wonder the public are alarmed.

Among the reasons assigned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Lloyd George, to explain the constant fall, is this: that colonial stocks have been approved of by the courts for the investment of trust funds. People are supposed to be putting into such stocks what they used to put into consols. The fact is, that colonial investments have fallen under suspicion. Thus, few of the late Canadian issues have been subscribed for to any extent, most of the stock having been left in the hands of the underwriters. This is true of both municipal and commercial issues; and it is the result of distrust of the investments themselves and of the promoters behind them. For instance, a prairie town of which the name is hardly known comes into the market to borrow a million dollars for municipal improvements. It gives a statement of its population, of the assessed value of its taxable property, of its tax rate, of its annual growth for the past five years; but the investor is unconvinced. It may be all right, and, again, it may be all wrong. Every new town of the West nourishes hopes of becoming another Chicago or St. Paul; but a change in railway routes, or two or three bad harvests may blast its hopes. To the investor the town itself is a speculation. If a commercial company is the borrower it gives the usual statement of its assets, resources and so on; but who are these men behind it? Are they responsible, or are they professional promoters? The investor finds it often impossible to say. He has been caught before, and the burnt child dreads the fire. Moreover, Mr. McBride, Premier of British Columbia, has taken pains to warn him on the subject of proposals from that country. Many British Columbian investments are sound, he said, but there are some which will bring neither profit to the investor nor credit to the province.

What is said of Canadian investments may be said with due proportion of other colonial proposals. Great caution is required; and the investor who finds his capital diminished by the fall of consols is inclined to be cautious.

In connection with the problem of the fall of consols might be considered the breaking up of landed estates, which has been going on in England on a large scale for some two years past. The great landed gentry are selling out, and not a few tenants are buying the farms they have hitherto leased. Where do they find the money? This, which as yet has not been adverted to, may be one of the causes of the fall in consols. We are assured that sellers are more numerous than buyers, hence it is clear that not a few are trying to sell out, and among substantial farmers are found just such cases of the investment of marriage portions as we spoke of in the beginning. Again, how are the old landlords investing the proceeds of these sales? We think the tracing up of this would throw much light on the present intricate problem of the investment market.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

THE SITUATION IN ALBANIA.

The London Times publishes the following important article, entitled "Torgut Shevket's Methods of Warfare, by a non-Albanian Eye-witness," which was sent to that paper by its Vienna correspondent on July 10:

In order to exterminate all the Catholic highland clans, comprising about 100,000 souls, says the writer, Torgut Shevket drove those whom he could not catch in his military noose over the frontier into Montenegro, and thereupon drew a strong cordon of troops from the Adriatic to Gusinje. As soon as the cordon had been formed, he caused all the peaceful Albanians who were earning a livelihood as laborers at Skutari to be expelled from the hills. Before the expulsion, Torgut Shevket had solemnly declared that only the Malissori clans properly so called were considered as rebels. No sooner had the expelled laborers, who belonged mostly to the Shala and Slaku clans, reached their villages than the Shala clansmen were also declared to be rebels, and their supplies of food—i.e., maize, from Skutari—cut off. As the food supply in the Shala country sufficed only for a few weeks, and the inhabitants knew that after they had surrendered their weapons Torgut Shevket would have them maltreated and bastinadoed, as he did last year, they replied to his demand for their arms, "Come and take them"; and, to escape starvation, began to slaughter their flocks, which form their only capital. Thus Torgut Shevket will, in any case, have ruined some 8,000 Albanians (not 3,600 as Turkish journals pretend) and will have compelled them to emigrate. He himself triumphantly reported last week that their provisions were almost exhausted. The fight of the Shala people at Traboina on Friday was nothing but a desperate attempt to break through the Turkish cordon in order to bring back from Montenegro bread for their starving women and children.

Yes! In comparison with the refined cruelty of Torgut Shevket's behavior towards 16,000 pacific Malissori in the Bregumatia, or marshy littoral, his treatment of the Shala people, continues the writer, is anodyne. Nearly one-half of the highland clans have been accustomed from time immemorial to descend every autumn with their flocks and families into the Bregumatia, and to winter there; but as in June veritable clouds, not merely swarms, of mosquitoes make the littoral uninhabitable, they return to the hills early in summer. On their way down in autumn they are obliged to pass through Skutari, and at the Drin bridge, guarded by soldiers, they are made to pay a tax of 8d. per head for every sheep (worth 11s. 4d.) and to give up all weapons. An insurrection among the clans in the Bregumatia being thus out of the question, and their destruction manu militari therefore unjustifiable, Torgut Shevket forbade them, at the beginning of summer, to return to the hills. Malaria is already raging among them, their flocks must perish from drinking the foul water of the now stagnant marshes, and Torgut Shevket is near the attainment of his object. A superior Turkish official of Skutari, Ibrahim Effendi Kjori, has declared publicly that the Ottoman Government intends to let the Malissori in the Bregumatia "die like swine in a bog." "If European diplomacy does not soon bestir itself on behalf of the North Albanian Catholics," concludes the writer, "it will very quickly be able to boast of having by its Notes lent a hand to the murderous work of the Imperial Ottoman General, Torgut Shevket Pasha."

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

H. P. K. Skipton, Secretary of the Indian Church Association, whose offices are at Church House, Westminster, made an attack in a recent contribution to the Nineteenth Century on the Catholic Schools in India. In his article Mr. Skipton states that "the Roman Church" in India is "distinctly an alien Church, manned and directed by French, Belgian, Italian and German clergy, with a sprinkling of Irish Roman Catholics, none of whom—and the last named, unfortunately, least of all—can be reckoned as our friends, politically or otherwise." Mr. Skipton's calumny is energetically condemned in a leading article of the Morning Post, of India, reproduced in the Catholic Herald of India for June 14. The writer in the Morning Post says:

"We do not think Mr. Skipton has exaggerated the situation, but we totally disagree with his contention that the education given to Christian boys and girls in Roman Catholic institutions is a political danger. In our opinion the striking contrast between the success of Roman Catholic educational work in this country with the comparative failure of the Protestant Church only shows the greater zeal and the more earnest energy of the Catholic priesthood. . . . Mr. Skipton probably has little knowledge of the educational work of the great Roman Catholic institutions in Calcutta, Darjeeling and Bombay, and if these institutions had not existed there would hardly have been any education worth the name among the domiciled community. We know as an absolute and incontrovertible fact that the education given in Roman Catholic schools and convents and colleges is, so far as other denominations are concerned, of a wholly non-sectarian character, and it is due to this reason, and also to the greater culture and polish obtainable in these institutions, rather than in Anglican schools, that so many Hindus and Mohammedans are attracted to these institutions. St. Xavier's College in Calcutta has, for instance, among its alumni men of the highest position and character, who are a living testimony to the character of the education imparted by the Jesuit Fathers, while the supremacy of that and other schools in all branches of sport is a conclusive proof that the special characteristics of Great Britain do not flourish the less in these admirable institutions than in those which are wholly controlled by the English Protestants, who, probably, have not the same self-sacrificing love for their work as has been abundantly shown by the Jesuits and the Irish Brothers in India."

Mother M. Florence, recently Mother Assistant of the Community, has been chosen Superior General of the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati, Ohio, in succession to Mother M. Blanche, who has just completed a term of six years in that important charge. The new Superior will have jurisdiction over establishments in the archdioceses of Cincinnati and Santa Fe, the dioceses of Cleveland, Detroit, Grand Rapids, Nashville and Denver. The 770 Sisters comprising the community are engaged in educational work chiefly, but they conduct several well-known and successful hospitals and sanitariums as well. In their various academies and schools more than 22,000 pupils come under their influence.

Mother Mary of the Divine Heart Spillane, Superior of the Convent of the Good Shepherd, Boston, has been appointed Mother Provincial of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, whose mother house is in New York. The New York provincialate includes, besides its large establishment in Manhattan, houses of the order in Boston, Providence, Springfield, Hartford, Albany, Troy, Peekskill, Brooklyn and Newark. Mother Xavier, the former Provincial, has been made Superior of the Good Shepherd Convent in Troy, N. Y.

Mother Mary of Loretto Grace, recently elected Provincial of the St. Louis Province of the Good Shepherd Nuns, in which there are thirteen convents, has returned from France, where she attended the election of the Mother General. This is her second term as Provincial.

Mother Eutopia McMahon was elected Mother General of the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, on July 19, in compliance with the recent decree of the Holy See in regard to the constitution of this congregation, which was founded in Kentucky a century ago. The office is a new one and she is the first to hold it. There are about 900 of these Sisters, who have foundations in the Dioceses of Baltimore, Boston, Columbus, Covington, Little Rock, Louisville, Nashville, Natchez and Richmond. They have nearly 14,000 children under their care, and seven Homes, Hospitals and Infirmarys.

The Most Rev. Edmond Francis Prendergast was solemnly enthroned, on July 26, as the seventh Bishop and the third Archbishop of the Metropolitan See of Philadelphia in his Cathedral of Sts. Peter and Paul. The ceremonies marking the occasion were most imposing. The procession to the church formed in the Cathedral Chapel, and as it moved on all the Catholic Church bells in the city rang out joyously. His Excellency the Apostolic Delegate, Mgr. Falconio, was present as personal representative of the Holy Father, besides eleven Bishops, twelve Monsignori, over 400 priests, and a vast number of the laity.

At the door of the Cathedral Monsignor Bornemann, Rector of St. Paul's, Reading, and senior priest of the Archdiocese, recited the prescribed prayers and presented the crucifix to the Archbishop, which he kissed in profession of faith. The ceremony in the sanctuary began with the reading of the Papal bulls authorizing the elevation. During the solemn chanting of the Benedictus all the priests of the archdiocese present knelt in turn at the episcopal throne and paid homage to their new Archbishop. Solemn pontifical Mass was celebrated by the Right Rev. John E. Fitzmaurice, D.D., Bishop of Erie. The Right Rev. Michael J. Hoban, D.D., Bishop of Scranton, preached the sermon.

The address on behalf of the clergy was read by the Rev. John J. Ward, Rector of the Church of the Sacred Heart; the laity's address by Walter George Smith, Esq.

Archbishop Prendergast has appointed Monsignor John J. McCort, Rector of the Church of Our Mother of Sorrows, and the Rev. James F. Trainor, Rector of St. Philip Neri's, Vicars General of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia.

Nearly 300 Sisters, members of the teaching orders of the Church, were received in the East Room of the White House on July 18 by President Taft. Twenty-five different religious communities were represented, coming from forty-two States and Canada. The nuns whom the President received were attending lectures at the newly opened Summer School of the Catholic University, and were accompanied by Mgr. Shahan, rector of the Catholic University. Among the most interesting of the President's guests was a community of nuns recently exiled from France, who are now engaged in teaching at Sioux City, Iowa. All the visitors were charmed with the courteous reception given them by Mr. Taft.

The Knights of Columbus, the Hibernian Society, and other fraternal and religious organizations of Catholic laymen who are united in the American Federation of Catholic Societies, have, it is reported, formally proposed to the Westminster Federation Council of London the formation of a World Federation of Catholic Societies. The London Council has acted favorably upon the proposal, and has asked the approval of Archbishop Bourne of Westminster.

The extraordinary privilege granted last year by our Holy Father, Pope Pius X, in connection with the well-known indulgence of the Portiuncula, has been extended indefinitely, according to the decree of Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office, May 26, 1911. By virtue of the faculty thus granted, the Ordinary of the diocese has authority to designate various churches under his jurisdiction in any of which the visit or visits for the Portiuncula may be made.

PERSONAL.

The Dubuque Catholic Tribune of July 27 says:

"The Most Rev. J. J. Keane, who some weeks ago retired to Mt. Carmel, south of Dubuque, but shortly afterwards went back to his residence, is now staying at Mercy Hospital. His condition is very serious and unfortunately makes us fear the worst."

Father Bernard Vaughan, the distinguished Jesuit preacher, has been giving missions to the inhabitants of the East End, London. His method of addressing his audience in their own dialect has drawn all sorts of criticism upon his well-meaning head. Some of the milder critics find fault with him as simply overdoing his part; others go further and brand his dialogues as "horribly vulgar and really unbecoming for utterance in a church." The comment of the Bombay Examiner is sober and judicious, carefully analytic and constructed on first principles. Premising that the whole purpose of language is to convey thoughts and facts most clearly and cogently by the use of arbitrary signs, the Examiner concludes that the speaker should or may accommodate himself to the hearer's language or dialect in preference to his own whenever the hearer understands more vividly in his own language and feels closer drawn to the speaker. Vulgarity is not inherent in language. Nor is it always vulgar for a man of refined education to condescend to the language of the uneducated classes, provided he knows what he is doing and does it for any rational cause. "Under some circumstances it may be bad taste; but it is not vulgarity." Father Bernard Vaughan's dialogues are not vulgar, for they are a condescension from above and not a pretension from below. Furthermore, since they are neither queer nor extravagant, they cannot be classed as buffoonery. But the dialogues might fall on a class of persons they were not intended for, "who would treat them as a joke; and so a situation of objective bad taste would arise." Wherefore, had Father Vaughan's dialogues been kept within the walls of the East End church and not printed for the world to read, "they might then have been acquitted of all charge of vulgarity or buffoonery, or of bad taste in any form."

Father Bernard Vaughan will know how to profit by the discussion which the Examiner says contains "some very sound and sensible criticisms as well as several puritanical, exaggerated, narrow and irrelevant ones." What his own views on the subject are many Americans may have a chance to hear from himself during his projected tour through the United States.

Preparations are under way in Baltimore for the ecclesiastical celebration of the jubilee of Cardinal Gibbons in October next. His Eminence, who has just entered his seventy-eighth year, comes of a long-lived family, his eldest sister, Miss Mary Gibbons, is eighty-one; another sister, Mrs. George Swarbrick, is seventy-nine, and his brother, John T. Gibbons, is seventy-four. All three reside in New Orleans.

A handsome silver service has been selected by the committee appointed by Mayor Preston of Baltimore to be given Cardinal Gibbons at the ecclesiastical jubilee celebration in October. The gift is a combination dinner set of 264 pieces, of repoussé silver, hand carved, and will be suitably engraved for the occasion.

In the presence of the executive committee of the Cardinal's celebration and several departmental heads, Mayor Preston of Baltimore presented to Mr. A. S. Goldsborough two handsome repoussé silver platters, gifts of the executive committee, in appreciation of his work in arranging the Cardinal's celebration. Each piece bears the following inscription:

"Presented to A. S. Goldsborough by the executive committee of the Cardinal's jubilee celebration in recognition of his zeal as general secretary in helping to promote the success of the great national function held in the Fifth Regiment Armory, Baltimore, Md., Tuesday, June 6, 1911, in honor of the fiftieth year of the priesthood and the twenty-fifth year of the cardinalate of his Eminence James Cardinal Gibbons, which function was attended by President William H. Taft, Vice-President James S. Sherman, former President Theodore Roosevelt, Speaker of the House Champ Clark, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court Edward Douglass White, English Ambassador James Bryce, many United States Senators and members of the House of Representatives and 25,000 admiring citizens."

At the Jesuit house of studies, Woodstock, Md., on Sunday, July 30, the eve of the Feast of St. Ignatius Loyola, nineteen scholastics of the Society of Jesus were ordained priests by his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons. The newly ordained, who had the happiness of saying their first Mass on the festival of their holy Founder, are the Rev. William C. Nevils, Rev. Francis X. Delany, Rev. Henry A. Coffey, Rev. James A. Cahill, Rev. James M. Kilroy, Rev. James T. McCormick, Rev. John A. Morgan, Rev. John J. O'Connor, Rev. Michael Selga, Rev. Patrick Rafferty, Rev. Thomas H. Wiley, Rev. Charles J. Hennessy, Rev. Charles J. McIntyre, Rev. Cornelius A. Murphy, Rev. John E. McQuade, Rev. Joseph P. Green, Rev. Anicetus Déniz, Rev. Dominick E. Hammer and Rev. Thomas J. Gartland.

Lady Outram, widow of Sir James Outram, the famous Indian soldier whose name is bound up in the history of the Mutiny, has just died, in her ninety-ninth year. She was already forty-four years old when the Mutiny broke out. Escaping from Aligarh, she passed safely through bands of mutinous Sepoys under the protection of her son, and reached Agra, where she remained until the rising was suppressed. She survived her husband forty-eight years.

Archbishop Bruchési of Montreal, on his way back from the Eucharistic Congress in Madrid, visited Rome recently, and was received in audience by the Holy Father. Father Kenny, of Baltimore, who represented Cardinal Gibbons at the Congress, was with him.

The Rev. Dr. William McMahon, editor of the Cleveland Catholic Universe, was stricken with paralysis on July 24, and is in a very serious condition.

SCIENCE

VARIATION OF LATITUDE.

In the Astronomische Nachrichten, No. 4504, Albrecht gives the results of the observations of the variation of latitude as determined by the international association during the year 1910. There are six observatories, five of which are distributed as evenly around the world as the continents and other circumstances admitted, and they all lie on the same parallel of north latitude, 39 degrees and 8 minutes, the seconds varying from 3 to 19. They are Mizusarva in Japan, Tschardjui in Turkestan, Carloforte in Sardinia, Gaithersburg in Maryland, Cincinnati in Ohio, and Ukiah in California. All these observatories observe the same stars and use the same methods. The result of their work has shown that the axis around which the earth revolves is shifting its position in the earth itself continually, its northern end—that is, the point commonly called the north pole—moving in an ellipse whose major axis is about 28 feet and minor axis about 8 feet, with a period of one year, and also in a circle whose diameter is about 30 feet, with a period of 428 days, both motions being from west to east. The ellipse is swinging round in the opposite direction at the rate of about 5 degrees a year, and there seems to be also another variation, with a period of about 436 days.

In the article referred to the accurate numerical results are given only for the year 1910, but there is a chart showing the positions of the pole for every tenth of a year since January 1, 1900. They are all confined within a space about 60 feet square.

ROTATION OF A STAR ON ITS AXIS.

As every star is a sun like ours, a large incandescent globe of gas, it must turn on an axis, but, as even in the largest telescopes it is a mere point, brilliant in proportion to its own so-called magnitude and to the aperture of the telescope, but still a point of no measurable size, it would seem to be an impossible task to attempt to measure the speed of its rotation. Still, Forbes, in the Monthly Notices for May, suggests a method that may give results. He makes use of Doppler's principle, according to which the spectral lines of a star are shifted towards the red end when it is receding, and towards the violet when it is approaching. Now, when a star rotates on an axis perpendicular to the line of sight one edge is approaching and the other receding. Hence there must be a double shift, that is, a widening of the spectral lines. Whether this widening can be measured with sufficient accuracy, and whether it truly represents the speed of the star's rotation, is questionable, as there are other causes affecting the width of spectral lines. We shall await the test with interest.

THE MOON'S DISTANCE.

In the Monthly Notices of the Royal Astronomical Society for May there is a very technical article by the Astronomer Royal of England and His Majesty's Astronomer at the Cape (of Good Hope) on a Determination of the Moon's Parallax from Meridian Observations of the crater Mösting A at the Royal Observatories of Greenwich and the Cape of Good Hope in the years 1906-1910.

Shorn of its intensely mathematical terminology, the article states that in the usual method of determining the moon's distance by observing its displacement among the stars as seen by two observatories very far apart, it has been customary to observe the moon's edge, or limb, as astronomers prefer to call it. Besides the difficulty of irradiation, which increases the true size of a bright object, there was the no less serious one of judging the perfect tangency of the micrometer wire, as well as the fact that the moon's limb is in reality made up of mountains and valleys, so that even the very precise observation of the occultations of stars by the moon could not in principle give consistent results. The two English astronomers therefore selected a very distinct and small crater, called Mösting A, and thus avoided all the aforementioned difficulties. They admit, however, that even this method has difficulties of its own. The results obtained were so satisfactory that they proceeded to attempt the solution of another problem, that of determining the figure of the earth from such a series of observations. The method is confessedly only tentative, but it is worth mentioning, because it illustrates the modern trend to extreme refinement in measurement.

OBITUARY

The Very Rev. Joseph Butler, O.F.M., President of St. Bonaventure's College and Seminary, Allegany, N. Y., died at St. Francis' Hospital, New York, on July 25. He was born in Ireland, in 1838, and in the early sixties came to America. Later he entered the Order of Friars Minor at Allegany, and was ordained a priest in 1880. His prominent position for many years as president of the Seminary and his untiring interest in students and alumni gave him exceptional opportunities, which he never neglected, to exercise a wide influence throughout the country. His death will be lamented by a large number of friends.

CHRONICLE

Treaties Are Signed.—The general arbitration treaties between the United States and Great Britain and the United States and France were signed on August 3, in the President's library at the White House. Ambassador Bryce signed the British treaty conjointly with Secretary of State Knox, and the French treaty, after it was signed by Secretary Knox, was despatched by special messenger to Paris to exchange for the one signed for France by Jean Jules Jusserand, the French Ambassador to the United States, in the presence of Robert Bacon, American Ambassador at Paris. The President was the principal witness to the signing of the treaties in Washington. Before going into effect the treaties must be ratified by the United States Senate.

Provisions of the Treaties.—By the general provisions of the two arbitration treaties all differences internation-ally arbitrable shall be submitted to The Hague, unless by special agreement some other tribunal is created or selected. Differences that either country thinks are not arbitrable shall be referred to a commission of representatives of the two Governments empowered to make recommendations for their settlement. Should the commission decide that the dispute should be arbitrated such decision will be binding. Before arbitration is resorted to the commission of inquiry shall investigate the dispute with a view of recommending a settlement without arbitration. The commission, at the request of either Government, will delay its findings for one year to give an opportunity for diplomatic settlement. The terms of submission of each dispute to arbitration will be ratified by the Senate.

Panama Fair Site Selected.—The Directors of the Panama-Pacific International Exhibition have agreed upon a site which will include Golden Gate Park and Harbor View. The industrial and other temporary structures of the Fair will be erected at Harbor View, overlooking the entrance to the harbor. All the permanent buildings, museums and the like, will be placed in Golden Gate Park, excepting the large convention hall, which is to be built in the city proper at Van Ness avenue and Market street. The water front from the Cliff House to the ferry will be beautified and boulevards will connect the different buildings, some of which will be placed on Lincoln Park, overlooking the Golden Gate.

Novel Plea for Low Mail Rates.—During the investigation by the commission on second-class postal rates E. R. Graham pleaded the cause of the Methodist Book Concern, which he said would be ruined by an increase in the rates of second-class mail matter. Many religious publications fostered by the concern would have to suspend publication, Mr. Graham said. The profits from these publications, he explained, did not go to the Church, but were used toward the support of superannuated ministers and their widows and orphans. "And if it should be shown that these rates are too low," asked Justice Hughes, "and the profits of your publications were reduced because of an increase in the rates, then the sums paid your superannuated ministry would be correspondingly lessened?" "Exactly," was the quick answer of Mr. Graham. "Well," continued Justice Hughes, "do you think the superannuated ministry of the Methodist Church should be supported by the United States?" Mr. Graham answered, "It wouldn't be a bad idea for it to do so;" but this phase of the matter seemingly had not occurred to him before, and he was evidently disconcerted.

New York City Has 5,000,000.—According to the figures of the Health Department issued on August 1, the population of New York City is 5,000,407. The United States census for 1910 gives New York, with its five boroughs, a population of 4,766,883, so that the gain within one year has been 233,524. This is a gain of fifty-three per cent. since July 1, 1898, when the city had a population of 3,272,418. The percentage of increase has been largely with Manhattan Borough, the population of which is given as 2,393,636. The Borough of the Bronx has a population of 487,437; Brooklyn, a total of 1,716,852; Queens, 312,630, and Richmond, 89,852.

Jewish Regiment and Armory.—The Federation of Jewish Organizations failed last spring to convince Governor Dix of the need of an armory on the East Side of New York City for a Jewish regiment. In order to make a good impression on the State authorities a detachment of the Hebrew Volunteers marched from the city of New York to the Capitol at Albany with a plea for an armory. The editor of the American Israelite writes in opposition to the movement: "The people who make this claim forget that, in the event of its being granted, their neighbors, Christians of all denominations, would be entitled to similar rights. Can you imagine anything so out of harmony with our institutions as a brigade formed of a regiment each of Roman Catholics, Methodists, Presbyterians and Jews? I am glad to know that the better element of the Jews of New York is not responsible for this grotesque demand." The New York Tribune reminds the agitators that the military laws of the State provide that the uniformed national guard shall not exceed 18,000, and that if the organizations now in existence were recruited up to their full size that number would be reached, precluding the possibility of any official recognition of the Jewish regiment or the appropriation of funds for the erection of an armory.

Mexico.—General Bernardo Reyes has announced that he will not be a candidate for the presidency at the October elections, but the terms in which his declaration is couched are so vague that his friends seem determined to present his name to the electors, and his enemies fear he may carry the election. Matters are complicated by the published statement that the representatives of "two great countries," by which the United States and Great Britain are understood, look upon Reyes as the only man able to master the present situation. He is credited with having a thousand armed partisans in the State of Mexico.—The admirers of General Diaz are preparing to make a political pilgrimage to Europe for the purpose of congratulating him on September 16, the anniversary of Mexican independence, and the supposed anniversary of his birth.—An excursion party made up of eighty-five farmers from Kansas, Oklahoma, Oregon and Alberta has reached the capital, with the intention of investing in agricultural lands in Veracruz.—In compliance with the suggestion of the Minister of Government that prisoners in the various State penitentiaries be employed on irrigation canals, the State of Michoacan has already set fifty convicts to work. The men are selected for their good behavior, are promised a commutation of sentence if they do well, and are allowed small wages. The movement promises to spread, for the good of the country and to the benefit of the convicts.—The Government has decreed that for the next six months the custom houses shall not admit arms or ammunition into the country.—United States Ambassador Henry Lane Wilson has officially asked the protection of the Government for American citizens in Durango and other parts of the republic.—Eleven Yaqui chieftains from the mountains of Sonora have gone to petition the President to restore to the tribe the lands of which they say they were fraudulently deprived under the Diaz administration. They will also beg him to send back to their homes the surviving Yaquis who were transported to Yucatan.—Although already assisted by the central Government to meet its July payments, the State of San Luis Potosí is without funds. The provisional governor has asked permission to sell two public buildings to tide over the emergency.—The election for governor of Oaxaca resulted in the choice of Benito Juárez Maza, son of the dictator, and ineligible according to the State constitution. His competitor was Félix Diaz, a nephew of Porfirio. It remains to be seen whether the reform administration will countenance the seating of Juárez.

Canada.—Earnest endeavors are being made to terminate the colliery strike in Alberta and Eastern British Columbia, so as to avert a coal famine during the winter. Sometimes it is reported that these have been successful, but without sufficient foundation. The government has suspended the duty on coal from the United States west of Sault Ste Marie.—Cool weather has retarded the crops in Alberta and Saskatchewan, and there is some fear that they may suffer from frost before the harvest can be gathered. Black rust is also reported. It is difficult, however, to distinguish between the real facts and the reports originating from gamblers in the wheat market.—Mr. Bourassa will follow Mr. Monk in the Quebec campaign, and Conservatives believe that both will oppose the Reciprocity Agreement.—The Conservatives are making much of the fact that Parliament was dissolved just after a committee had been appointed to examine into charges against the ministry of the interior, and in spite of a promise it had received that no dissolution should take place till it had made its report.—The Niobe went ashore near Cape Sable and was badly injured. She was floated, however, and brought into shallow water in Shag Harbor for temporary repairs, and it is hoped that she may be brought to the dry dock at Halifax in safety.

Great Britain.—The Unionists have reduced Liberal majorities in the by-elections for Bethnal Green and the Luton Division of Bedfordshire. In the former case, from 682 to 318, in a total poll increased from 4,854 to 5,440; and in the latter, from 613 to 248, in a poll increased from 14,625 to 15,036. This hardly indicates that the country is seriously displeased with the Government.—Mr. Balfour and Lord Lansdowne have moved votes of censure against the Prime Minister, on account of his advice to the King to overcome the Lords' opposition to the Parliament Bill by the creation of peers. This enables Lord Halsbury's followers to give vent to their feelings, after which they will be more inclined to follow their nominal leader's advice, to absent themselves from the final vote and leave the Liberal peers free to carry the measure.—The Duke of Bedford continues to sell off his lands. His Tavistock estate in Devonshire has just brought him nearly £600,000. When one considers that there is no reason why a man with his pockets full of stocks and bonds, even though a duke, should be an hereditary legislator, and that the raison d'être of the House of Peers was the position of its members as territorial lords, one cannot admire, whatever his politics may be, their readiness to fall before the land legislation, of which one of the objects is to deprive them of that status. If the cause of their House is that of the Constitution and even of the Crown, as they pretend, they should have sufficient patriotism to cling to their land, even though this should entail the suffering of poverty. But the Duke of Bedford has not this excuse, as his income from London property is enormous.—The leaders of the Labor Party took the opportunity of the Imperial Conference to broach to Mr. Fisher, the Australian Premier and other Labor Ministers, the idea of an Imperial Labor Organization, with its periodical conferences.

Ireland.—Mr. Redmond is moving the following addition to Clause 59 of the Insurance Bill: (1) There shall be constituted Commissioners for Ireland, with a central office in Dublin and with such branch offices throughout Ireland as the Treasury shall deem fit, and references in the Act to Insurance Commissioners shall be deemed references to the Irish Insurance Commissioners. (2) All sums received in Ireland and moneys contributed by Parliament in respect of benefits and administrative expenses under this portion of the Act shall be paid into the Irish National Health Insurance Fund, under the control of the Irish Insurance Commissioners. The purport of further Irish amendments was outlined in last week's Chronicle.—The Intermediate Education Board has presented a report to Parliament showing that their allocations from revenue taxes have fallen from $300,000 in 1900 to $85,000 in 1910, and that unless further funds are provided they will find it impossible to grant Exhibitions to students in accordance with the Irish Universities Act of 1898. "Such a result would be disastrous to Intermediate Education and press with great severity on the smaller schools." As "Irish Intermediate schools compare favorably with those of England," it is urged that equal grants, proportionately, should be accorded them.—An amendment to the Irish Laborers' Bill was carried in Committee against the Government by the Irish members. It gives to the District Councils the right of appeal against the action of government inspectors in the allotment of cottage sites.—The Land Commissioners report that 399,896 applications for fair rents have been adjudicated since 1881, and the average reduction of rentals was 20.7 per cent., amounting to $10,000,000 per year. Of the 165,133 persons who purchased their farms only 54 had to be sued for recovery of payment. This was deemed a high tribute to the Irish farmers' honesty and thrift.—Father Vaughan, S. J., replied to a London journalist who interviewed him on Home Rule: "I will not answer you as a priest or a politician, but this much I say deliberately, as an Englishman: If England wants to clasp the hand of friendship with Canada, Australia and her other dependencies, she must make it clear to them that she has no quarrel at home with Ireland. So long as there is any want of contentment on the Irish floor of the big house called the British Empire, there will inevitably be irritation with England among Ireland's sympathizers all over the world."

Portugal.—While on his way home from the funeral of the late Bishop of Vizeu, Bishop Coutinho, of Portalegre, was mobbed in the railway station of Vizeu. His hat and cloak were torn to pieces. The gang was made up of civilians and soldiers. On reaching Portalegre, the bishop was thrust into the common jail among all kinds of evildoers; but he was released six hours later, on promising not to appear again in public in his cassock.—In the town of Villarreal, Father Manuel Pinheiro and another priest were arrested as conspirators against the republic. Although Father Pinheiro is seventy-four years of age, he and his companion were escorted on foot through the town amid the jeers of the rabble.—Deputy Pacheco, of the Spanish Parliament, made an automobile trip across the border to the Portuguese town of Elvas, where he and his party were subjected to a severe and searching examination by certain subalterns. When his official position became known, the authorities invited the party to a lunch in the Casino;

but some soldiers, who thought that too much honor was shown the Spaniards, gathered in front of the Casino and indulged in offensive remarks. One of the soldiers was arrested, but his comrades raised a disturbance and demanded his release. At last the Spanish consul came to the help of the Portuguese authorities (?) and succeeded in quieting the tumult.—Some of the most prominent citizens of Oporto have received through the mails artistic cards numbered serially and bearing, besides the name of the addressee, a neat design of a dagger on a black ground with the legend, "If you are a traitor to the country and the republic, you will answer for your rashness."—The subscribers to A Palavra, the Oporto newspaper, whose office was looted by a mob, have been notified that the twenty members composing the staff are in jail or in hiding, so there is no telling when the paper will reappear.—Senhor Braamcamp-Freire was chosen, not President of Portugal, as was generally reported, but President of the Constitutional Convention. Braga is still Provisional President.—Owing to the shortness of ready money in the hands of the Government, the salaries of the governors of the provinces and of other officials are in arrears.—A Spanish journalist, Señor Ventalló, has been expelled from Portugal for his criticisms of the "Government."—The fable that the republic has a reserve army of one hundred thousand men, ready to take the field at a moment's notice, comes to this, that the local authorities opened registration lists, and every idler gave his name and then walked off. The number of "repeaters" is not given.—A riotous demonstration in Lisbon against the high price of codfish and olive oil was put down by repeated cavalry charges.

Germany.—The official statement of the imperial finances recently issued offers excellent proof of the success resulting from the finance reforms agreed upon two years ago. Preliminary reports forecasted this, and the complete statement shows a condition of affairs surpassing all expectation. The year 1910 closes with a net surplus of 118,000,000 marks. Of this surplus the sum of 57,500,000 marks represents the income from the various tax schedules, 30,000,000 marks are due to postal and railway balances, and the remainder shows what the economy in expenditure resulting from the new financial system has saved for the treasury. The total surplus will be used to extinguish the deficit inherited from the last year of the Bülow administration, and, in consequence, Germany will see itself this year freed from an incubus which prudent men had thought could not be lifted before the end of 1912. No better evidence is needed of the excellent work accomplished by the unselfish efforts of those party-men who, in 1909, agreed to put aside for a time the conflict of partisan contention and to labor together to bring about financial reforms in the empire. It is at the same time a complete refutation of the claims of the disaffected Liberals who, since 1909, have repeatedly predicted the failure of the plans mapped out to this end by their opponents. Not only have the finances of the empire been firmly established on the new basis, but similar happy results are noted in the reports of the individual kingdoms and states. This point was quite recently strongly emphasized in the speech from the throne marking the opening of the Landtag of Hesse. The Liberal press quite characteristically omits all mention of these facts. The leaders of that press recognize, no doubt, the tremendous blows to their party plans these favorable results of the reform portend. They had intended to make the finance question a chief point in the electoral campaign preceding the approaching elections, but they appreciate how futile would be any reference to the matter now that the official statement presents irrefutable testimony of the success of the reforms established by the Conservative and Centre parties.

Austria-Hungary.—The Christian Social party, despite the overwhelming defeat sustained in the recent elections, is still to be reckoned with in the politics of Austria. In mid-July a mass-meeting, attended by 10,000 men, was held in the great assembly hall of the municipal building in Vienna. The principal speaker was the popular leader of Lueger's old party, Prince Alois Lichtenstein. That he was not dismayed by the late reverses was clear from the virile note characteristic of his utterance. After briefly referring to the causes leading up to the disaster in the elections, and which have been mentioned in AMERICA, Prince Alois said: "A party strong enough to cast 135,000 votes in the face of attacks such as we sustained from false friends and open foes is far from disruption if its members prove loyal to their principle. It is nature's law that the flood tide follows upon the ebb, and the law is true in political life as elsewhere. To be sure, we must align ourselves anew and secure certain imperative conditions if we purpose to restore our party to its old place of honor and wrest new victories from the enemy. We need a strong organization in Vienna, one knit together by enduring bonds, one, too, that shall be elastic enough in its spreading influence to welcome into its membership every element that makes for the attainment of our Christian Social policy. Our organization must, however, pitilessly exclude those who are disloyal and disaffected and ready treacherously to abandon the cause when the fight is on. We must assimilate and eliminate. We need a strong, influential press. Our representatives in parliament must have full freedom of action, their one purpose must be to safeguard in legislation the weal of our Catholic people. We have in mind no mere factional opposition, but we do mean to play the game with a free hand, independent alike of Government and of entangling alliances with other parties, who may be inclined to use our strength to favor their own cause only to leave us in the lurch when our interests clash with theirs. Only thus shall we show our people that recent reverses have not cooled our enthusiasm and have not sapped our strength."

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The "Encyclopædia Britannica"

III.

Tactlessness seems to be one of the features of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." Its editor has communicated to one of his subscribers that we are vexed because the article on the Jesuits was not "sufficiently eulogistic." A copy of the letter is before us.

The editor is evidently unaware that the Society of Jesus is sufficiently known both in the Church and the world not to need a monument in the graveyard of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." Not the humblest Brother in the Order expected anything but calumny and abuse when he saw appended to the article the initials of the well-known assassins of the Society's reputation. Not one was surprised, much less displeased, at the absence of eulogy, sufficient or otherwise; but, on the contrary, they were all amazed to find the loudly trumpeted commercial enterprise, which had been so persistently clamorous of its possession of the most recent results of research in every department of learning, endeavoring to palm off on the public such shopworn travesties of historical and religious truth. The editor is mistaken if he thinks they pouted. Old and scarred veterans are averse to being patted on the back by their enemies.

It is not, however, the ill-judged gibe that has compelled us to resume the pen as much as the suspicion that the editor of the Encyclopædia seems to fancy that we had nothing to say beyond calling attention to his dilapidated bibliography, which he labels with the very offensive title of "the bibliography of Jesuitism"—a term which is as incorrect as it is insulting, or that we merely objected to the employment of two dead and discredited witnesses to tell the world what kind of an organization the Society is.

It may be, moreover, that we misjudged a certain portion of the reading public by treating the subject so lightly, and as the Encyclopædia is continually reiterating the assertion that it has no "bias" and that its statement of facts is purely "objective," a few concrete examples of the opposite kind of treatment—the one commonly employed—may not be out of place.

We are told, for instance, that "the Jesuits had their share, direct or indirect, in the embroiling of States, in concocting conspiracies and in kindling wars. They were responsible by their theoretical teachings in theological schools for not a few assassinations" (340). "They powerfully aided the revolution which placed the Duke of Braganza on the throne of Portugal, and their services were rewarded with the practical control of ecclesiastical and almost civil affairs in that kingdom for nearly one hundred years" (344). "Their war against the Jansenists did not cease till the very walls of Port Royal were demolished in 1710, even to the very abbey church itself, and the bodies of the dead taken with every mark of insult from their graves and literally flung to the dogs to devour" (345). "In Japan the Jesuits died with their converts bravely as martyrs to the Faith, yet it is impossible to acquit them of a large share of the causes of that overthrow" (345). "It was about the same time that the grave scandal of the Chinese and Malabar rites began to attract attention in Europe and to make thinking men ask seriously whether the Jesuit missionaries in those parts taught anything which could fairly be called Christianity at all" (348). "The political schemings of Parsons in England was an object lesson to the rest of Europe of a restless ambition and a lust of domination which were to find many imitators" (348). "The General of the Order drove away six thousand exiled Jesuit priests from the coast of Italy, and made them pass several months of suffering on crowded vessels at sea to increase public sympathy, but the actual result was blame for the cruelty with which he had enhanced their misfortunes" (346). "Clement XIV, who suppressed them, is said to have died of poison, but Tanucci and two others entirely acquit the Jesuits." "They are accountable in no small degree in France, as in England, for alienating the minds of men from the religion for which they professed to work" (345).

Very little of this can be characterized as "eulogistic," especially as interwoven in the story are malignant insinuations, incomplete and distorted statements, suppressions of truth, gross errors of fact, and a continual injection of personal venom which makes the argument not an "unbiased and objective presentment" of the case, but the plea of a prejudiced prosecuting and persecuting attorney endeavoring by false testimony to convict before the bar of public opinion an alleged culprit, whose destruction he is trying to accomplish with an uncanny sort of delight.

But the reputation of the Society is of absolutely no account in comparison with the integrity and correctness of the truth taught by the Catholic Church, and the Encyclopædia's offenses in that respect are the principal feature of our indictment.

We have already adduced a sufficiently long list of transgressions of that kind which reveal the rancor and ignorance of many of the writers hired by the Encyclopædia to enlighten the world on topics which they have the audacity and folly to proclaim they know better than we ourselves. Two others that we have stumbled on in preparing this article occur to us, which we merely refer to in passing. One is positively repulsive. It is on "Ab-lutions," which the writer characterizes as "cathartic" in their purposes, the virtue of the water being enhanced by incantations of a divine or magical power. Another is on "Sacrament," in which we are told that "all will admit who study the post-Nicene Church that the Christian sacraments have stolen the clothes of the pagan mysteries; a wholesale theft feasible especially in an age in which the sacerdotal class wished to be preeminent, and left nothing undone to enhance in the eyes of the multitude the importance and solemnity of rites which it was their prerogative to administer." These are merely two more specimens of the Encyclopædia's gruesome taste, and we consign them to the Chamber of Horrors with the rest that we have noticed in our second article. Our purpose now is to point out the fundamental untruthfulness on which the "Encyclopædia Britannica" is built.

We read in the letter before us: "Extreme care was taken by the editors, and especially by the editor responsible for the theological side of the work, that every subject, either directly or indirectly concerned with religion, should as far as possible be objective and not subjective in their presentation."

"As a matter of fact, the majority of the articles on the various Churches and their beliefs were written by members within the several communions, and, if not so written, were submitted to those most competent to judge, for criticism and, if need be, correction."

Without animadverting on the peculiar use of the English language by the learned English editor who tells us that "every subject" should be "objective" in their presentation, we do not hesitate to challenge absolutely the assertion that "the majority of the articles on the various Churches were written by members within the several communions, and if not so written were submitted to those most competent to judge, for criticism, and, if need be, for correction." Such a pretense is simply amazing, and thoroughly perplexed, we ask:

What are we supposed to understand when we are informed that "as a matter of fact the majority of the articles on the various Churches and their beliefs were written by members within the several communions"?

Was the article on "The Roman Catholic Church" written by a Catholic? Was the individual who accumulated and put into print all those vile aspersions on the Popes, the saints, the sacraments, the doctrines of the Church, a Catholic? Were the other articles on "Casuistry," "Celibacy," "St. Catherine of Sienna" and "Mary," the Mother of God, written by a Catholic? The supposition is simply inconceivable, and it calls for more than the unlimited assurance of the Encyclopædia to compel us to accept it.

But "they were submitted to the most competent judge for criticism and, if need be, for correction." Were they submitted to any judge at all, or to any man of sense, before they were sent off to be printed and scattered throughout the English speaking world? Is it permissible to imagine for a moment that any Catholic, and we presume they are the only competent judges of Catholic matters, could have read some of those pages and not have been filled with horror at the multiplied and studied insults to everything he holds most sacred in his religion? Or did "the editor responsible for the theological side of the work" reserve for himself the right to reject or accept whatever recommended itself to his superior judgment?

Far from being just to Catholics, Catholics are pointedly and persistently discriminated against in this Encyclopædia.

Why, for instance, is the article on the Episcopalians assigned to the Rev. Dr. D. D. Addison, Rector of All Saints, Brookline, Mass.; that on Methodists to the Rev. Dr. J. M. Buckley, Editor of the Christian Advocate, New York; that on the Baptists to the Rev. Newton Herbert Marshall, Baptist Church, Hampstead, England; that on the Jews to Israel Abrahams, formerly President of the Jewish Historical Society and now Reader on Talmudic and Rabbinic Literature in Cambridge, and so on for Presbyterians, Unitarians, Lutherans, etc., but when there is question of the Catholic Church, the greatest, the oldest, the most universal, the most venerable, the most influential Church in Christendom, how does it happen that not only its history, but its theology is tossed over to the tender mercies of the man in the street, the Viscount St. Cyres, who is neither a theologian, nor a cleric, nor even a Catholic, and is not known outside of his little London coterie? Was there no one in the whole Catholic Church who had sufficient knowledge of the subject or who could be trusted to present it?

But you forget we are told by the editor that Father Braun, S.J., has assisted us in our article on "Vestments," and that Father Delehaye, S.J., has contributed, among other articles, those on "The Bollandists" and "Canonization." Abbé Boudinhon and Mgr. Duchesne, and Luchaire and Ludwig von Pastor and Dr. Kraus have also contributed, and Abbot Butler, O.S.B., has written on the Augustinians, Benedictines, Carthusians, Cistercians, Dominicans and Franciscans, and, finally, "the New Britannica has had the honor of having as a contributor His Eminence James Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop of Baltimore, who has written of the Roman Catholic Church in America."

Well and good! But, after all, it was not a very generous concession to let Father Joseph Braun, S.J., Staats-examen als Religionsoberlehrer für Gymnasien, University of Bonn, assist the editors in the very safe article on "Vestments," nor to let the Bollandists write a column on their publication, which has been going on for three or four hundred years. The list of those who wrote on the "Papacy" is no doubt respectable in ability if not in number, but we note that the editor is careful to say that the writers of that article were "principally" Roman Catholics.

Again we are moved to ask why should a Benedictine, distinguished though he be, have assigned to him the history of the Augustinians, Franciscans, Dominicans, etc.? Were there no men in those great and learned orders to tell what they must have known much better than even the erudite Benedictine? Nor will it avail to tell us that His Eminence of Baltimore wrote "The History of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States," when that article comprises only a column of statistics, preceded by two paragraphs, one on the early missions, and the other on the settlement of Lord Baltimore. No one more than the illustrious and learned Churchman would have resented calling such a mere compilation of figures a "History of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States," and no one would be more shocked than he by the propinquity of his restricted article to the prolix and shameless one to which it is annexed.

Here we drop the subject. The Encyclopædia is not a trustworthy guide for Protestants or others who wish to be informed about the history and teaching of the Catholic Church; while its constant manifestation of ignorance on essential points, its unconscious and unconquerable arrogance—the result of centuries of assumed racial superiority; its frequently unveiled contempt of the usages, rituals and sacramental agencies not only of Catholicism but of Christianity, combined with the absence in many of its writers of any knowledge above material things and a deplorable dullness of vision in what pertains to the spiritual world, will always make of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" a most exasperating book for Catholics of every degree. We trust that the editors may be wiser when they plan a new edition.

Editor of AMERICA.

The Catholic Press

I.

A feature of this year's convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies will be the meeting of Catholic editors, to whom the last two days of the sessions have been assigned. This has suggested as appropriate a brief review of the state of the Catholic Press throughout the world.

What we call the press, taken to include newspapers and periodical literature, has been, strange to say, a rather slow development following the invention of printing. In England the first news-pamphlets appeared about the middle of the seventeenth century, and the first literary periodical in the year 1680, more than two centuries after William Caxton had set up a printing press of his own at Westminster. Germany, first in the introduction of printing, is likewise the first that can boast of regular publications in the form of sheets or broadsides, as they were called, dealing with political or religious events. These can be traced back to 1493, one year after the discovery of the Western World.

The only thorough method by which an historian of any European country can arrive at an accurate and unbiased understanding of any period for a long time, after the first type was set by Gutenberg, is by combining into one picture the varied information gleaned from pamphlets and treatises on the secular and religious education of the people, on science and philosophy and on the condition of agriculture, industry, trade and capital, and then, as far as possible, supplementing and completing the picture by a personal study of authentic records whether printed or in manuscript. This is the method adopted with such happy results by Johannes Janssen, who begins his "History of the German People" with the spread of the art of printing, by which the Germans may be said practically to have controlled the whole intellectual market of civilized Europe.

But such a process is necessarily slow and tedious. The historian of the nineteenth century may find all these materials to hand in the daily, weekly, monthly and quarterly issues of the press. So in like manner the history of the Church in the various nations of Christendom and in the missionary fields during the past generation or two may be pieced together from a careful study of the Catholic press, at least wherever the Catholic press has been suffered to exist and to enjoy the liberty accorded the contemporary secular press.

The press of a country is to-day a reflex of the social, economic, political and religious conditions prevailing there. In the matter of religion this statement is true even to the extent that where religion is under a ban or a war of extermination is waged against it, the religious press is unceremoniously and ruthlessly destroyed, as at this moment in Portugal.

The name "Catholic Press" may be employed loosely as signifying the journalistic writings of Catholics in a country where Catholicity is the law of the land, and where it encounters no opposition from hidden or open foes, or it may be used for a distinctive class of publications in which, while keeping themselves informed of the doings of the faithful and of matters which vitally concern their own religious life, Catholics systematically defend their faith or civil rights or the principles underlying Christianity against open and avowed enemies. In this latter sense the Catholic Press may be called militant or combative.

One of the most valuable articles in the eleventh volume, just issued, of "The Catholic Encyclopedia," appears under the title of "Periodical Literature." It is an exhaustive résumé of fifty-seven columns, giving the story of the rise and present position of the Catholic press throughout the civilized world, each country being assigned to writers selected with an eye to their special qualifications for the task. The fact that these summaries were prepared by different men has prevented any one of them from noting general characteristics or specific differences. A synthetic view is wanting which this article attempts to supply.

A comparison of the several European countries will show that the Catholic press of to-day, wherever it is vigorous and energizing, is distinctively militant. This point of general resemblance will hardly escape careful or observant readers, and may go far towards explaining the absence of virility and the half-dead-and-alive character of present newspaper work in some countries. The rise of distinctively Catholic journalism is in nearly every instance coincident either with the emancipation of Catholics from social, political and religious thralldom, or with the necessity Catholics were under to defend their faith or their natural rights from the tyranny of the state or the attacks of their enemies.

About the middle of the last century the religious question became paramount in Belgium. The need was felt of a vigorous defence against irreligion and Freemasonry. Before that time the Catholic press had been languishing because for one reason or another Catholics were divided, and the fact that the people of Belgium were of two races, with different languages, customs and habits, retarded its growth. At length, in the face of grave dangers to the faith, racial dissensions were set aside, and new vigor was infused into Catholic journalism. The Catholic press of Belgium to-day is represented by such dailies as the Gazette de Liège, which has a larger circulation than all the other Liège newspapers put together; the Bien Public, which circulates chiefly among the clergy, and the Patriote, which, with its auxiliary, the National, has a circulation of 180,000. To-day of 86 political daily papers 38 are Catholic, and of the 1,200 Belgian weeklies, more than one-half are under Catholic control. But it is political opposition that makes them live and thrive.

Before the days of Emancipation the Catholic press in England was an impossibility, owing to the educational disadvantages combined with the political disabilities under which Catholics labored for centuries. Nor when a new era dawned was there a sufficiently large reading public to make newspaper or journalistic enterprises self-supporting. Progress of education and the Oxford Movement heralded a change. There was first the Dublin Review, a quarterly started by Cardinal Wiseman and Daniel O'Connell in 1836; then Dolman's Magazine, a monthly, in 1840, and in the same year the London Tablet, which survives to-day. The London Universe was founded in 1860. At that time the secular press was pouring out a flood of calumny against the Holy See, and Cardinal Wiseman called on the St. Vincent de Paul Society "to do something to answer those frightful calumnies." The London Universe was undertaken by a committee of the Society, and it was the first Catholic penny paper in England to meet with permanent success. Quite recently it celebrated its fiftieth anniversary. The Catholic Times, founded by the late Father James Nugent, of Liverpool, in 1867, is to-day the most widely circulated Catholic paper in England and a credit to Catholic journalism. It appeals largely to the Catholics of Irish descent in England, and has always championed the Nationalist cause. A remarkable development of the Catholic press in England is The Catholic Herald of London, which has thirty-two other local weekly issues in various towns of England, Wales and Scotland. The Catholic daily has not yet been considered seriously.

Across the Channel the Gazette de France, first a weekly, appeared in 1631, and it became a daily in 1792. In 1701 the Jesuits were in the field with the famous Journal de Trevoux, which they maintained successfully until legislated out of corporate existence nearly three-quarters of a century later. The year 1833 saw the establishment of the greatest of Catholic papers, the Univers religieux, politique, scientifique et littéraire, with its motto: "Unity in what is certain, liberty in what is doubtful, charity, truth, impartiality in all." Founded by the Abbé Migne, the Univers was the first really serious attempt at Catholic journalism in France, and it owes its origin to the determination on the part of the staunch defenders of Catholicity to counteract the influence of two contemporaneous publications of Gallican tendencies. To it Louis Veuillot, the lay Tertullian of the nineteenth century, as he has been called, one of the foremost defenders of the Church as a political journalist in these latter days, contributed his first article in 1839. He became its editor in 1844. For years the Univers carried on a noble fight for liberty of instruction, and it had the honor of being suppressed by imperial decree in 1860 for being loyal to Rome or Ultramontane. But it came to life again in 1867 to continue the fight for the Holy See, and to prepare the way for the Vatican Council which dealt the death blow to Gallicanism a few years later. At the present day the two representative Catholic journals of Paris are the Univers and La Croix. By a process not unfamiliar to Americans La Croix does service for about one hundred papers of the same name, partly local and partly general in character. Three Catholic journals in the North of France have a combined circulation of 170,000, and it will be news for many that for the whole country there is a Catholic telegraphic Press Agency, established in 1905, which is to-day supplying the news for about one hundred Catholic newspapers. We are not mentioning the great variety and the bewildering array of reviews on philosophy, literature, history, science and the interesting problems of religious knowledge.

The Catholic press of Germany affords, perhaps, the best illustration of what is meant by vigorous or militant Catholic journalism. Here, too, as in other countries, it is in its perfected form a product of the nineteenth century, and again is in the main a direct outcome of the struggle on the part of Catholics for freedom in matters directly concerning their faith, the education of their children and the untrammelled government of the Church. Until 1848 under the severe censorship of the Government the Catholic press did not prosper. However, despite the dominant influence of Protestantism and the prevailing humanitarian philosophy of the second and third decades of the nineteenth century, the oldest of the periodicals, the Tübingen Theological Quarterly, was founded in 1819, and is still an honor to high class periodical literature. The Katholik, too, since 1821, has steadily adhered to its aim to offer "the necessary opposition to the attacks against the Church by orthodox articles on the doctrines of faith and morals, Church history and liturgy, the training of children, devotional exercises by the people and all that belongs to the Catholic Faith." Passing over earlier and important Catholic journals, it is since the era of the Kulturkampf (1875) that the Catholic press of Germany has steadily grown. The number of Catholic periodicals in Prussia alone amounted in 1870 to 49; in 1900 to 270, and it has steadily increased since. As to the present condition of the Catholic press in the Fatherland, 278 daily newspapers beside 314 issued every week or oftener, spread before their readers the political news with the comments thereon of their Catholic editors. We cease to wonder at the strength of the German Centre Party when we see the support they get from their own press and reflect that the total issue for one month of all these papers is approximately 2,500,000 copies. Add to this the 300 Catholic periodicals strictly so called with their 5,000,000 subscribers, and one may well gasp at the marvelous religious activity displayed by the Catholic body in the foremost Protestant nation of the twentieth century. The position of the Catholic Press in other countries is reserved for a future article.

"God Save the King" Amended

The British public confesses that the second stanza of its national anthem is scandalous. It runs as follows:

"O Lord, our God, arise!
Scatter his enemies,
And make them fall!
Confound their politics!
Frustrate their knavish tricks!
On Thee our hopes we fix!
God save us all!"

This, all agree, is disrespectful to other nations—why should Englishmen pray God to confound foreign politics, German, for instance, or stigmatize Russian statecraft as "knavish tricks"—and its tone is too bellicose for these times when men dream of universal peace. Fifty years ago the English conscience was still slumbering, and Tennyson could use language as vigorous as the above, with regard to Napoleon III. It is now awake and suggests that the offensive stanza be replaced by this, attributed to Dean Hole:

"O Lord, our God, arise!
Scatter his enemies!
Make wars to cease!
Keep us from plague and death!
Turn all our woes to mirth!
And over all the earth
Let there be peace!"

It is not high-class literature; but, in contrast with the other, it seems to roar "as gently as any sucking dove." Nevertheless, its author has fallen into the common fault of clergymen of the Church of England, the ignoring of false principles while trying to smooth over their logical consequences. The objectionable stanza offends, not because it is discourteous and even overbearing, but because it is blasphemous; the blasphemy is particularly in the first two lines, and these the substitute stanza retains. They are clearly an accommodation of the first verse of the sixty-seventh psalm: "Let God arise, and let His enemies be scattered." This text was Cromwell's war cry against the Scots, as he saw the morning sun shine blood-red through the mist at Dunbar; and it is worth noting that "God save the King," coming into use at the time of the Stuart rising of 1745, took up Cromwell's cry against the Scots rallying around their rightful prince. Cromwell was a fanatic, and he had persuaded himself that the Scottish Presbyterians of the League and Covenant were the enemies of God, whose chosen instrument he was for their destruction. The English of the middle eighteenth century had no such excuse. Yet the accommodation is justifiable only in the supposition that the House of Hanover was as the House of David, and the House of Stuart, worse than that of Saul; and, afterwards, that the English were God's peculiar people, and Frenchman and Russian, as the Canaanite and the Philistine. But if all this be granted, the rest of the stanza would be unexceptionable. Unlike the new one, its unity is absolute; and it would have been eminently proper to call on God to confound his enemies' designs, and to term Stuart plots and French or Russian machinations "knavish tricks." Indeed, as regards the former, the term would have had a special propriety. The Stuarts were Catholic. The plots for their restoration, therefore, might have been viewed as, in some sense, popish plots; and to zealots for the Protestant successions popery was knavery. So true was this, that some sang indifferently, "knavish tricks" or "popish tricks."

In keeping to the first two lines the new stanza clings to the blasphemous principle. Its author would, most probably, have disowned the idea of any close connection between them and the third. Still, taking the words as they are, one must see that the cessation of war, for which they pray, is to be brought about by the perfect triumph of England's arms; for he would find it hard to interpret the petition, "scatter his enemies" to mean, not "destroy them in battle," but, "gather them together to a Peace Congress, in which England shall have everything its own way." Below the surface, therefore, lurks the old idea that England is God's people, that its cause is His, and that He must fight its battles and give it the victory. This is confirmed by the line: "Turn thou our woes to mirth," which, at least, suggests the English prayerbook version of the one hundred and twenty-fifth psalm: "When the Lord turned again the captivity of Sion, then were we like to them that dream. Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with joy." We may be told that this is a post-exilic psalm referring to a peaceful return from Babylon. Be this as it may, the popular mind makes no such distinctions. For it the turning of Sion's captivity is always a warlike operation, and the great things done by the Lord for his people, mean their deliverance by "the sword of the Lord and Gideon." The modern English may think they have got rid of the notion of their relations with heaven that, born in the days of Elizabeth, and growing down to the fall of the Commonwealth, was confirmed by many a victory over Catholic France and Spain, but every now and again something like this new stanza shows that it is inveterate. - Peace through the triumph of God's people of England will be no more acceptable to other nations, than the fierce "smite them, hip and thigh" sentiment of the old stanza.

But may we not pray for the exaltation of our own people? To refuse this, would be to run to another extreme. The Englishman, the Frenchman, the American may pray God to grant his native land prosperity in peace and victory in war. But he must do it in the same way that he prays for any temporal blessing. One may pray for wealth, long life, health, success in lawsuits, for anything not wrong in itself, but he must do so in due subjection to God's will, His providence and His justice. He may no more make out the cause of his nation the cause of God, and use the language of scripture to bolster up the idea, than he may make out his own private interests to be such. We might pray in the terms of these stanzas of the English national anthem, for the triumph of the Church, though the Church commends more moderate language to our lips: we should not use them on behalf of the doubtful cause of any temporal power.

Why are not the English content with only one stanza? The first, beginning, "God save our gracious King," has a formula so general, that no fault can be found with it. If they insist on two there is another, sufficiently acceptable, which begins: "Thy choicest gifts." Why use the objectionable one, or try to recast it? The question has an important constitutional bearing which one may divine, who compares the constitutional content of the innocuous first stanza with the scandalous second; and which we may indicate by asking: why is "God save the King" called, not the "Royal Hymn," but the "National Anthem?"

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

IN MISSION FIELDS

THE PORTUGUESE REPUBLIC IN SOUTH AFRICA.

South Africa has begun to feel the effects of the operabouffe revolution that created the Republic in Lisbon, says the Catholic Magazine for South Africa. If the bombastic manifestoes and high-falutin proclamations were only uttered before the footlights, we might grin and enjoy them. But when these clown politicians take to disturbing our country, it is time to protest. We are already suffering some evil effects of the summer madness of Lisbon politicians, and greatly fear that the trouble has only just begun.

From a reliable source we learn that the Portuguese Jesuits, with all their mission helpers, have already left Portuguese territory, and crossed the Luangua River into Northeastern Rhodesia. The Jesuit province in this part of Africa depended upon the College of Campolide, which was the first house attacked by the republican rabble in Lisbon. The chief sites of the East African province were at Quilimane, Shupanga, where Mrs. Livingstone died, Boroma, and lastly Miroor.

The irony of the present position is grim indeed. When Rhodes was making his great advances in 1890 at the expense of the Portuguese, annexing whatever they could not show that they occupied, one of the few effective forces on the Portuguese side were the Catholic missions. These often blocked the way and saved for Portugal the very territories from which the grateful Republicans now eject them. Thus once more do the senseless and narrow politicians who batten on the decay of Portugal prove to be the worst enemies of their country. Great as is the mischief that is being done to the cause of the Faith in these territories, Rhodesia will gain from the new arrangements. It will gain a fine body of Catholic missionaries; but it will also gain a large reinforcement of native laborers, who will doubtless follow the good Fathers who have taught them and cared for them.

Shortly after this news, come tidings of disturbances at Delagoa Bay. For some time past the management of affairs in Lourenço Marques has been in the hands of the ablest men that Portugal has recently produced. Two men especially stood out as capable administrators and officials of large views—Gen. d'Andrade and Mr. Galvão. Both these men have been shelved, and with them a number of capable subordinates whom they had trained. The chief offences they seem to have committed are that they were appointed under the Monarchy, have shown a conciliatory attitude towards the Union, and, in the case of Senhor Galvão, there was the serious crime of going regularly to Mass. No wonder that the secular papers of South Africa, as a whole, have revolted against the treatment that these men have received.

It is becoming clear that the Union will not tolerate much more of this kind of thing. If the dictators who now misgovern Portugal for their own profit cannot find men fit to keep the peace in East Africa, on our own borders, it will doubtless become our duty to police our own borders and to prevent Portuguese canaille from disturbing our trade and peace. In such circumstances patience is a great virtue; but any man can see that there is a limit to all things.

At the present time it is absurd to talk of the wishes of the Portuguese people. That people has no means of making its will felt. Since the revolution the country has been governed by men who usurped their present positions. No attempt has yet been made to call the Cortes together. Most important laws and decrees are being passed and enforced without consulting the people. Drastic legislation regarding marriage, Church and State, the freedom of the press, etc., is being promulgated according to the ideas of a few country attorneys and pedantic professors. As long as this mischief is confined to Portugal it is no direct business of ours.

But we venture to predict that South Africa will not suffer antics like this for long. We have had suffering and dissension enough in our midst, and the present peace has cost us dear. It is not likely that we shall permit reckless politicians in Lisbon to disturb the peace of South Africa. We should prefer that the Portuguese should govern their own colonies. But if they should prove unequal to the tasks it will become our obvious duty to step in and see that order prevails.

CORRESPONDENCE

Portugal's Tottering Republic

MADRID, July 17, 1911.

Both the Government and the press of Spain have begun to feel serious concern about the conduct of that furious virago called by courtesy the Portuguese Republic. The matter demands the attention of statesmen and private individuals alike; for while the Portuguese revolutionists confined their activities to Portuguese territory, Spain could possibly afford to remain calm and undisturbed, but when her frontier is violated and armed Portuguese officials appear on her territory and make arrests (or rather, kidnap people) it is high time for the cabinet and the public in general to show some resentment. No people in Spain are more orderly, peace-loving and even phlegmatic than the Galicians; yet the border towns in the province of Galicia are so overrun by desperate-looking men in the pay of the Portuguese that the good people are in a state of continued alarm. To restore public tranquillity, therefore, as well as to prevent the invasion of Spanish territory, the Government has despatched regular troops of all three branches of the service, namely, infantry, cavalry and artillery, to patrol and guard the border.

The Portuguese Government is hurrying towards bankruptcy. To secure the funds which it needs and must have, it has had recourse to means far more reprehensible than the adeantamentos, or anticipated payments, in the time of the ill-starred Carlos I; for it has made an arrangement with the Bank of Portugal for the emission of such vast quantities of paper money that the currency of the country has depreciated enormously in value. No prophetic mantle is needed to affirm that the microbe which is to bring death to the Portuguese Republic is already developing in financial circles and in commercial houses, where ruin is already almost visible. During the past six months the public revenue from all sources was one million and six hundred thousand dollars less than for the corresponding period of last year; in the port of Lisbon general importations fell behind by about the same sum; and the exportation of cotton was only thirty per cent. of what it was in the former period.

The lessening of the public income would cause no uneasiness if there were a corresponding economy in public expenses, but just the reverse has happened, and hence the country is face to face with an economic inequality which spells failure. The large outlays required to keep up the police force and make the spy system effective, not to mention the expense entailed by the frequent moving of bodies of troops, would be an appreciable drain upon the resources of a rich and flourishing country; but in poor Portugal, where the administration of the public finances has long been so wretched, the cost is not only burdensome, it is killing. The day is not far distant when Europe will intervene, not merely to protect the lives and property of foreigners, but especially to prevent the utter and irreparable collapse of the Portuguese treasury.

In the meanwhile the reign of terror continues. Denunciations of "monarchist conspirators" have filled the prisons with respectable people who never meddled in politics. As might be expected, many a private grudge has been settled by accusing one's enemy of being a "conspirator," for the mere assertion with no attempt at proof has been enough to place the victim behind the bars. Some days ago, for example, the Count of Sant' Eulalia, formerly Portuguese Consul in Chicago, reached Lisbon on the morning mail train. During the journey he had censured the provisional Government. As he was crossing one of the squares of the city a marine charged him with "speaking against the republic," and forthwith led him off to jail, where he was placed in incomunicado. At almost the same time some townspeople of Valença, with nobody's authorization but their own, arrested four ladies and called upon the civil guard to search their house for treasonable documents. The building was ransacked from garret to cellar and the unfortunate ladies were terrified, but no signs of treason were discovered.

Captain Paiva Couceiro is just now the nightmare of the Republicans. He was the royalist hero of the night of October 4, 1910. At the head of his company he went to the palace to defend the king, but he had already left. The captain went on to Cintra and then to Mafra, where Manoel embarked for Gibraltar. Then, and only then, did Couceiro leave Portugal. His absence, however, has not destroyed his prestige, for more than to any other royalist the people look to him for a solution of the present difficulty.

Among the Republicans who have broken definitively with the Braga aggregation Senhor Homen Cristo is one of the most distinguished. The infamies and the abuses of the monarchy drove him into the Republican ranks, where he strove untiringly for the regeneration of his country, which he looked for by the introduction of the Republican régime. But when the Republic came, and, instead of correcting abuses, made them worse and multiplied them, Homen Cristo was so disgusted with the cowardice, the immorality and the despotism of the Portuguese Republic that he resolutely set his face against it. However skilful he may be with weapons, the provisional Government is unquestionably more in fear of his pen than of his sword, as may be gathered from a recent utterance of his which has been pretty generally spread through Portugal: "Undoubtedly, the monarchy committed crimes. Why deny it? The monarchy made tremendous blunders. . . . During the past eight months, for every blunder, every infamy, every crime, every transgression of the monarchist régime, the Republicans have perpetrated a dozen. To arms! This is not a revolution of monarchists against Republicans. It is a revolution of men who do not know whether royal rule will result from their triumph, but who do know, as every sensible person knows, that between the rule of a king and the rule of the lowest ruffian in the ranks of the Carbonari that of a king is to be preferred." These are strong expressions; yet we find much stronger in the same manifesto. Homen Cristo is a cultivated man, a man of great literary ability. What are we to gather from his violent, even savage denunciation of the republic? We are to gather that the numberless outrages perpetrated by the sham republic in the sacred name of liberty have roused him and many others to a wild fury, which he, better than they, can in some way express in words.

A rising of Portugal against the tyrants that throttle it seems inevitable. Even those most devoted to the present régime look for a monarchistic counter-revolution. I am in a position to affirm most positively that there is a perfect understanding between Dom Manoel and Dom Miguel, who realize that in the present crisis the throne is a matter of secondary importance, and that the one all-important matter is the temporal salvation of Portugal. If the republic falls, and fall it must, the first step will probably be to establish a provisional dictatorship, headed by Paiva Couceiro or the Count of Lavradio, who will summon the Cortes and place one of the rivals on the throne. It looks as if there were between them a written pact covering this matter.

There is a perceptible split in the ranks of the provisional Government, the members of which are not in accord on the course to be followed while the republic lasts. There are four aspirants to the dignity of President. One of these is Basilio Telles, a sensible man, who is very generally respected. His election would mean a political defeat for the present Minister of Justice, Affonso Costa, and a corresponding triumph for the Minister of the Interior, Antonio José Almeida.

Tributes to Gaelic Scholarship

DUBLIN, July 25, 1911.

The Dublin Corporation seldom casts a vote in unison, the small Unionist minority feeling bound to oppose the Nationalist majority, and this diversity was further complicated during the King's visit by the capricious action of the Mayor, but it made last Tuesday memorable by attaining complete unanimity. At a special meeting all the Councillors, Nationalist, Unionist and Sinn Féin, united in conferring the Honorary Freedom of the City and County Borough of Dublin on Very Rev. Peter, Canon O'Leary, P.P., Castlelyons, County Cork, and on Dr. Kuno Meyer, Professor of Celtic Philology, Berlin University. In submitting their names Councillor O'Kelly said the increased interest during the last decade in Irish literature, art and industries was particularly striking in the department of Celtic studies, an interest which was as marked in the universities of Germany, France and England as it was in Ireland. No university was now deemed completely equipped without a well endowed chair of Celtic, and this change was effected largely by the numerous German scholars who made themselves masters of Gaelic and expounded to the world the antiquity, richness and variety of Irish literature. In honoring Dr. Meyer Dublin was also paying a tribute of gratitude to them. As to Canon O'Leary, everyone who ever handled a book in Gaelic knew and loved him. His works were the standard by which thousands of young Irish scholars measured their competency in Gaelic, and there was a charm in his writings that made them eager to attain it. It was fitting to bracket these two names together. Dr. Meyer had traced the history of the Irish tongue and the progress of the race from the earliest days to ours; Canon

O'Leary expounded the language of to-day, the pure fountain that flowed from the mouths of the people, to which all must turn who wish to taste of Irish undefiled.

Harmonizing with the nature of the function, the seconders spoke in Gaelic; and it will indicate the progress of the language to note that a considerable number of Dublin's Aldermen speak Gaelic, and not infrequently air it at their meetings. Mr. Cosgrave truly remarked that the German scholars had not merely a book knowledge of Gaelic; they spoke it, having with patient labor acquired it in Irish-speaking districts, thereby setting a great example to Irishmen who were ignorant of their own language. They honored these two ripe scholars because they regarded them essentially as nation-builders, who in stimulating the return to Gaelic speech, were rebuilding the traditions and restoring the habits of thought and speech that had moulded the distinctive character of the Irish race.

The distinction conferred was significant, for the freedom of Dublin has been sparingly voted, and ten years ago none would dream of conferring it for Gaelic scholarship. In the meantime, the movement has spread in every direction; encouraged and blessed by bishops and clergy and sanctioned by the public bodies, it has advanced from the schools to the universities, and now no honor is too great for those who, in its infancy, bore the burden of propaganda.

Of these Canon O'Leary is held in peculiar reverence. Belonging by blood and birth to the Ithian O'Learys of Roscarbery, on the southern borders of Cork and Kerry, the oldest branch of the Gaels that history can trace, Canon O'Leary was reared in a district where Gaelic has never ceased to be the language of the people. When Father O'Growney died and some who were suspect to Catholics became prominent in the movement, Canon O'Leary entered the field and, with the support of many other priests and Catholic laymen, maintained its Catholic character. He had much to do in making Maynooth what it now is, the chief centre and the most active and influential force in the Gaelic movement. When the question of compulsory Gaelic in the University was hotly discussed Canon O'Leary expounded from intimate knowledge the educational value of the language, demonstrating its purity, even as spoken by the peasantry, among whom the literary tradition had never died, in vigorous and idiomatic English; and by his wit, good sense and good temper, he succeeded in converting or silencing his opponents. Besides a long series of articles explaining the niceties of Gaelic idiom, he has written several plays, stories and romances, a book of sermons, and Irish Prose Composition which is accepted as the standard of modern Gaelic; and he has made several translations into Gaelic, among them the Gospels from the Missal and Æsop's Fables. Approaching eighty he is still vigorous, and actively engaged in writing Gaelic "for the glory of God and the honor of Erin."

Dr. Meyer is in one respect the most remarkable of the many foreign scholars who have rendered valuable service to the Gaelic language. Windisch, Zeuss, Zimmer, de Jubainville, Thurneysen were patient investigators and discoverers in grammar and phonetics, but Dr. Meyer's labors led him further than grammar. While teaching German in Liverpool University he acquired a perfect command of English, and having studied book Gaelic for many years and spent his vacations in the Gaelic districts of Ireland, he became equally adept in Gaelic speech. These accomplishments have enabled him to produce classical versions of many a Gaelic fragment of purest poetry, and to prove in essay and lecture that ancient Ireland had a genuine literature with an insight into and a love of nature that none other of that age possessed. His version of the "Vision of MacConglinne" convinced the literary world that, centuries before his time, Ireland had a writer who possessed the genius of Rabelais without his grossness. A long list could be given of Dr. Meyer's collections of early Irish poetry, exquisitely translated and learnedly annotated. He assisted Miss Hull and other translators of the Cuchullin Saga, and as Gaelic Lecturer in the Royal Irish Academy aided and directed many students, native and foreign. The Chair of Celtic in Berlin will give him further leisure to promote the advancement of Gaelic studies, a cause which he has made his own.

While remembering her living scholars, Ireland is not forgetting the dead. There is a monument to the Four Masters in Dublin, but now there is a movement to erect a nobler one in their native Tirconnell. At the great Feis Tirchonnail, opened recently in Donegal, by the ruins of the Franciscan Monastery where the O'Clery brothers wrote their Annals, the immense concourse which had knelt on the open plain while high Mass was celebrated by Dr. O'Donnell of Maynooth, was addressed by Bishop O'Donnell of Raphoe. Recalling the work of the heroic men who, at the risk of their lives, traversed the land in evil days to gather and hand down in noble tomes the glories of the Gael, the bishop bespoke for them a dual monument. Persecution had almost exterminated the Gaelic blood and tongue in the township of Donegal. "But our soil is a generous soil; all settlers soon catch the Irish spirit," and he had no doubt their children will soon have erected a pleasing monument to the noble Four by reechoing around these ruins the language they wrote so well. They should also execute the project of erecting four life-sized figures of the Masters in Donegal granite, surmounting a fountain in the Diamond of Donegal. The men of Donegal alone should do it; and with the assistance of their kin in distant lands he had no doubt they would adequately commemorate the purest and most unselfish patriots of Tirconnell.

While Bishop O'Donnell was speaking in Donegal the Bishop of Kerry was blessing a marble Celtic Cross at Lissanaffrion (The Liss of the Mass), a hillside near Killarney, where Mass was said in penal days when Mass and priest were proscribed. A bishop and two priests were hanged in its neighborhood, and a priest was slain at the altar. The memorial was not directly connected with Gaelic, but the Gaelic prayers were said, and it is to renew the spirit of those days that the clergy are promoting the restoration of the language.

What England's King Can Do

LONDON, July 22, 1911.

England is a strange place just now. A sweeping change is being made in our Constitution and at the same time there is real danger of war crashing out over the Agadir affair, yet the papers are full of the great aeroplane race, as if this were the supremely important question. Frivolity and sport are becoming a danger everywhere. Ninety per cent. of the electors do not take the trouble to be informed of the merits of public questions; elections are decided on catchword cries, and Parliament is muzzled by the party system. The outlook is bad.

The part the King can play in directing events is very large, though not generally understood, as our constitutional system makes it difficult to trace while the events it influences are in progress. These examples occur to me: No dispatch of the Foreign Office can be sent off without the sovereign having seen it and agreed to it. In the famous case of the Trent, When Messrs. Mason and Slidell, the envoys of the Confederacy, were taken from under the British flag by a U. S. cruiser, the Foreign Office drew up a dispatch demanding reparation from Washington. It was a critical moment. On account of the cotton trade of Lancashire there was a strong feeling here for the Confederacy. It was the sovereign that stopped the transmission of this message. Queen Victoria sent the dispatch back to the Foreign Office, with a memorandum that it must not be sent. She pointed out that as it stood it stated the demand, the just demand of the British government in a menacing fashion, such as might provoke any self-respecting government to refuse it at all risks, and then there must be war. The dispatch must be so written, she said, as to leave the way open for an honorable settlement. This was done—the United States accepted the opening left for friendly negotiations, and a great crisis was passed peacefully.

Earlier still, in 1851, when Palmerston broke the rule of the Foreign Office and telegraphed to Paris his congratulations to Louis Napoleon on the coup d'état without consulting the sovereign, Victoria sent a message to the House of Commons dismissing him from office, and another minister took his place.

Again, when the Lords were preparing to reject Gladstone's Bill for the disestablishment of the Protestant Church of Ireland, the Queen's intervention broke up the opposition. The correspondence has been published. She worked it through the Bishops, and especially the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Edward VII personally built up a system of ententes and alliances which is now a main factor in European politics. He was often his own ambassador, and used his knowledge of foreign sovereigns and their ministers to great effect.

Finally, it is an open secret that it was George V that carried the bill for abolishing the sovereign's coronation oath against the Catholic doctrine of the Holy Eucharist. The British sovereign is the President of our "crowned republic," to use Tennyson's phrase, and, standing aside from all parties, is a real factor in the national life.

The National Fine Arts Commission in its report to the Lincoln Memorial Commission, of which President Taft is chairman, recommends that the $2,000,000 monument to the memory of the great war President be placed in Potomac Park, on the bank of the Potomac River. That site was recommended by the Park Commission about ten years ago and was approved by John Hay, then Secretary of State. The Commission also recommends that "to avoid competition with Capitol or the Washington Monument, the Lincoln Memorial should not include a dome and should not be characterized by great height, but by strong horizontal lines." The site approved is about two miles from the capitol and a half mile west of the Washington Monument. There is little doubt the recommendation of the Fine Arts Commission will be carried out.

The Unopened Bible

The Reformers of the sixteenth century were deadly enemies of the Bible, though they professed to base their whole religion on it. Insisting on everyone reading it and guaranteeing that the most ignorant could fathom its profoundest mysteries, they robbed it of all its objective value, for each individual, no matter how incompetent, was permitted to read into it his own sense, thereby leaving it no sense at all. Men who said they were scholars began to pick its text to pieces, discredited its assertions, cast doubt on its authorship and refused to admit in it anything like inspiration. The result is that in spite of the millions of money used by the Bible Societies to multiply its editions and scatter them over the face of the earth, not only the old love and veneration for the Sacred Book has disappeared, but the grossest ignorance of its contents has succeeded to that almost superstitious eagerness to learn the text by heart, which was so noteworthy only a very short time ago.

The latest revelation of this change of attitude among Protestants comes from the University of Michigan, where seventy-eight students were recently subjected to a Biblical examination. The test was not made off-hand, but nearly an hour was allowed to write down the answers. The results were startling. One volunteered the valuable information that the Old Testament was written B. C., the other was not; another affirmed that "the Old Testament represented Hebrew fable," while "the New dealt with historical characters." Another, again that "the Old was composed largely of stories and proverbs, which are not any longer believed to have actually happened." "By the Law," said one wise youth, "is meant the laws given by Christ to his disciples, while the Gospel simply means the Scriptures as taught to the people." We can only quote a few of the hundreds of other ridiculous replies. "The Gospels," for instance, "were the letters which St. Paul wrote to the Churches." "The temple of Solomon was in Babylon." "Sinai was the place of the landing of the Ark, or the mount from which Christ spoke." "Nazarene was the Mother of Christ; Nazareth was his Father." "Levi was a name applied to Jews who were small in stature compared with Leviathan, which meant large." "Levi was a Jewish male; Leviathan a woman." "The Isle of Patmos was the place where the children of Israel were fed in the wilderness." "'Thou art the man,' are words said by Judas to Christ, or by a prophet in his chariot teaching Christianity to the man at his side." "'Before the cock crow thou shalt deny me thrice,' was said by Christ to one of the thieves hanging beside him in the crucifixion." "Abraham was called by God to preach the Gospel." "Jacob's ladder was a vision that Jacob had one night when he slept out-doors near a mountain which looked like a pair of stairs." "The Mess of Pottage referred to the Lord's Supper." "Aaron's rod brought the manna and doves to the ground when the tribes of Israel were without food." "'The thirty pieces of silver' were one of the parables," etc., etc., etc.

The other day the newspapers recorded the fact that Mayor Gaynor in 1897 went to the Public Library of Great Barrington to verify some quotation he wanted to make from the Bible. Much to his surprise he found no Bible there, and he afterwards donated a copy, in which he wrote: "I have found a great many libraries which lacked a great many books, but never before have I found one like this which lacked the Great Book." That was in 1897. In July, 1911, he again visited the library and found that the Bible which he had given so long before, had, according to the papers, never been opened. Evidently, Great Barrington, Mass., can shake hands with Ann Arbor, Mich.

A Calumny and a Fact

Episcopalian clergymen often say, though without a word of truth, that converts to the Catholic Church sometimes continue in the Anglican ministry with the full sanction of the authorities of the Church, in order to work more efficaciously for the conversion of others. This imaginary treachery they blame most vigorously, and, were the facts what they pretend, we should have to hold our tongues under their rebukes, for it would be a flagrant case of doing evil that good might come.

But what converts from Anglicanism do not do, is the practice of some fallen Catholic priests entangled in the heresy of Modernism. They will remain in the Church; they will utter with their lips the oath against their errors, denying it in their hearts; they will say the Mass they do not believe in; they will recite the Creed they reject; they will economize in their speech; they will work secretly, as they can no longer do so openly, to spread their false doctrine. And this conduct is approved by those who are quick to denounce the immorality of the supposed case of the convert clergymen. A well-known Episcopalian weekly, the Churchman, has in its number of July 22 the following:

"The Modernists have chosen the better part, and even if their policy may be charged with tortuousness and secretiveness, it is better for them to practise the virtues of patience than to indulge in the agonies of polemics which would necessarily follow an attitude of open contumacy to the disciplinary regulations of their Communion."

The accomodation of Our Lord's words concerning St. Mary Magdalen savors of blasphemy. The word "disciplinary" is a presumptuous misrepresentation. According to the periodical from which we quote, the Modernists have chosen the better part, because by it they avoid "further sectarian divisions in Christendom," an idea which illustrates curiously the attitude of Episcopalianism towards revealed truth, and its notion of what unity means. According to Luzzi, the Waldensian, an article by whom it gives in full, from the panegyric of which our quotation is taken, they have chosen the better part, because it is the best way "to shake the foundations of the already tottering Colossus." Between the two justifications there is a difference only in words. But, one must ask: Who now holds the infamous principle, "The end justifies the means."

Mexico's Minister of Government

The Mexican Constitution (art. 85) enumerates among the prerogatives of the "Constitutional President of the United Mexican States" that of appointing and removing at will, with no reference to the Congress, any or all of the eight officials who constitute his cabinet. These eight "Secretaries of State" are looked upon as the confidential advisers and assistants of the President; they are directly answerable to him for their conduct, and they continue in office at his pleasure.

The second of these cabinet officers in dignity and precedence is styled ministro de gobernación, which is commonly translated "Minister of the Interior"; but the duties attached to the office make the holder second only to the President in domestic affairs, if, indeed, he is only second.

It is now over twenty years since the Mexican Congress distributed certain executive functions among the members of the cabinet. A glance at the law shows us that the ministro de gobernación, far from confining himself to the prosaic duties of our Secretary of the Interior, exercises very ample authority in matters which, on election day, for example, make success dependent upon his friendship or his honesty. To his department belong, among other things, administrative measures for the observance of the Constitution or for the reform of the same; for safeguarding the civil and political rights of the people; for watching over the public health; for superintending general elections; and, finally, for the granting of amnesty. The power of this department in the Federal District and the Territories is well-nigh absolute, for it includes everything from local elections and city police to lotteries and hospitals.

For the full and proper execution of his varied duties the ministro de gobernación is not dependent upon chance or charity, for he is ex-officio head of the national guard in the Federal District and the Territories, and (what is much more to the purpose) he is in command of the famous rurales throughout Mexico. These rurales, who may be quite properly called "presidential police," owe their existence and their efficiency to Porfirio Diaz. When the great Porfirio came to the throne as Constitutional President, Mexico was suffering from a veritable plague of outlawry. Isolated plantations were attacked and looted, and their owners were carried off for ransom; travelers on the highway were robbed and murdered, and there was no redress; for the bandits dwelt in inaccessible mountain fastnesses, to which they retreated after a successful raid. It was then that Diaz made one of his most telling strokes of policy, for he induced some of the outlaws to accept a safe-conduct and come down from their lairs for a conference. His proposal was strictly on a commercial basis. He learned from them that despite their long days in the saddle and their irregular hours, attended with loss of sleep, their income was not great, and they were often disappointed in their expectations. Diaz offered them shorter hours, steady work and sure pay, if they would help him to put down brigandage! His terms were accepted. Chock-full of the fervor of their recent conversion, they sallied forth in search of their brother knights of the road. "Reform or die!" That was the purport of their message. Those who "reformed" were accepted as recruits for this first detachment of presidential police, the rurales; those that did not reform soon ceased to trouble the weary wayfarer or the lone planter. From such small and lowly beginnings have sprung the rurales, now known all over Mexico (and feared, as well); for, though the charter members have dropped out by this time, their successors are not mere "feather-bed soldiers," but men of daring and self-reliance.

As Minister of Government, Emilio Vásquez Gómez could exert a great deal of influence at the October elections, when his brother Francisco will be one of the candidates for vice-president. It was well that he should resign, even at the command of President De la Barra, for busy tongues would wag, and will wag, over the results of the coming contest. Incidentally, it seems clear that the revolutionists are not in the full and perfect enjoyment of complete ascendancy in the Mexican cabinet.

The Minister of Government has resigned. Upon his successor depends the fate of the candidates in the coming presidential election.

Possible Plan for Religious Training in Schools

Shrewd observers see in the tendency of Protestant sects of to-day to unite with one another in divine worship encouraging signs of the solution of the Catholic school question. In our small towns, as is well known, it is becoming the custom for Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists and Congregationalists to secure at a good salary a capable preacher who will take care in his stirring moral discourses to say nothing of a doctrinal nature that can offend any of his hearers. Then all the Protestant churchgoers of the town flock to a union chapel to hear a good sermon. Now, many thoughtful non-Catholics, who see how very inadequate one hour's Sunday school is for preserving in the hearts of their little ones even the bare essentials of Christianity, view with almost as much alarm as we the paganizing of our public schools. While these men realize the need there of religious instruction of some kind, they see with equal clearness that, as a rule, it cannot be given nowadays without invading many children's rights of conscience.

So, they, too, would doubtless be glad to establish a system of denominational schools if they could hope to secure for them State support. It is, of course, out of the question, however, that a separate school for each sect should be maintained with public money, especially where their numbers are few. But if several varieties of Protestant denominations could agree on some scheme of daily religious instruction at school, as they have already united with one another in their church services, perhaps our voters and legislators would see their way to granting these denominational schools for their support a portion of the town or city revenues, according to a per capita rate. But it is plain that this could not be justly or consistently done unless the same concessions were made to Catholics, and if need be, to Jews, though many of the latter, along with numerous families with no particular religious affiliations, would doubtless continue to send their children to the public or "undenominational" schools.

In this way the ancient wrong that the Church in the United States is so patiently bearing in paying a double school-tax could easily be righted, to the satisfaction of all parties and to the manifest advantage of the State, for religion would again hold a place of honor in her system of education, and the clouds of anarchy and infidelity that are already lowering over our land would be scattered forever. But with the knowledge that Catholics would be the first to benefit by such an arrangement, would Protestants be ready to further the movement? Would their hereditary distrust of the Church keep them from taking a step which, though it benefited them immensely, would at the same time be of incalculable advantage to her, or would they be large-minded enough to share with her, "for sectarian purposes," some of the school fund to which both Catholics and Protestants now contribute? It is difficult to say.

However, the union of Protestant churches is an object for which we might profitably offer our prayers.

Europe and America

It would be a holy and a wholesome procedure for the politicians of Portugal, Italy and France to glance from time to time at the American papers. Their consciences, if there be any left, might suffer an occasional twinge, or light at least might penetrate their dull minds.

While they are ignominiously driving everything that savors of Catholicity out of their sight, and when even a Little Sister of the Poor rises before them as an obsession, here in this country, where genuine Republicanism reigns, Catholics in every grade of society, if they have the ability, are always able to secure recognition. Thus a Protestant President did not hesitate to confer the greatest possible honor in his gift on a practical and ardent Catholic, by making him Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. In the same spirit the American Medical Association, which this year held its annual meeting in San Francisco, elected as its President, Dr. John B. Murphy, a Professor at the Northwest University of Chicago. Dr. Murphy is a Catholic, and one of his greatest interests is the Mercy Hospital of Chicago, which is in charge of the Sisters of Mercy. The eloquence with which on the occasion of his election he denounced "the irregularities, immoralities and crimes which have crept into the practice of medicine" must have sent a thrill of enthusiasm through the hearts of the eminent men who listened to his burning words.

Coincidentally with this tribute to the scientific prominence of this Catholic physician comes the notice in a non-Catholic paper of what the writer calls a "shrine to which physicians go as pious pilgrims" from all the world over to see the two brothers, the Doctors Mayo, at their wonderful surgical operations, in the course of which, we are told, the modesty of the great men is as remarkable as their extraordinary science. They are not Catholics, but the chosen scene of their devoted labors is a Catholic hospital, around whose wards flit the blessed forms of the Franciscan Sisters. Our conception of things in America differs from those that prevail just now in some countries of Europe.

Sabotage

As everyone knows, a sabot is the clumsy wooden shoe commonly worn by the peasants and workingmen in France. Even President Fallières, who is a peasant, wears sabots, not, of course, on the boulevards of Paris, but on his farm. It is an inhuman kind of footgear, and as it is so rigid and unyielding that it crushes everything it treads upon. Possibly that is the reason why the method now resorted to of crushing the Government is called sabotage; that is to say, the systematic and politically devised destruction of public and private property by those who are entrusted with its care. It is raging fiercely all through France at the present time. "Not a day passes," says the New York Tribune, "but that a dozen acts of destruction are reported on the railways. Rails are torn up; blocks of stones or sleepers are put on the tracks; signal boxes are damaged; telegraph lines are entangled or cut; attempts are made by means of secret emissaries of the Labor Federation, and by the anti-militarist propaganda, controlled by the Federation, to seduce the soldiers from their allegiance, and to make common cause with the strikers. According to official statistics no less than three thousand attempts have been made since October to wreck trains," and perhaps that is a thousand or more below the real figure. Between the Morocco imbroglio and this internal riot the decent people in France do not know where to turn. They are asking: Is the Reign of Terror to come again?

What adds to the alarm is that a certain number of newspapers are applauding these outrages, while Jaurès and his followers are clamoring in Parliament for the restoration of these destructive strikers to their former employment. The law allots severe enough penalties for such acts, but there is no strong man to put the law into execution. Briand tried it and he was flung out of power. Now the ciphering and elusive Caillaux is to have his chance, but the people are asking if the man whose only ability hitherto has been to squeeze money out of the nation by ingenious and multiplied taxation can be enough of a Napoleon to quell this universal mob? He will soon have his chance. If he fails he will make one more of the line of ghosts that appear and disappear from the stage of French politics. Meantime, it must be a most uncomfortable country to live in, and if something is not done soon there will be no need of another German invasion. The poor nuns who were exiled may thank God that they were driven out of the country before the orgies of blood and rapine succeed the horrors of sabotage. France is committing suicide.

The Devil's Baptism

The devil has been always aping the works of the Almighty. The latest instance of it occurred a short time ago in the City Hall of Mâcon, in France, when His Honor the Mayor, as the High Priest of the occasion officiated at what he called a Civil Baptism.

For a perfervid Gaul, whose imagination can generally be relied on for something original in wickedness, it was a fine chance to hit upon a particularly striking and novel device to vent his hatred, but this baptism in Mâcon's City Hall was nothing but a parody, a plagiarism, a travesty of Catholic Baptism, whose ceremonies have been familiar to every Frenchman from the time of Clovis.

The unfortunate baby chosen to be the victim of this incantation was addressed by the Mayor in this fashion:

"Marie Philibert Sevè, daughter of Louis Sevè and Philomène Carcosset, gardeners of Flacé, welcome to the great family of those who are freed from the trammels of religious dogma."

Why "Marie" of all names? That was surely an oversight, but poor Marie was unconscious of what was going on, and the man with the official scarf, which no doubt did service for a stole, proceeded: "In the name of the universal principles of Freethought; in the name of the Glorious Revolution of 1789; in the name of the lay and democratic French Republic, I baptize thee." The formula was evidently a substitute for the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost. Freethought, Revolution and French Republic is the new trinity which the Government bestows on the people.

Then follows an injunction to the baby "to honor her father and mother, to sustain truth and justice and not to injure her neighbor"—another bald copy of the words used by the priest when he puts the lighted candle in the hands of the sponsors and places the white robe on the child. But the most ridiculous feature of the comedy was that, though the great official declared that he baptized, there was no ablution. Possibly it was because the devil can't help lying, or it may be because of his known dislike for holy water.

On the whole it was a very sad and stupid farce, while being at the same time outrageously and intentionally blasphemous. Poor Marie, the gardener's daughter, has to grow up in a hotbed of everything that is rank and bad. It is not likely that she will honor her father and mother, love justice and truth, and do no injury to anybody after making such a bad start in life. She may figure later on the barricades.

At the last session Congress voted the sum of $200,000 to erect a fitting memorial in honor of Commodore Perry for his victory on Lake Erie. Everyone knows how the hero announced the result of the battle to General Harrison: "We have met the enemy and they are ours", but few are aware of the deeply religious tone of his official letter to the Secretary of the Navy, William Jones. It is dated "U. S. Brig Niagara, off the Western Sister, Head of Lake Erie, Sept. 10, 1813; 4 p. m.", and runs as follows:

"Sir: It has pleased the Almighty to give to the armies of the United States a signal victory over their enemies on this lake. The British squadron, consisting of two ships, two brigs, one schooner and one sloop, have this moment surrendered to the force under my command, after a sharp conflict."

The first lines of Perry's letter ought to be cut into the monument, as an intimation to those who need it that a man can be at the same time religious and heroic. It is an answer to that other fighter who said that victory rested with those who had the heaviest artillery.

LITERATURE

The French Revolution. By HILAIRE BELLOC. New York: Henry Holt and Co. (Home University Library.) 75 cents net.

L'Assemblée Constituante. GUSTAVE GAUTHEROT. Paris: G. Beauchesne & Cie.

Partly French by blood and training, a past member of the French army and of the British Parliament, a stout champion of the Catholic religion and of republican institutions, and a deep student of the period, as is evidenced in his "Danton," "Robespierre" and "Marie Antoinette," Mr. Belloc is peculiarly fitted to disentangle the perplexing problems of the French Revolution and trace the conditions that produced them and flowed from them. Starting with the assumption that "a political community pretending to sovereignty derives the civil and temporal authority of its laws not from its actual rulers, nor even from its magistracy, but from itself," and "that the ultimate authority in any act is God—or, if the name God sound unusual in an English publication to-day, then 'moral sense'"—he adopts the general theory of Rousseau's "Contrat Social," and excessively eulogizes it, overlooking the many unsound views of that remarkable document.

However, the Equality of Man, "the vision of which was the flame and excitant of French Republican energy," and which "found its noblest expression in the American Declaration of Independence," is, rightly understood, a thoroughly Catholic doctrine, and the representative system, which is the inadequate modern expression of it, "had been designed under the influence of the Church, and especially of the monastic Orders, who invented it in the Middle Ages." In Spain, where the first experiments were made, it became constitutionally vital, locally and nationally. "In England Representation, vigorous as everywhere else in the true Middle Ages, narrowed and decayed at their close, till in the seventeenth century it became a mere scheme for aristocratic government. The nation had forgotten democracy as completely as it had forgotten the religion and the old ideals of the Middle Ages."

In France it had fallen into disuse for two centuries, but an active memory of it remained. Used as a check on the French Monarchy, "the function of this ancient Christian institution was to initiate a national policy in critical moments, but more generally to grant taxes." In 1789 it existed in the United States only, where, among other radical differences, there was no ancient central constitution, nor Crown nor Custom of the City. In France the elective machinery was untried, and a radical fault of the revolutionaries was to regard its permanent use in all matters "as something sacred to, and normal in, the Democratic State." The result of this deification of the elective system is that "in all parliamentary countries to-day a few intriguers are the unworthy depositaries of power, and by their service of finance permit the money-dealers to govern us all." On this point Mr. Belloc is in agreement, though from different premises, with the conclusions of Sir William Butler's Autobiography.

For the better understanding of the Revolution, its chief characters are vividly sketched: the King and Queen, Mirabeau, La Fayette, Dumouriez, Marat, Danton, Carnot and Robespierre. A mild attempt to whitewash the latter two only dyes them darker. Robespierre, it appears, was privately opposed to the Massacres while publicly promoting them, and Carnot was willing to let them go to any length as long as others assumed the responsibility. His characterization of Marat applies to most of the revolutionaries, and to not a few of the "muck-raking" reformers of our times: "The condemnation under which Marat justly falls does not attach to the patent moral truths he held, but to the manner in which he held them. He not only held them isolated from other truths—it is the fault of the fanatic, so to hold truth—but he held them as if no other truth existed;" and when his ideal would not work he at once sought a scapegoat. "He worked with his creed as a madman who is mad on collectivism or the rights of property might work in our society, thinking of his one thesis, shrieking and foaming at the mouth upon it, losing all control when its acceptance was not even opposed but merely delayed."

The phases of the Revolution and its military sequel—here the author's army experiences serve him well—are admirably set forth in one-half of the 260 pages, but the chapters dealing with the principles of the Revolution and their relation to the Church are particularly worthy of study, as they have a direct bearing on living problems of to-day. Mr. Belloc holds "there was no necessary and fundamental quarrel between the doctrines of the Revolution and those of the Catholic Church"; that no one can point out a doctrine essential to the revolutionary theory which is opposed to Catholic dogma or morals. But the Revolution in action was quite another matter, and with that the conditions of the time had much to do.

There were in France a million wealthy and influential Huguenots eager to throw their influence against the Church which they blamed for filching them of their privileges. The Church itself was Gallican, and "set its intimate attachment to the political structure of the State far beyond the sanctity of Catholic dogma or the practice of Catholic morals." Court bishops, not a few unsound in faith and disedifying in their lives, were concerned not to defend the Church itself but only the method of its existence. Witty diatribes and weighty attacks on religion were allowed wide latitude, and seldom provoked effective reply, but disrespect to Church dignitaries was promptly punished. As Church organism grew more and more official the instruction and maintenance of the lower clergy were neglected, the towns lost touch with it, and the uninstructed artisans and the sceptical middle and upper classes seldom went to Mass. Of the educated classes, we are assured, there are five sincere Catholics in France to-day for one before the Revolution.

The Church was in a swoon; the revolutionists, having grown up without respect or love for it, thought it was dying, regarded it as a State organism only, and proceeded to use it as such. Moreover, it had much property, was unpopular in many places, and the State, needing money, found it easiest to plunder. Then followed the Civil Constitution of the Clergy which, making the Clerical Oath the test of democracy, lit civil war, led to the great persecution, and dug the pit which divided Catholicism from the Revolution and divides it still. The effect of this Oath, which no loyal priest could accept, was to brand the cassock as the badge of a traitor. But the National Assembly was wrong; the Church was not dying: "The Catholic Church is an organism that fructifies and expands under the touch of a lethal weapon; it has at its very roots the conception that material prosperity is stifling to it, poverty and misfortune nutritious." It refused, as its principles required, "to admit a superior external power which, in practice, would make of it what other State religions of Christendom have become."

Mr. Belloc has won the ear of the public, and his brilliant exposition will prove eminently useful in disabusing many readers of false notions concerning Catholicity and democracy. Dr. Gautherot, Professor of History of the French Revolution in the Catholic Institute of Paris, looks at the question from another angle. He would probably agree with Mr. Belloc's understanding of the theory of revolution, and admit that in applying it revolutionists could have accomplished, probably in peace, every desirable object of true democracy, but would deny that the French revolutionists ever so understood it. Their notion of equality, etc., was so vitiated by a heterogeneous variety of doctrines that were false in philosophy, theology and economics, and so corrupted by acts of cruelty, immorality, blasphemy, tyranny and hate, that it was soon lost in a vortex of political insanity. Confining himself to the acts of the Constituent Assembly, he lays more stress on the influence exercised by Voltaire and the Encyclopedists on the minds of that body, and finds their views and acts irreconcilable with Catholicity. This is admitted by Mr. Belloc, whose main anxiety is to dissociate such views from democratic doctrines and demonstrate the concordance of democracy with Catholicity. Dr. Gautherot, a conscientious and able historian, but a Frenchman with a Monarchistic bias, betrays no such anxiety. Mr. Belloc's book, while also staunchly Catholic in tone, is better attuned to the temper of our times, and is probably the most enlightening explanation of the causes, consequences, successes, failures, and far-extending influences of the French Revolution that has yet been given to the English-speaking public.

M. KENNY, S.J.

Lamennais et Le Saint Siècle. (1820-1834.) D'après des Documents inédits et les Archives du Vatican. Par PAUL DUDON. Paris: Perrin et Cie.

One hesitates whether to call Père Dudon's book on Lamennais an historical study or a critical analysis of Lamennais' mind. In point of fact it is both: but no one will hesitate to call it a fascinating book. The distinguished author, long connected with the editorial staff of Les Etudes, has the gift of a clear and chastened style. His painstaking researches in the Vatican Archives, a source now for the first time laid under tribute on the present matter, the Archives of the Nunciature at Paris, of the Foreign Ministry and of the Seminary of Saint Sulpice, together with the voluminous correspondence of Lamennais, have given him a fund of authentic information on his subject. Adhering closely to his sources, he has woven a study of the mind, the influence, the contemporary appreciation and the final condemnation of the brilliant but mistaken apologist of the last century which holds the reader to the last page.

The development of mankind going on by natural processes as well as stimulated and directed by supernatural influences has brought new problems for man's solution. He may try to solve them with natural principles alone, and he is commonly balked. Too often his natural principles are awry, and then he is soon at sea. When he has his principles right, peradventure they fail in adequacy. The application of the principles of revealed truth becomes a sudden necessity. In all the stages of our history good men have hastened, often with more zeal than discretion, to save the Church from apparent opposition to the progress of the times by an immediate solution of the newest problem with an original application of the truth of which she is the guardian. If they forget in their eagerness that she is the authentic interpreter, grow impatient of her conservatism and her deliberation in bringing forth from her treasure, like the goodman of the house, new things and old, it will grieve but not surprise the judicious to see them suffer shipwreck. So was it in the case of Lamennais.

The brilliant and enthusiastic apologist met the tide of rationalism with fearless power and eloquent conviction. The pendulum swung too far, and his argument went the length of admitting no secure base of certain truth save authority and tradition. Seeking to battle for the people against the tyranny of kings and to save the Church from injury in their downfall, he wished to put her in opposition to all existing civil authority. Fighting the fight of the new developments of his time in favor of popular liberties, and thinking the Church bound to join in the movement, with precision of course from the false principles and wicked consequences with which the movement abounded, he lost track of what principles were right and what were wrong. When the Church made the distinction for him, he rebelled. A visionary who ran ahead of events to a golden commonwealth of his dream, he was impatient of all who did not share his vision. Sensitive to the degree of morbid melancholy, he writhed under the rough blows involved in heated polemics, even among Catholics of the same household. Proud with a towering pride which he refused to recognize even at the instance of his closest and dearest friends, he would not yield an inch of his thought to argument, counsel or precept. Step by step he went his way to rejection of all teaching authority in the Church, and at last made complete shipwreck of his faith, leaving the Church as if it were a chrysalis, outgrown and outworn, and substituting the dreams of his fancy and the perfervid fallacies of his distorted reason for the revelation of Christ as deposited with Peter. He died sadly; and his prophecies passed with him.

All this, and more, has Père Dudon developed from personal and official correspondence with a completeness of detail and a surety of consequence that is most satisfying. The facts of this historic instance lie before us from the time of the publication of Lamennais' "Essay on Indifference" to that of the Encyclical "Singulari Nos," which condemned his "Paroles d'un Croyant," ending the matter for all Catholics. The moods and mental transitions of Lamennais are laid bare from his first conviction that he alone had the secret of the only apologetics which could save the Church from imminent ruin, to the last, where he cried: "For us the papacy is no more. It is one of the vast ruins which one meets at Rome." Reading the facts of the controversy and the sentiments of its protagonist in the quoted texts of the official documents and the correspondence of its principals, the reader forms his own judgment, and it is that of the author. One closes the book with a sense of finality. Within its covers is a lesson for the Modernist, if he will but learn it, and, for that matter, for every self-centered enthusiast who dreams himself a Cyprian or a Bernard, and awakes to find himself only an Arius or a Calvin.

The author has gathered together in an appendix the full texts of the decisive documents and declarations on which a judicial conclusion must be based. These are the last word in a famous incident.

CHARLES MACKSEY, S.J.

Three Fundamental Principles of the Spiritual Life. By MORITZ MESCHLER, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder.

Spiritual Instruction. By REGINALD BUCKLER, O.P. New York: Benziger Bros.

The Mission of Pain. By PÈRE LAURENT. Translated by L. G. PING. London: Burns and Oates.

These are three volumes of solid piety. Father Meschler, whose name is a guarantee of a book's worth, shows briefly how prayer and self-denial and love of the Divine Saviour is the triangular base on which the firm and lofty tower of a good Christian life can easily be erected. Father Buckler, the well-known ascetical writer of the Dominican Order, has written these "Spiritual Instructions" especially for religious, to suggest to them the means of joyfully rising to the dignity of their state, and to teach them how to do the work of Martha without losing Mary's peace of soul. Those finally who querulously ask: "Why do the wicked prosper? Why do the virtuous suffer? Of what use is pain?" will learn from Father Laurent's attractive book the answers that Catholic philosophy and theology have for these questions. Our Lord's atonement, as this author reminds his readers, although abundantly sufficient, is still being carried on by those whose mission it is to suffer with Him in reparation for all who cannot or will not bear pain, that thus there may be filled up "those things that are wanting in the sufferings of Christ."

A Conspiracy and Its Agency, a neat pamphlet prepared by PAUL BAKEWELL, of St. Louis, is a reprint of papers on the Ferrer case written by Hilaire Belloc for the Dublin Review and the London Tablet, to which are added two articles on the "Establishment of an International Press Agency by Catholics," that appeared last spring in AMERICA. Mr. Belloc proves conclusively that the entire anti-Catholic Ferrer agitation in the press was affected by Judæo-Masonic "suggestions," and shows how the people's discontent with labor conditions made them easy dupes of these designing men.

The Reunion of Christendom. By FRANCIS GOODMAN. New York: Broadway Publishing Co.

This book, which is dedicated "To all the God-fearing men and women of the world who yearn for Christian unity," is plainly a "novel with a purpose." The scene of the story is laid in Codport, a Massachusetts coast town. A rather flimsy plot merely serves to support a quantity of good controversial theology with which Father Douglas bombards an Anglican minister. The book ends with the parson's submission to Rome, indicating the only means for effecting a union of Christendom. He then marries the fair niece of the parish priest, and after the wedding, somewhat to the reader's surprise, four other ministers of the town enter the Church. The dialogue of the supposedly cultured characters in the book is not always that of refined people.

W. D.

The End of the Irish Parliament. By JOSEPH R. FISHER. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. London: Edward Arnold.

This is an elaborate Unionist pamphlet, which expends 316 octavo pages in befogging a subject that Mrs. Green's "The Irish Nationality" has been able to present clearly and correctly in a twenty-page chapter. The discovery of some MSS. which would make out the private opinions of Lord Townshend, Irish Viceroy, 1767-1772, to have been better than his deeds, is the author's excuse for the perpetration. It is not sufficient. He goes on to show by a selection of phrases, adroitly wrested from their context, that Grattan and his Parliament were essentially incapable of governing Ireland, and the patriots and their friends were knaves or fools; that Ireland's real friends were Pitt and the English statesmen, Castlereagh particularly, who brought about the Union through altruistic benevolence, and only used the normal amount of bribery in the process; therefore, that Home Rule would be a calamity for Ireland and the Union is her only safety.

The vast commercial progress of Ireland during the Grattan period is ignored, while the removal of many disabilities from Catholics and the conferring of a wider franchise than they possess to-day are attributed to England, which is somehow exculpated for the recall of Lord Fitzwilliam when, in cooperation with the Grattan party, he was about to establish Catholic Emancipation, and Lecky's well documented proofs to the contrary are thrust out of court to make room for a piece of rhetorical casuistry from Lord Rosebery. One half-phrase of Grattan is repeated ad nauseam to show he favored "Protestant Ascendancy," while hundreds of pages and his whole life prove the contrary. Thomas Addis Emmet, a good Protestant, and Dr. Mac Nevin, a good Catholic, whose monuments still remind New York of two of its most honored citizens, are described as "true Jacobins," who cared nought for Catholic Emancipation. Rufus King, the American Ambassador, is cited declaring them unfit for American citizenship, but King's condemnation for that act is unnoticed.

The writer abstains from giving references because, he says, the average reader will not want them and the critical student will not need them. The proceeding was cautious but the reason superfluous: we doubt the book will find many readers in either class.

Our Alliance with Catholic France.

Below is described by Robert Morris, the financier of the American Revolution, a scene which forms a striking background for more recent events. Between our old alliance with Catholic France and the promised alliance announced by President Taft at the Peace Jubilee at Manasses, on July 23 of this year, both countries have often shifted their positions, not only toward each other, but toward the once common enemy, England. In the treaty for universal peace, France comes after Great Britain in her overtures with the United States. But it is better to let the extract speak for itself regarding the first alliance. We find it in Robert Morris' "Diary," quoted as follows in the footnote to p. 7, Vol. XII, of Spark's "Diplomatic Correspondence of American Revolution":

"1781

November 3d. This day, on the invitation of the Minister of France, I attended at the Romish Church at a Te Deum, sung on account of the capture of Lord Cornwallis and his army. Soon after arrived the colors taken by General Washington with that Army, which were brought by Colonel Humphreys to Chester, there met by Colonel Tilghman and thence conducted hither by those two Aid-de-Camps of the General. The city troop of light horse went out to meet them, and became the standard bearers, and twenty-four gentlemen, privates in that corps, carried each of them one of the colors displayed. The American and French flags preceding the captured trophies, which were conducted down Market street to the Coffee House, thence down Front to Chestnut street and up that street to the State House, where they were presented to Congress, who were sitting; and many of the members tell me, that instead of viewing this transaction as a mere matter of joyful ceremony, which they expected to do, they instantly felt themselves impressed with ideas of the most solemn nature. It brought to their minds the distresses our country had been exposed to, the calamities we have repeatedly suffered, the perilous situation, which our affairs have almost always been in; and they could not but recollect the threats of Lord North, that he would bring America to his feet on unconditional terms of submission."

EDUCATION

It was with keen pleasure that the writer made use of quotations from certain letters last week in support of his contention that the neutral or non-religious system of school training imports grave danger to the welfare of the nation. Time was when few outside the Catholic Church were brave enough to say a word in defence of what is beginning to be accepted as the only proposition tenable by a Christian: that religious instruction must form a part of our school program. Mr. Coler's correspondent, as was said last week, is not a Catholic; neither is he a clergyman, but he has been deeply interested in educational work for years, more especially in the problems meeting one in the training of children in primary and grammar schools. His experience has compelled him to concede the demoralizing influence of a materialistic education and the obligation binding Christian men and women to safeguard our children from its vicious consequences.

* * *

It will not be amiss, in this connection, to detail the reasons which led Mr. Coler, to whom these letters were addressed, with the whole-hearted earnestness characteristic of the man, to take up the question of religious training in our schools. As a layman who came in contact with this question through political and official activities, he had been deeply impressed with the truth underlying the statement used by Dr. Wescott: "All life is one, national life, social life, civic life being all forms of the religious life which is the embodiment of the Gospel." Certain facts had faced him during his career as a public officer, which Mr. Coler thus describes, explaining the growth of this impression:

* * *

"A part of the money that the people contribute towards the expenses of government is by law directed into educational channels; some of it is expended for libraries, which are only schools, after all; some of it is devoted to the support of reformatory institutions; a great part of it, indeed about one-third of our budget in the city of New York, goes to the maintenance of the immense public school system, which controls the inclination toward God or away from God of the citizenship that must rule this Republic but a few years hence. A public officer need not be an intensely religious man himself; his conduct may, in many respects, fall far short of the Christian standard; but, if he has any conscience at all, any comprehension at all of what all this educational work means for the future of his country, he must feel the responsibility of passing upon expenditures of this kind, and he must have some impelling sense of his obligation to do what he can to make this expenditure serve the National purpose and minister to the National health.

"And," continues Mr. Coler, "if he is a believer in God and in the Christian faith, he must come to see that the National life is only a part of the religious life and that his duty is in the direction of blending religious and secular training so that the government of the Republic in the generations to come shall be not only intelligent, but righteously intelligent. And if he finds that there is a plan whereby this can be done without injustice to any of the numerous creeds and denominations which divide among them the vast population of this country, a plan so fair that not even the Atheist is deprived of his rights thereunder, the public official, it seems to me, is lacking in courage if he does not put aside that natural reluctance of a layman to enter the field of religious discussion and give to the plan the best of his advocacy."

To be sure, one who accepts Mr. Coler's stand must overcome, too, those fears of misapprehension as to motive which ever haunt the man who has any considerable experience in public affairs. He himself, since entering upon his advocacy of religious schools, has been reproached by non-Catholic friends with having adopted a policy that lends too much aid to the Catholic Church. But, as he well answers, no man may question the justice of a system of public expenditure in educational matters based upon the principle of payment for service rendered, and if the plan is just, what injury shall its acceptance work upon any Christian body?

"Are we to deny," argues Mr. Coler, "on behalf of the State, encouragement and financial support to those institutions which comply with the injunction of Christ: 'Suffer the children to come unto me'? Because we are a nation committed to freedom of conscience, must we discriminate against religious institutions? Is it necessary, in order to preserve that religious freedom which has been wisely made a part of our governmental system, that we shall not pay for secular education because the teacher is a Christian Church who reinforces such secular education with the moral inspiration of a living faith? Must we appropriate the public funds to maintain libraries named in honor of a great philanthropist, in which libraries through the materialistic writers the dead philosophy of a Godless universe is taught, but deny any financial return for services rendered by other institutions because they believe it to be of more importance to save a child's soul than to sharpen his intellect?"

Some weeks ago we made mention in this department of a point emphasized in the general resolutions adopted at the recent congress of the Catholic Education Association. There was voiced in those resolutions an urgent appeal to Catholic teachers to seek advanced training under distinctively Catholic auspices. As was said, the danger confronting Catholics who frequent schools noted for unsound economics and sociological theories and the irreligious tendencies of whose faculties have been brought home to us in recent discussions of educational methods, is too obvious to need a word of warning. One is gratified in this connection to learn that the Catholic University Summer School for Teaching Sisters and women teachers has met with signal success in this its initial year. The registration for the various courses reached nearly three hundred, by far the greater number in attendance being members of teaching communities of religious women. These came from forty States of the Union, and from points as far apart as Oregon, Florida, Texas, Louisiana and Minnesota. Twenty-five religious orders and congregations were represented and about sixty independent houses. Every arrangement had been made to enable the Sisters to live precisely as they would in their own convents at home, and no more agreeable or healthy situation could be found to assure the success of this great work very properly inaugurated by the Catholic University authorities. The classes were conducted in McMahon Hall, whose excellent equipment was placed at the services of those following the courses; twenty-five professors directed the work, and all the branches usually taught in a summer school of the highest order were well represented in the program of studies followed. It is to be hoped that the excellent results achieved in the first year of the new venture assure a very successful future for the school. Certainly, with the advantages thus offered to them by the University, Catholic women teachers and, most of all, Catholic religious women will find little excuse to continue the practice of frequenting for advanced work the classes of non-Catholic educational institutions, no matter how distinguished the reputation these latter may enjoy.

SOCIOLOGY

Social Study Course at Fordham

On Friday afternoon, August 4, the Social Course for the Eastern district of the Central Verein closed its interesting and animated sessions. The enthusiasm which had pervaded the meetings, and which during the successive days waxed in intensity, would not allow the members to separate without first making provision for a new organization. The purpose of this is to insure the permanent existence of an annual Summer School Course in Social Studies for the special benefit of the Eastern section of the Central Verein. Resolutions were likewise adopted to issue a pamphlet containing all the practical information necessary for continuing at home, in private study circles, the work begun in the Social Study Course. As the men reluctantly departed from the halls of Fordham University, which had become endeared to them by the hospitality they had there enjoyed and by the memory of the days spent together in mutual self-improvement and preparation for the struggle with the common enemy, it was clear that their hearts had been fired with a lofty purpose and that in each of the forty-eight present there the faith had won a champion or more strongly nerved an apostle.

Catholic social study circles and courses are no longer to be looked upon as an academic luxury, but have become a real need in our days. It is by similar institutions that Socialism is not merely making its converts, but is preparing its propagandists everywhere whom the Catholic workingman must be taught to meet and vanquish on their own chosen grounds. Sunday schools and study classes are the means of indoctrinating the working classes with the fallacies which, as was so well pointed out in the lectures and discussions, are dangerous precisely because of the truths which are blended with them. Countless excellent plans for ameliorating the condition of the poor and of the laborer are put forth by Socialists, and the Catholic worker to whom these are proposed by his Socialist fellow mechanic naturally draws the conclusion that if this is Socialism, as he is given to understand that it is, then he can see no reason why the Church should be so utterly and relentlessly opposed to it. The great work of the lecturer must evidently be to make manifest the real meaning of Socialism in theory and in practice, and to show that what is good and noble in its purpose is even more dearly cherished by the Church, and is to-day to be made the goal of Catholic social action in our own country as it has long been contended for most successfully by Catholic organization in Germany. Socialism, on the contrary, must be exposed in all its dishonesty and in the fallacy of its fundamental principles, so destructive of all justice and religion, and forever irreconcilable with Catholic doctrine.

In speaking with the members as they departed for their homes the writer was deeply impressed not merely with the supreme sense of satisfaction with which the lectures and discussions had been deservedly appreciated, but even more with the serious determination of the men to read and study and fit themselves for the battles the future will bring. Here, we may say, is the greatest profit derived from such courses: the desire they awaken for further information on the Catholic side of every social question, and the conviction they inspire of the absolute need—now perhaps realized for the first time—of reading and spreading our own Catholic literature. Indeed, could a sound, enlightened Catholic paper and periodical be introduced into every Catholic home and be there accorded all the attention and consideration it deserves, the victory were already assured.

Lack of Support in Charitable Work

We have received the annual report of the Christ Child Society, Washington, D. C., with branches in other cities and towns, and after reading its clear exposition of work accomplished and examining its businesslike balance sheet, we pass on it the judgment which falls usually on Catholic charitable works: "An extraordinary result from means so limited." Why the means are such is a problem worth considering, the more so as the annual conference of charities is near at hand, in which it might well be discussed. This society, in Washington, which is typical of many others, has over 800 members, exclusive of the junior branch. Its subscriptions and Christmas donations amount to less than $1,200. Most probably the donations may be put down at $500, of which the larger part come from persons not members of the Society. This would bring the contributions of members to $1 each per annum, less than 10 cents a month.

The great impediment to our charitable work is lack of support. Some say this can not be helped. Protestants, they explain, have comparatively few calls on them, so they can afford to undertake philanthropy on a large scale. On the other hand, the claims on Catholics are so many, for church, school, church organizations, etc., that there is little left for general charity. There is something in this excuse, in the sense that it is not absolutely invalid; but that something is very small indeed. Let us suppose a parish of one thousand families, chiefly of working people, and assume that there are five wage earners for every three families, earning, on an average, $20 a week for forty weeks in the year. This would give about $1,500,000 coming into the parish annually. Besides, there is a number of men, either unattached to any family or more or less emancipated, who have not set up families of their own. Put these at one hundred and fifty, and suppose them to earn $15 a week for forty weeks in the year, and we see $100,000 more coming in. Now, what do the Church and the parochial organizations receive out of this sum? How much is wasted in self-indulgence?

The experience of every pastor is that the church is supported mainly by a minority of zealous families, and that the larger part of the parishioners do less than their share. There are some who find the burden heavy, and these complain the least. There are others who do something, and these are louder in their complaints. But loudest of all are those selfish ones who grudge every penny that does not go to their own personal gratification.

But there are many who would contribute willingly to charity could they but be reached. In looking over the list of subscribers to the Christ Child Society, one sees that they are nearly all women. There are some men; but these are nearly all priests, while laymen are few and far between. Yet these are they who can be, and should be, the main support of Catholic charities. It is not easy to get the young unmarried man to take a seat in the church, or to subscribe to the school fund. He does not, as a rule, get Masses said, and he seems to feel bashful about putting a reasonable offering into the contribution box. Yet he has money to spend, and he spends it. If he gave according to his means to Catholic charities, most pastors would be willing to overlook his parochial shortcomings, and the charities would develop wonderfully.

But how is he to be got to do so? It seems to us that this is to be accomplished by the Catholic societies of men, which should take under their special patronage the many works which women are administering so well. Division of labor is the secret of success. Let the men find the means and the women will do the work. Some practical member of one of the federated societies might point out how this is to be accomplished.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

The recent decree of the Holy Father reducing the number of week-day holy days of obligation for the Catholics of the world does not in that respect affect the Catholics of the United States. Here the holy days remain the same as before the decree was issued, namely: Christmas Day, the Circumcision, Ascension, Assumption, All Saints and the Immaculate Conception. However, there is to be no fasting or abstinence on any of these holy days of obligation. Thus when the Feast of the Immaculate Conception falls on a Friday, the obligation of fasting or abstinence does not hold for that day.

The dispute as to whether Margaret Riley, an orphan, 7 years old, should be permitted to remain in the Presbyterian Orphanage or be sent to a Catholic institution was finally decided, on August 1, by Judge Staake, in the Quarter Sessions Court, Philadelphia, when an order was made awarding the child to the custody of St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum.

The parents of Margaret were Catholics, and it was conceded that they received the last rites of their Church. The child was baptized in the Church of the Immaculate Conception, but after the death of her father and mother, her grandmother placed her in the Presbyterian Orphanage. The St. Vincent de Paul Society thereupon asked for a writ of habeas corpus, contending that, as Margaret was undoubtedly a Catholic, she should be sent to an institution conducted under the rules of that faith. While a decision was pending it was brought to Judge Staake's attention that the child had been rebaptized in the Presbyterian faith, but Judge Staake, in disposing of the case, said:

"Such second baptism was entirely nugatory, of no validity, and should not have taken place; that the Roman Catholic Church recognizes the baptism of a person in any orthodox Christian Church, and that even where there was a doubt as to whether the person had been baptized or not, conditional baptism is given, with the proviso that if the person had not already been baptized then it was now baptized, but that such conditional baptism was only given where a doubt existed as to whether a valid Christian baptism had theretofore been given the person by a non-Catholic."

"It has always been the practice of the courts of this Commonwealth," the Court added, "in awarding the custody of children, to take into consideration the religious faith of the parents of such children. The Court having been informed by counsel representing the Presbyterian Orphanage that no answer will be filed, and that the institution will take no further action in the cause, now grants the prayer of the petition and awards the said Margaret Riley to St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum."

Judge Staples, of Monroe County, who had original jurisdiction in the case, while temporarily sitting in the Quarter Sessions, concurred in Judge Staake's ruling.

The Very Rev. Denis J. O'Doherty, recently appointed to succeed his brother as President of the Irish College at Salamanca, came from Ireland to America less than two years ago to lecture on problems of present day interest in Irish education and sociology. He is now homeward bound to assist at the consecration of his brother, the Rt. Rev. M. J. O'Doherty, as Bishop of Zamboanga, P. I., and of his cousin, the Rt. Rev. Dr. Morrisroe, as Bishop of Achonry, Ireland.

The election of officers completed the business session of the International Convention of the Catholic Order of Foresters, held in Cleveland, Ohio, the first week of August. Thomas H. Cannon, of Chicago, was reelected to the office of High Chief Ranger. The convention decided to abolish the extra charge for insurance on all persons engaged in hazardous occupations. Louisville was selected as the place to hold the next convention.

SCIENCE

Discussing an average temperature gradient, a composite plotted from 117 actual gradients, winter and summer, Prof. W. J. Humphreys of the U. S. Weather Bureau sums up his conclusions in the following terms: "By day the surface layer of air is warmed mainly by contact with the heated earth, and the layers next above it, by convection. Hence, the afternoon temperature gradient must closely follow, first, the dry air, and then the saturated adiabat. By nights the lowest air is cooled by contact with the relatively cold earth, and the layers next above partly through indirect contact with the earth and partly by radiation, and thus an inversion gradient is often produced near the surface. Hence the average gradient departs more and more widely from the adiabats as the surface is approached. Hence, also, during mornings local convections usually are too shallow, but during summer afternoons quite sufficient to produce cumulus clouds."

The Geological Survey announces the discovery of a new mineral, to be known as Hinsdalite. It was obtained by E. S. Larsen from the dump at the mouth of one of the tunnels of the Golden Fleece mine, near Lake City, Hinsdale County, Colorado. It appears abundantly as an original vein mineral associated with quartz, as well as some pyrites, galena, and barite. Its hardness is about five, and its lustre is from vitreous to greasy. It is of a pale green color, is infusible, but whitens on heating, and is insoluble in acids.

The new Hamilton and Henry process for copper hardening consists in treating the copper with aluminium and iron pyrites. The aluminium is heated to a high temperature in a crucible and sufficient pyrites are added to form a brittle compound after pouring and moulding. From one to three ounces of this mixture are added, together with borax and charcoal, to each pound of copper previously melted. F. TONDORF, S.J.

OBITUARY

The Right Reverend Clement Pagnani, O.S.B., first Bishop of Kandy, Ceylon, died recently in his seventy-eighth year. Born at Fabriano in the States of the Church in 1834, he entered the Silvestrine Congregation of the Order of St. Benedict, and made his studies in Rome, where he was raised to the priesthood in 1857. Four years later he went as a missionary to Ceylon, where he labored zealously until his lamented death. He became Vicar Apostolic of Colombo in 1879, and took charge of Kandy in the same capacity in 1883. At that time he had but six priests to assist him in the work of the apostolate. When Pope Leo XIII established the Ceylon hierarchy, in 1886, Bishop Pagnani was appointed to the see of Kandy. He multiplied the mission stations, completed St. Anthony's Abbey, established a boarding school for boys, introduced the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, founded a congregation of native Sisters, and manifested in other ways the spirit of a true apostle. The deceased prelate was within a few months of celebrating three jubilees—the silver jubilee of his promotion to the see of Kandy, the golden jubilee of his coming to Ceylon, and the diamond jubilee of his entrance into the Order of St. Benedict. At his obsequies, which were attended by all the members of the hierarchy of Ceylon and by throngs of devoted friends and admirers, sermons were preached in Sinhalese, Tamil, and English, the chief languages of the diocese. Bishop Pagnani had endeared himself to all classes, especially to the poor, by his charity towards the needy, his zeal for Catholic education, and his unaffected piety. His ability as a linguist stood him in good stead, for it enabled him to deal personally with the various nations and races represented in his diocese.

Edward Roth, well known to an older generation as a Catholic educator and writer, died at his residence in Philadelphia, after a long illness, on August 2. He was in his 86th year. Mr. Roth was born in Kilkenny, Ireland, February 6, 1826, and came to America in September, 1847. He first made New York his home, but after a short time removed to Wilmington, Del. In Wilmington he was appointed a member of the faculty of St. Mary's College, where he taught for fifteen years. During the last ten years of his professorship he was also the vice-president of the institution. In 1862 he resigned from this position and removed to Philadelphia, where he founded the Broad Street Academy, from which many prominent Philadelphians have been graduated, and of which he remained principal until he retired from active life some years ago. Besides being a noted instructor, Mr. Roth had acquired a reputation as a writer of magazine and newspaper stories and as a biographer. He wrote "The Life of Napoleon the Third," which first appeared in serial form in the Boston Pilot and was afterward published in book form in 1856. He was also the author of "Christus Judex, a Traveller's Tale," Philadelphia, 1865; compiled an "Index to Littell's Living Age," comprising the contents of the first hundred volumes, Philadelphia, 1886; and published several school books, including works on geography, Latin grammar and arithmetic. Besides these he was the translator of several of Jules Verne's astronomical stories and Legouv  s "Art of Reading." For many years Mr. Roth was an active member of the Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia.

Mother Mary Bernard Comerford, of the Presentation Order, passed to her reward, on July 21, at Berkeley, Cal., after a life of sixty years in the cloister. She entered the Presentation Convent, Middleton, County Cork, in her twentieth year, and following the example of her sister, Mother Mary Teresa, came to America in 1861. The golden jubilee of her profession in 1903 was signalized by pontifical high Mass, of which His Grace, the Most Rev. Archbishop Riordan was the celebrant. "Mother Bernard's greatest ambition, and what constituted her highest honor in religious life," says the Leader, of San Francisco, "was the duty of preparing even one little child for the worthy reception of the Sacraments of Penance and Holy Eucharist. Yet she always encouraged the teachers of other branches to work for the highest perfection in acquiring knowledge and giving the best and most practical education to the pupils."

Sister Francis Xavier Provost, one of the pioneer Holy Name Sisters in the Northwest, died at St. Mary's Academy, Portland, Oregon, July 23, in the eighty-first year of her age and the sixty-first of her religious profession. Sister Xavier was born at Belle Isle on the Richelieu, P. Q., in 1831. Twenty years later she pronounced her religious vows in the Convent of Longueil, and celebrated the golden jubilee of her profession in 1901. When the Oregon Mission was undertaken, in 1859, Sister Francis Xavier was one of the twelve Sisters to accept the appointment to Portland, and she labored zealously in the Northwest ever since. The Most Rev. Alexander Christie, Archbishop of Oregon City, officiated at the pontifical Mass of requiem.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

PROTESTANT HYMNS IN CATHOLIC CHURCHES

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Recent criticism in your columns of the abuse of allowing Protestant hymns to be sung at Catholic ceremonies was most gratifying, I am sure, to many who, like myself, have been dubbed "cranks" for constantly inveighing against the evil. That the censures you print even call for more radical treatment might be assumed from the following extract from the published report of the recent funeral of a well-known Catholic. I omit the names:

"The musical part of the service was beautiful. Mrs. — of — sang the opening solo, 'Paradise.' 'Lead, Kindly Light,' was sung in duet by Mrs. — and Mr. —, also of —. Mr. —, a prominent — organist, played accompaniments and also rendered the funeral march from Chopin. Mr. — sang 'O Salutory' and Mrs. — followed with 'Face to Face.' The closing number was by Mr. —, 'The Hills of God.'"

All this in the face of the Motu Proprio and diocesan and other statutes to the contrary.

GREGORIAN.

Newark, July 31.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your editorial on the singing of "Onward Christian Soldiers" touched a subject in which I am deeply interested, and apropos of which might I ask the privilege of calling attention to what seems to me, as a Catholic organist, to be a much-needed want, namely, an official Catholic Hymnal. Our Protestant brethren are surely very much ahead of us in the matter. Nearly all denominations have these official hymnals containing as many as six hundred or more hymns, collected by the most competent editors, lay and ecclesiastical, written in simple yet effective four-part harmony, clearly printed, well arranged as far as subject matter is concerned, elaborately indexed, and, by reason of the universality or their use, capable of being sold at a reasonable sum. As a result, the churches of these denominations are provided with one and the same hymnal, and this fact goes a long way to account for the congregational singing which, as a rule, you find there, and to which, I am sorry to say (with some rare exceptions), we Catholics have not as yet attained.

It is true there are in existence several hymnals which have done yeoman service, notably the Christian Brothers' and St. Basil's Hymnals; but most of these hymnals are out of date, oftentimes unmusical in arrangement, and their sins of omission many. For instance, the Christian Brothers' Hymnal does not contain the tune to which the Tantum Ergo is usually sung, and the harmony is in most cases three-part, and therefore ineffective.

The work could be most effectively done by a competent committee of clergymen, assisted by prominent Catholic organists and musicians. The whole ground should be gone over thoroughly, and an official hymnal similar in character to those of other denominations, but absolutely Catholic in tone and spirit, be issued. This work, in addition to the ordinary devotional hymns, should contain in modern notation the Gregorian Mass for a solemn feast, the proper of the Mass for some of our more important feasts, the vespers, litanies and Holy Week music, etc., arranged in a simple and easy, yet effective, way.

The uses to which such a hymnal might be put are manifold and interesting. Particularly is this so in the case of our parochial schools. Our children throughout the length and breadth of the land would then be taught and sing the same hymns, and when they grow to maturity the attainment of congregational singing would not be the impossibility which it now seems, particularly if every church pew were provided with several hymnals, as in the Protestant churches.

Moreover, organists would have a source of material to draw from which would be official, and therefore safe, and thus would be spared the danger of using quasi-Protestant hymns, or singing a hymn to the Sacred Heart to the tune of a well-known secular love song, but taken from a hymnal bearing the imprimatur and nihil obstat of a prominent archdiocese. Even the ideal of congregational singing of the common of the Mass might be reached if our parochial school children were taught the Gregorian Mass for a solemn feast through the medium of an official Catholic hymnal.

Peace Treaties in Jeopardy.—The Committee on Foreign Relations has amended the pending peace treaties with Great Britain and France by striking out the clause which gave the proposed joint high commission the power finally to decide whether or not any controversy which might be referred to it was justiciable within the meaning of the conventions. This action was taken by the Committee on Foreign Relations, notwithstanding the earnest argument of the Secretary of State against the contention that this provision violated the constitutional authority of the Senate as a part of the treaty making power of that body. Incidentally, there was discussed both in committee and in Senate, a criticism on the Senate contained in "The American Commonwealth," written by Ambassador Bryce long before he ever thought of coming to this country on a diplomatic mission. The passage in Mr. Bryce's work was referred to as indicating a hostile disposition on the part of the Ambassador towards the Senate's exercise of its functions of ratification. Several Senators expressed the opinion that Mr. Bryce's views had had an undue influence in the formulation of the treaty. Mr. O'Gorman, of New York, while not assuming an attitude indicating positive opposition to the treaties, said that some portions of the document before the Senate were apparently conflicting, while others were obscure to him, pointing out the possible danger that might arise through yielding to the views of an Old World diplomat. Western Senators expressed the fear that the ratification of the treaties would have the effect of throwing open the doors of arbitration to all the questions involved in dealing with China and Japan, including immigration and admission to the public schools. All the Senators conceded that none of these questions could be raised under the compacts with France and Great Britain, but taking these as mere forerunners of like treaties with all the civilized powers, they pointed out the strong probability of bringing Japan and China within the circle. Both President Taft and Secretary of State Knox have taken the position that the paragraph which the Committee on Foreign Relations purposes to amend is necessary to the proper operation of the agreement, and it is thought that the President would prefer the failure of the treaties to the ratification with the paragraph eliminated.

Statehood Bill Passed.—The bill granting Statehood to New Mexico and Arizona was passed by the Senate by a vote of 53 to 18. The Nelson amendment which eliminated the provision in the Arizona constitution relating to the recall of judges was rejected. Many voted against the Nelson amendment and in favor of the bill on the ground that it was a matter for the voters of Arizona to decide. Senator O'Gorman separated from his party associates and voted against the final passage of the measure, declaring that he would never give his vote for the recall of the judiciary, which he conceived to be one of the most destructive and revolutionary assaults ever made on the stability of representative government. It is asserted by those who are in a position to know that the President will promptly veto the bill as soon as it is laid before him.

Changes in Diplomatic Corps.—Important changes have been announced in the diplomatic corps, owing to the resignation of David Jayne Hill, Ambassador to Germany, and Charles H. Sherrill, Minister to Argentina. The nominations of three ambassadors and five ministers were sent to the Senate by President Taft on August 8. They are as follows: John G. A. Leishman, of Pittsburg, now Ambassador to Italy, transferred as Ambassador to Germany; Thomas J. O'Brien, of Grand Rapids, Mich., at present Ambassador to Japan, transferred as Ambassador to Italy; Charles Page Bryan, of Chicago, now Minister to Belgium, promoted to be Ambassador to Japan; Lars Anderson, of the District of Columbia, who has previously been in the diplomatic service, appointed Minister to Belgium; John Ridgely Carter, of Baltimore, Minister to the Balkan States, transferred as Minister to the Argentine Republic; John B. Jackson, of Newark, N. J., Minister to Cuba, succeeds Mr. Carter as Minister to the Balkan States; Arthur M. Beaupre, of Aurora, Ill., Minister to the Netherlands, becomes Minister to Cuba; Lloyd Bryce, of New York, the only one of the nominees who is not now or has not been in the diplomatic service, appointed Minister to the Netherlands.

America Gets Panama Islands.—The United States Government will shortly come into full possession of four islands—Naos, Flamenco, Perico and Culebra—in Panama Bay, at the Pacific entrance to the Panama Canal. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company has accepted the awards of a joint commission, by which that company will receive $44,000 for its half interest in and improvements on the islands. The remainder of the title to the islands already rests in the Panama Railroad Company, which is owned by the United States Government. The islands are now being used primarily for quarantine purposes.

New Postage Stamp Issue.—"Utility, art, and harmony," according to Third Assistant Postmaster General Britt, will be combined in a new issue of postage stamps about to be authorized. The head of President Washington will appear on the first six of the series, while the last five will bear the likeness of Benjamin Franklin. The denomination of all the new stamps will be in Arabic, and this as well as the use of a separate color or shade for each denomination, is expected to prevent the confusion of which two conventions of postal clerks have complained.

Senator William P. Frye.—William P. Frye, who died on August 8, was the oldest member of the United States Senate in point of service, having sat in that body more than thirty years. After he had served ten years in the lower branch of Congress, he entered the upper branch on March 15, 1881, succeeding James G. Blaine. His popularity among his colleagues in the Senate was attested by the fact that he served as President pro tempore of that body from 1896 to April last, a much longer tenure than any predecessor had enjoyed in that post of honor and distinction. An effective debater and campaign speaker, he avoided mere display and sought assignments in his legislative duties involving study and unappreciated labor. An indication of his freedom from religious bias was the appointment as his private secretary of a graduate of Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass. As the New York Tribune justly remarks: "Mr. Frye exerted always and everywhere a helpful and honorable influence. In his character and services he illustrated to a notable degree the best traditions of the American Senate."

Mexico.—The representatives of foreign Governments have been notified that all claims for damages arising from the seizure or destruction of property during the revolution are to be presented to the Indemnity Commission established at the capital. The members of the Commission will examine the claims and report in an advisory capacity to the Minister of Finance.—A British subject named Woodhouse has put in a claim for twenty-five thousand pesos for damages done to his plantation by some Maderist troops who had been mustered out of service.—The Government has been urged to exact bonds from American employment agents for the prompt return to Mexico of peons who have worked out their time or have become incapacitated through illness. From this it seems that the evils of the contract labor system exist on our western border.—A proposed division and distribution of plantations has filled large landed proprietors with fear. The intention is to oblige the planter to divide his property into holdings of not more than 2,500 acres each and to sell to the poor on long time. The land needed for roads and lanes will be paid for by the Government. This is an old story, for when the Church property was seized, half a century ago, it was to be divided up and distributed among the poor. The result was that hospitals and asylums lost their income and a few men who had been moderately poor became immensely wealthy. The land of Colonel Píoquinto Huasto, in the State of Michoacan, has been seized and divided up by private persons.—General Bernardo Reyes has ended by offering himself as a candidate for the Presidency. In case of his election, he promises to govern independently of any Church or party. A stormy meeting, attended by over a thousand men, protested against Reyes and their former leader, Francisco I. Madero, whom they accused of sacrificing the fruits of the revolution.—Alberto García Granados has been appointed Minister of Government.

Canada.—The political campaign is being conducted vigorously. The Nationalists opened with an immense meeting at Three Rivers, where they laid down the principle that the question before the people is not merely reciprocity, but all the sins of commission and omission of the Government. Mr. Borden takes the same position.

Mr. Monk declared against reciprocity, but was careful to say he was expressing his personal view. Mr. Bourassa and other French-Canadians who followed him did not touch the question. They intend evidently to elect their candidates unpledged in the matter.—The Niobe has reached Halifax safely. The Cornwall, a large training cruiser of the Royal Navy, came to her assistance, but managed to get on the rocks also. She got off, however, in a sufficiently sound condition to help the Niobe. The opponents are making much of the assertion that the Niobe was discharging a political mission when she went aground. The Government, it is said, had sent her to Yarmouth, N. S., to be present at a local fête and thus win popularity. Yarmouth Harbor cannot accommodate so large a ship, so she anchored outside. The officers were attending a ball on shore when orders came to re-join the ship, as a storm was coming up which made it necessary to put to sea. In the confusion the navigating lieutenant was left behind.—The Western crops are in a very critical condition. Black rust has appeared in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. The great danger is, however, the continued cool weather, which threatens to prevent its ripening. This danger is not so great in Manitoba and Eastern Saskatchewan, where the temperature has been higher than in Western Saskatchewan and Alberta. There it has been dropping to about 40 degrees at night and not rising higher than about 60 degrees during the day, which, anyone can see, is not harvest weather. A fortnight's warm, dry weather is absolutely necessary, and as the days pass the chance of getting it diminishes.—Mr. McBride, Conservative Premier of British Columbia, refuses to be a candidate for the Dominion Parliament. As he is looked upon as the coming Conservative leader, his refusal is capable of different interpretations, and each politician chooses that which is most agreeable to his own view of the outcome of the election.

Great Britain.—After a fortnight of talk outside Parliament, the Parliament Bill passed the House of Lords by 131 to 114. The greater number of the Ministers abstained from voting. Some, however, announced that, sooner than have a wholesale creation of peers, they would vote for the Government, and this brought out others to say that, though they had determined to abstain from voting, they would now follow the party of action. Among them was the Duke of Norfolk, who protested against the indecency of pretending sympathy with the young, inexperienced king, anxious to avoid a wholesale creation of peers, as the motive of letting the Bill pass, as if any king, old or young, experienced or inexperienced, could do anything else, under existing constitutional practice, than follow the advice of a Ministry too powerful to be overthrown. The result was that some forty Unionists went with the Government, while ten or twelve followed the Duke of Norfolk's advice and joined Lord Halsbury's party.—The strike which began with the London dock laborers extended to carters and carriers. Some 100,000 men became involved, and a very significant fact is the part taken by the women, who, stirred to frenzy, egged on the men to violence. The strike reduced London to a state almost of famine, as there was no means of moving provisions from the railways and the docks. Similar disorders broke out in Liverpool when it was proposed to bring strike breakers to London. The military were under arms in both places, ready to put down violence. The strike in London has been settled; but that of Liverpool has increased, and the troops had to interfere.

Ireland.—An event of national importance was the opening of Oireachtas week in Dublin, July 29, consisting of competitions in Irish literature, music and art, and educational and industrial exhibits. Lectures were delivered and consultations held on the best methods of hastening the restoration of the Irish language, music and customs, and of developing Irish trade and industries. The exhibitions and exercises showed a considerable advance. Two Gaelic dramas were acted before large audiences, six vigorous Pipers' Bands competed, there was a concert of Irish, Scotch and Breton music, and there were numerous entries in every department of Gaelic story, essay, oratory, music and song. The industrial exhibits showed that nearly every manufactured article in use is made in Ireland, and made well. Various kinds of costumes were displayed with the object of proving that Irish cloths, poplins and lace can be adapted to every requirement of modern dress at cheaper rates and with more satisfactory results than elsewhere. The Oireachtas finished with the Pageant, "A Feis at Tara," representing the literary and musical assemblies in ancient Ireland.—The enactment of the Parliament Bill is regarded in Ireland as the removal of the last obstacle to Home Rule. The Dublin Freeman's Journal says: "The curtain falls on the discomfiture of the Peers, the inveterate enemies of Irish nationality, only to rise straightway on that nationality in its triumph." The Daily Independent declares: "So far as Ireland is concerned, the Lords may keep Home Rule back two years, and a feeble measure, as well as a bold one, will receive the same treatment at their hands. In these circumstances the government should face the question boldly."

Portugal.—Senhor Godinho, at the head of a squad of Carbonari, entered a Lisbon church and arrested seven persons, whom he conveyed to the police station as conspirators. The Commissary released them, for they showed that they had been engaged in devotional exercises which Godinho, not understanding their nature, considered treasonable.—Minister of the Interior Almeida has decreed that no Portuguese citizen shall be permitted to leave the country unless he has a certificate from the police that he is well disposed towards the republic. Some ladies who had started for Spain without the certificate had to spend a night on the benches of a railway waiting room until the necessary documents could be made out in Lisbon and forwarded to them.—The presidential campaign has fairly begun, though no formal nominations have yet been made. Machado dos Santos, the successful leader of the revolution, is out with a signed article to the effect that if Bernardo Machado, Minister of Foreign Relations, becomes President and appoints Affonso Costa, the present Minister of Justice, to the post of Premier, there will be civil war.

Rome.—The eighth anniversary of the Pope's coronation was celebrated by the presence of the diplomatic corps in the Sistine Chapel. The Holy Father was unable to be present on account of his illness. It was reported, however, on that day that the illness was being checked.

France.—In different parts of the country cholera has made its appearance. In Marseilles there were 37 cases, of which 20 were fatal. There were 50 cases at Quimper and 100 at Brest. There is no official admission with regard to Paris, but the death rate is so very much larger than usual from sickness in general, and the authorities are so extraordinarily active in the use of disinfectants that public suspicion has been aroused.—As has been chronicled in all the papers, the effect of Mr. Asquith's speech on the Morocco question had a marvellous effect in tranquillizing France.—The office of Vice-President of the Army Council, which carried with it the command of the northeastern group of armies in time of war, has been abolished. Henceforth the command will vest in an officer who is to be styled Chief of the General Staff of the Army. General Joffre is the first appointee.

Belgium.—An Anglo-Belgian Commission has been appointed to carry out the delimitation of the frontier between Rhodesia and the Belgian Congo. They will work in concert with a Portuguese Commission, which will determine exactly the meeting-point of the British, Belgian and Portuguese possessions.

Germany.—The Morocco transactions are still the one question of supreme importance in German affairs. There runs through the utterances of the press a tone of self-confidence and loyalty to the country's cause which is sufficiently common to be called a national sentiment. Two things, it is evident, are at stake, the national honor and the monied interests. The people will not part with the first, and German capital will not part with the second. The only question is whether a compensation exclusive of Morocco itself should be deemed satisfactory, or whether a portion of these dominions is likewise to be yielded up. There is a strong party in favor of the later contention and refusing to consider a settlement under any other conditions. This later is the attitude of the great iron industries of Germany. Both English and German capital have been striving to influence the diplomatic transactions, and a German organ gave it as its opinion that it was only a question whether France would entrust to England or to Germany its goose which lays the golden eggs. In general, however, after all the interests have been heard, the popular determination seems to be to stand loyally by the government. In opposition to this is the Social-Democratic organ Vorwärts, which is raising at present its hue and cry, calling for a convention of the Reichstag and for popular mass-meetings in agitation against the governmental politics. War sentiments are elsewhere breaking the hush of expectation, but nothing can be done except to await the outcome of the pending transactions. This we still may reasonably believe will be a peaceful one.—It is now made public that a great naval review is to be held in the presence of the Emperor on September 5. One hundred and forty battleships of every description are to take part: cruisers, dreadnoughts, torpedo boats and their destroyers, submarine vessels and sea leviathans of every kind. It is to be the greatest demonstration Germany has hitherto made of her naval power.

Austria-Hungary.—In an article, officially authorized, Austria-Hungary has recently expressed the firm intention of holding to the cause of Germany in the present Morocco crisis, and to use all her influence to bring about an understanding with Paris and London which shall be honorable and satisfactory to Germany.—At Tamesvar calumnies of the vilest nature were spread against two priests, Desider Lamberg and Dr. Anton Geist. The former was accused by a Socialistic paper of sixty foul and hideous moral transgressions against children of his school. The names of twelve of the supposed victims, whom he was said to have seduced, were made public. The parents at once entered a protest and a five days' investigation followed, during which detectives were employed by the Socialist party. Some of the girls had offered to appear as witnesses, but they retracted their accusations and confessed that they had been incited to their action by two unknown men, for whom search is being made by the police. At the close of the investigations the Court declared the total innocence of the accused, and in language of the strongest indignation condemned the calumniators. Dr. Geist was not merely accused of an act of seduction, but was likewise said to have taken his own life as a consequence. This entire story, too, was found to have been manufactured out of whole cloth. According to their usual tactics, the Socialists hereupon protested that the clericals, with the Bishop at their head, had bribed the Court.

Persia.—Major Stokes, resigning his commission in the Indian army, has undertaken to organize a Trésury Gendarmerie among the Persian soldiers. This called forth a vigorous protest from Russia, who is jealous of the growth of British influence in Persia. The situation has been complicated by the reported return into Persia with an armed force of the Ex-Shah Mohammed Ali, who seems to prefer a throne to a pension.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Catholic Press

II.

The story of the Catholic press in Holland is like the story of that press in other countries, where Catholics for centuries were under a ban. Under the Republic of Holland, from 1566 to 1795, that is, for over two hundred years, there was no Catholic press, for the simple reason that no Catholic printing establishment was allowed to exist. Calvinism was rampant and intolerance of the Catholic religion was the law of the land. In the French period, from 1795 to 1813, Catholics could make little use of their partially recovered freedom. Two centuries of oppression had left them dispirited and discouraged. With the accession of King William, in 1813, began the struggle for emancipation, which was crowned with success only at the restoration of the hierarchy in 1853. During this tempestuous period, a convert from Protestantism, Le Sage ten Broek, known as the "Father of the Roman Catholic Press" in Holland, founded, in 1818, the periodical Godsdienstvriend, which contained articles of local interest, recent ecclesiastical happenings, and especially moderate polemics against Protestant and Liberal aggressiveness. It was Le Sage who inspired Catholic periodical literature with life and vigor, and united the efforts of Catholics in the cause of complete religious freedom. The Godsdienstvriend came to an end in 1869, after fifty-one years of honorable service. Out of those stormy times, too, sprang De Katholiek, in 1841, and the daily De Tijd, in 1845, both of which still exist with the record of rendering the cause of emancipation the greatest service of any periodicals in Holland. Nor is Holland to-day a laggard in the race with its fifteen Catholic dailies, one of them issuing a morning and an evening edition, while there are thirty-one papers published in Catholic interests more than once a week, with seventy-six weeklies and some seventy monthlies.

Owing to the penal laws, Ireland, like Holland, had no periodical literature in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Catholic emancipation in 1829 ushered in a new era. In 1834 the Catholic Penny Magazine was started as a weekly in Dublin. But it lasted less than two years. Then came Charles Gavan Duffy's Vindicator in 1839, the Catholic Luminary in 1840, and several others later, which like the last mentioned struggled on for two or three years and then collapsed. It may be hazardous to assign any single cause for the failure of these attempts to maintain for an extended period any of these journals. The famine of '47, which reduced a population which should have been nine millions in 1851 to 6,500,000 in that year, the various political and economic causes which have further reduced the population to about 4,000,000, the extreme poverty of the people, the lack of educational facilities, with the consequent dearth of a reading public, the absorption of the brightest intellects in the abortive struggle for independence in the forties, the struggle for Home Rule, which has been going on since the days of Isaac Butt, all these, perhaps, have worked together to prevent the establishment of a daily or a weekly which would satisfy the purely religious needs and demands of the Catholic population of the Island. However, there are to-day several valuable Catholic quarterlies and monthlies, and in most of the towns weekly newspapers owned by Catholics, and ever ready to support the Catholic cause; in Dublin, in Cork and Belfast there are daily papers animated with the same spirit. Nor should one forget the share Irishmen had in founding and carrying on the Dublin Review in its palmy days, when more than half the contributors were Catholics; nor the aid given to Frederick Lucas, when for lack of English support he transferred the Tablet from London to Dublin in 1849, from which city it continued to be issued till his death in 1855.

In a thoughtful introduction to the article on "Periodical Literature" in "The Catholic Encyclopedia," Dr. Charles G. Herbermann writes that, "almost up to the time of the French Revolution, the periodicals published in Catholic countries were animated by the Catholic spirit and may be regarded as a part of Catholic literature." The reason for this seems to be that there was nothing to call for the militant aggressiveness so characteristic of the Catholic Press of a later day, not only in Protestant countries, where Catholics had to combat for elementary civil and religious rights, but in some Catholic countries as well, when a revolutionary propaganda attempted to supplant the ages of faith by an age of reason or rank infidelity.

The writer on the Catholic Press in Italy states that the modern newspaper had its birth in the first years of the sixteenth century in Venice, where the Government journals were at first issued for the most part in manuscript. In 1538 private enterprise supplanted municipal control, though Government surveillance continued until the middle of the eighteenth century to give them an official character. Strange to say it is in Italy that we first find specimens of the "yellow" journalism, with which recent times have made us more familiar; for as early as 1578 Gregory XIII issued a Bull against the journalists who spread the true and false scandals of society and the court and pandered to the scandal-loving public of the time. Towards the close of the eighteenth century the need of a conservative Catholic Press was first made manifest. This need became still more urgent after the Revolution of 1848. On the return of Pius IX the Giornale di Roma was founded in the city of the Popes (1850-1865), to which was added an evening paper, the Osservatore Romano, which, when the Giornale was suspended, became the organ of the Pontifical Government. During the pontificate of Pius IX, and that of Leo XIII, numerous Catholic journals and newspapers of varying intervals of publication sprang up in all the great centres throughout United Italy. The number of these increased steadily, despite the governmental and sectarian hostility manifested towards them. To-day in the geographical distribution of Catholic papers an enormous disproportion exists between the north and the south; but this again is but a reflex of the times and of the apathy of the people distracted by changes of government and by legislators who do not represent the country for which they legislate, and are in steady opposition to the Faith which the vast majority of the people profess.

Until recently the Catholic Press in Portugal made a fair showing both in the cities and in the provinces. But before promulgating the Separation Law, Affonso Costa committed "the revolting injustice," says a writer in the Dublin Review, "of suppressing the entire Catholic Press of the country." In town or country there is not left a single Catholic newspaper. In the early part of the nineteenth century the Catholic Press became an absolute necessity; but the several so-called Catholic papers were unfortunately devoted almost entirely to politics and exercised little religious influence on the nation. Liberal newspapers were first anti-monarchical rather than anti-Catholic, but ere long liberalism in politics came to mean liberalism in religion as well. The secular press became more and more irreligious and expanded rapidly whereas, owing doubtless to political dissensions and animosities among Catholics themselves, the Catholic papers received but little support. If the Catholic Press had limited itself to religious and social questions and had laid aside the methods in which it identified religion with the monarchy, it might have exercised some influence over those who had not altogether lost Christian sentiments.

Poland, notwithstanding her dismemberment, has displayed enormous activity, in fact the great period of her progress began only in 1864, and continues down to our own day. Here, too, the political conditions of the countries which have annexed Poland are seen in her journalistic output. In Galicia (Austria) the Catholic Press is entirely free, while in Russia and in Germany it is subject to a severe censorship. Yet in Warsaw, Russian-Poland, in 1904, there were published 9 dailies, 33 weeklies, 7 fortnightlies and 5 monthly periodicals.

The first periodical appeared in Spain in 1661, but the Catholic Press as we now have it did not exist until the attacks of the gallicizing Liberals and Voltaireans upon the Catholic Religion aroused Catholics to action. Forty-eight Catholic dailies are now published in Spain, which may be grouped as Integrist, Jaimist and Independent. The present outlook is hopeful, though the uncertainty enveloping the political horizon makes it extremely difficult to say anything with certainty.

In Switzerland the Catholic Press grew very rapidly, especially during the Swiss Kulturkampf of the seventies. Its present condition bears favorable comparison with the Catholic Press elsewhere. According to the census of 1910 Switzerland has about 3,700,000 inhabitants, of whom 1,500,000 are Catholics. The trouble there seems to be that the Catholics are not supporters of their own press, though it is earnest and courageous, and on the whole able and efficient. The daily non-Catholic press of Switzerland includes 67 newspapers, most of them hostile to the Church and ready to resume the Kulturkampf; opposed to which are 12 Catholic dailies, where if the numerical proportion of Catholics were maintained there would be 20 Catholic dailies, with three times the present circulation.

We have reserved for the last a few remarks on the Catholic Press in Austria, because it presents features strikingly analogous to the state of affairs in the United States. In that country apart from other periodicals there are 140 newspapers, 79 in German, 22 in Bohemian, 16 in Polish, 3 in Ruthenian, 8 in Slovenian, 5 in Croatian and 7 in Italian. Similarly in the United States the Catholic Press is represented by newspapers and periodicals in English, German, French, Polish, Bohemian, Italian, Slavonic, Magyar, Dutch, Croatian, Spanish and Indian, and of these 13 are dailies and 115 weeklies. Of the dailies 7 are French, 4 Polish, 2 German and 1 Bohemian. The Catholic daily in English is still a dream.

The actual condition of the Catholic Press in Austria is far from satisfactory. There is first, the lack of funds; zealous Catholics are largely found among the rural population, who care little for newspapers, whereas in the United States the Catholic population is largely in the big cities, where most of the Catholics have grown accustomed to looking to the great daily, not only for the current events of secular import, but for news about Church happenings as well. In both countries it is difficult to enlist the cooperation of Catholic writers, who find ready and remunerative positions with the great secular press, and who are not prepared to make the sacrifice necessary to devote their talents to papers that are perpetually in a state either of actual financial embarrassment or bordering on it. In both countries numerous racial divisions, which are naturally destructive of social unity, prevent Catholics from working together for their common or individual interests. Thus the force which unity in the Faith gives them is shattered by the lack of a common medium of expression, the possession of which would render their numerical preponderance ten times more effective. In Austria the result of present conditions is embarrassment, as it is in the United States. What course Catholic editors in Austria should adopt is a question which prominent Catholics there are grappling with to-day, hoping for, rather than foreseeing, a clear way out of their difficulties. How our American editors are to improve the present condition of the Catholic Press in the United States will be one of the happy results that may be looked forward to from their deliberations at the American Federation of Catholic Societies next week in Columbus.

Albania's Approaching Autonomy

Albania, as a nation, has asserted its claim, and no international pact, no patronizing counsel can henceforth relegate it to the status of a mere parcel of Turkey. Blood has been shed in abundance, captured rebels have been crucified, mutilated, buried alive, and still the Albanians go on fighting. They have been advised to cease, and to submit, but they refuse to share the confidence of the Great Powers in the good intentions of Turkey's "Reformers." An Albanian proverb says: "Nothing can be done against the man ready to die." And the despair which drove them to action has produced a fair measure of success. After a protracted campaign the Porte is gently climbing down from original pretensions. In the conciliation treaty a reluctant permission is ceded to those Albanians to carry arms "whose calling renders it necessary or expedient." Considering that all Albanians are mountaineers and herdsmen, and that wolves are not unknown in these regions, it is no wonder that the interpretation of this clause will leave the "Sons of Eagles" in full possession of their weapons just as heretofore. And this after the parade of disarmament last year!

A mistrust, born of experience, hampers the parley of the belligerents, and nobody believes that the truce will be final. The movement, started in the north, has spread to the Mohammedan populations of the south. These demand that the posts of confidence held in Albania by Turks should be entrusted to Albanian followers of the Prophet. This pretension is taken at Constantinople as evidence that the Albanian, whether Moslem or Christian, is not to be relied upon, and that the old method of exterminating the enemy is the only one that can bring safety. Again, the promise that the Albanian Latin schools of Goritsa and Elbassan may be re-opened is not credited by the people who saw them forcibly closed. There is no longer any mention, it is true, of teaching by means of the Arab alphabet, but this is a negative consolation. The Malissoris who took refuge in Montenegro, over eight thousand in number, are not eager to return to their devastated homes on the strength of the assurances given by the devastators. Turkey refuses to indemnify Montenegro for the support of these unfortunates, mainly women and children who fled before her torch and sword. She thinks it a bad precedent for future complications.

Montenegro has stood bravely by its struggling Christian neighbors. With pride it can register that its first grave step as a kingdom was to befriend a downtrodden race possibly inspired by its example. While there is no direct proof that Turget Shevket's troops were attacked, as he asserts, by a purely Montenegrin force, in a combat that lasted three hours, there is no doubt that numerous Montenegrin volunteers were among the Albanian rebels. Nor were they confined to Catholic sympathizers moved by the wrongs of their co-religionists, the Mirdites and Malissoris. In this part of the Balkans there is harmony between the different Christian creeds. Greek-Orthodox and Roman unite to repulse the flouter of Christ, the spoliator of the poor. The sturdy Press of Cetinje, at the risk of involving Montenegro in a most unequal war, told the truth to Europe, and defeated the efforts of the Constantinople journals to minimize the horrors of Shevket's reprisals on the goaded rebels. The Turkish Jeni Gazette now admits the truth of many incriminating statements it formerly denied, and calls on Hakki Pasha to retire from office and let Young Turkey vindicate itself. Hakki Pasha, however, continues to govern and to blunder. He has just launched an attainder against the Albanian representative, Deputy Ismail Kemal, actually on a mission to the Powers on behalf of the Albanians.

The united intervention of Russia, Austria and Italy for the cessation of hostilities is recognized by the Porte, whose interests it seemed to serve, as a dangerous manifestation of the tutorship Young Turkey disdains. Once more the Christian nations of Europe have been compelled to interfere between their co-religionists and the Ottoman Government. Once more a compromise will be effected that can have but one result: ultimate emancipation of a people struggling against Turkish misrule. England's attitude in the present case, as voiced by Sir Edward Grey, resembles that adopted by her towards Greece in 1821. Unfortunately there is no Canning today to emphasize the situation.

More tangible and immediate help is forthcoming from Albania's small neighbor, the kingdom of Montenegro. Its army, restricted in number, but portentous as a grain of leaven for the Serbs and other Christian nationalities throughout the Empire, consists of 54 battalions, each of 56 companies; 6 hill and 9 field batteries; in all 45,000 regulars. These, the "first call," are easily augmented by the "second call" to 70,000 men if required. Under no circumstances is it possible to consider this force, the nearest to the seat of disturbance, as directed against the revolted Albanians.

An attempt to obtain from the Albanian chief, Isse Boletinats, anything that might be construed as a surrender has failed absolutely and indisputably. Invited to yield up even a dagger, failing an old blunderbuss, or other obsolete weapon, while retaining unmolested his quick-firing gun, Isse replied that while a sword remained suspended to Shevket Pasha's belt he would not part with a breadknife! In vain was the sum of fifty Turkish pounds—wealth to an Albanian—allotted to Isse for his burned-down roof; the old chief says that each of his compatriots who suffered likewise must not only be compensated for losses in the past, but given some security for the future—such a security as is not bought with money.

Among the heterogeneous crowd forced to wear the Turkish uniform the presence of Albanians or Albanian sympathizers is proved by the fact that 2,000 conscripts recently purchased exemption at the rate of thirty pounds each. Large contingents of Asiatic troops have been summoned to replace them. In the face of all this it is hardly likely that the Albanian question will be shelved for any length of time. The world is now cognisant of the fact that yet another race under Moslem rule is determined to breathe freely on God's earth.

The fight may be suspended, postponed or slackened for a time. Turkey may multiply its promises and double-dealing, but Albania, as an autonomic entity, is a certainty of the future.

BEN HURST.

Caillaux, Prime Minister of France

A short time ago a prowling camera fiend made a snap-shot of Monsieur Caillaux. The papers published the picture, but printed under it: "This is not a caricature." They were prudent. For the man who has so suddenly leaped into fame looks like a dapper little dandy emerging from a band-box. A slender figure, faultlessly attired, descending the steps of the Palais Bourbon, bending gracefully as he opens his sunshade or umbrella, which he holds with exquisite daintiness on the very tips of his fingers, his gaze meantime turned inquiringly to the sky above, a shining top-hat on his head to increase his height, for he is small of stature; his hands and feet encased in the latest triumphs of the glover's and bootmaker's art, his trousers sartorial dreams, his immaculate waistcoat, supplemented by a four-in-hand, all conspire to make him a thing of beauty, a dear Beau Brummel, a finished fashion-plate in motion, designed to turn the most successful leader of the smart set green. Such is the person, at least exteriorly, to whom the old President of the French Republic, Fallières, so careless of his own attire, has given the commission of saving France.

He has been long in sight, but this last accession is sudden. In 1889, when people were tired of seeing the same old faces on the rungs of the political ladder, the cry was raised: "Make way for the young men!" The result is that since then every Frenchman is tempted to say with Madame de Staël: "I am delighted to make new acquaintances. At least I am sure that they cannot be worse than those I met before." But he would be mistaken. Universal suffrage persists in replacing the old spavined politicians by frantic revolutionists, whose strength is chiefly in their vociferation. They all look alike. They are all anxious to let the public see and hear them, and are all hungry for portfolios. They are new at the business but are withered and wrinkled before their time. They are able to talk but incapable of belief. Whether camping on the mountain of the ministry or crouching on the radical low-lands, or crowing in the Socialist barnyard, you can see at a glance that they are deputies only for what is in it, and that the turn of a hand would have landed them in any other party than the one whose principles they shout for.

Caillaux is one of the throng. He never loses a chance to reinforce his reputation as a serious politician and a reliable statesman. For that purpose he keeps on his desk the works of Colbert, the great financier of Louis XIV, fully convinced that Caillaux is better than Colbert.

He was born at Mans in '63, but has been in politics only since '98, and was no sooner Deputy than Waldeck-Rousseau made him Minister of Finance. Fortune was good to him at the start, and has never failed him since, putting as a condition, however, that he must change frequently, but should always stick no matter what happens. He made the compact, and for the last thirteen years has displayed the most remarkable adhesiveness to all sorts of posts. He is ready always with the buoyancy of youth or the serenity of age, as the circumstances require. He is invariably in luck, and it happens commonly that just at the moment the sovereign people seem about to rise in their wrath to shout: "What a scatter-brain!" the words die on their lips and they hail him as a wonderful statesman.

In a marvellously short space he has been a Conservative tinged with Buonapartism; a Rallié about whom there is suspicion; a hesitating Republican; a Radical not yet sufficiently convinced; then, after a short spell, a daring Socialist, and when he dreaded what the down and outs in politics call the ingratitude of universal suffrage, he returned to where he had started, so as to ensure a gilded and comfortable retreat in the tranquillity of private life, to which, however, he has not yet been consigned.

The great banking concerns "Le Crédit Foncier Égyptien" and "Le Crédit Foncier Argentin" assure him of his future. He is President of the first and one of the Administrators of the second, which means that the Caillaux who railed at the people who trusted in banks and old stockings now blames them for not doing so. The quondam enemy of plutocrats and capitalists is now their crony. He advises them to beware of the Income Tax, and yet fills them with terror by the Bill he is said to be preparing for Parliament. He is the Jekyll and Hyde of French politics.

Everything that he opposed in 1899 and 1904 he advocated in 1907. When you ask him about his views on the financial condition of the country, he will assure you, with a twinkle in his eye and a finality in his voice: "Those questions I have long studied, weighed seriously, and know perfectly." When you inquire about his shiftings and turnings, he tells you that for him "the study of fiscal matters is a fine art." Of the many bad forms of Income Tax he has chosen the worst. His preference is for the progressive, the absolutely comprehensive, the pestilently vexatious and the inquisitorial. He has, however, the trick of uttering the most contradictory theories in the same breath. He can throw a panic into the capitalists and then assure them that the Income Tax will be felt chiefly by the middle class, and when the middle class rise up in arms he will declare that he means people with a revenue of 50,000 francs, and meantime, while appearing to attack both the rich and the fairly well to do, he makes his position solid with the Socialists.

His optimism is one of his most curious accomplishments. His presumption is imperturbable. He is like a barometer which indicates fair weather when the thunder is rumbling overhead. The deeper the nation plunges into debt the more radiant he grows. Unlike Brisson, who, with a rueful countenance, would groan out "All is well"; Caillaux is beaming when everything is going to rack and ruin. As far back as 1900 he added 58 millions to the budget, and then piled on another 17 millions, but coolly reminded Parliament that the budget showed the extreme care that had always guided him in limiting the expenses of the Government. Before elections he can convince the voters that he has a surplus of two or three hundred millions, which turn out, when his party has swept the country, to be just that much deficit. He is essentially a modern Minister, a financier ahead of the age, an American plunger resident in France. Some think he is a financier in the interests of Socialism. In fact, when he is asked, "Where will you get the money?" his answer is: "The rich will pay it." Now that he is an official, however, he is careful to tell the moneyed interests that "if God, the electors and Parliament grant him life, the financial condition will be still better in the future"—not a hard thing to promise. To a foreigner Joseph Caillaux seems to be working for Caillaux all the time.

He is as bald as Cæsar and as diminutive as Alexander; but in nothing is he so great as in the opinion he has of himself. He is convinced that he was born for greatness and chiefly to regenerate France. A cruel critic describes him as hopping into the tribune like a magpie on a hummock, emphasizing with dainty gestures the aphorisms which he declaims with the voice of a tenorino. His speech, which is facile, is without elegance, clean cut without brilliancy, and a trifle vulgar when he expounds his financial theories, which a gust of wind would reveal shivering with cold beneath the rags with which he invests them. When he is at his best in oratory one is tempted to say: "Not bad, but not as good as Cruppi." He himself would admit that he does not shine as a speaker, and is convinced that modesty becomes him best, though he would whisper that under his breath. His retorts are bitter; his voice shrill and rasping, but he is on the safe side when the fight is over. When victory is assured his haughtiness is oppressive, and when the ballot is in doubt, he is a model of humility. He is ready for anything except relinquishing his portfolio, and his habits are luxurious as becomes a Napoleon of Finance.

Such an estimate of its foremost statesman France would resent were it made by a foreigner, but it is the opinion of the great Parisian review Le Correspondent, and was given to the public before Caillaux stepped into the shoes of the unfortunate Monis, who was prostrated by a monoplane. What he will do in his more exalted position remains to be seen.

Food for Babes *

This is a golden age for children. They are become such popular idols that large numbers of their elders are of the opinion that a gifted pen can find no better employment than writing for the amusement and instruction of the little ones. So the shelves of libraries are already groaning under long rows of magazines for children, stories for children, histories for children, anthologies for children, scientific works for children and now a "Children's Encyclopædia" has appeared in which two editors-in-chief assisted by fifteen departmental contributors have undertaken to pack into twenty-four good-sized volumes everything that can interest or entertain a child. All the fields of literature and of human activity have been laid under requisition, so a rich variety of facts and fancies are presented in an attractive form. Much of the compiling and adapting has been excellently done. Good taste is shown in the choice of verse, most of which is really poetry; as many fairy stories are told as the most imaginative boy or girl could desire, and enough games, riddles, problems, and the like are given to last a dozen arctic winters. High praise is due the editors for the beauty, number and variety of the illustrations, which always throw light on the text—as illustrations should, after all—and make the Encyclopædia a treasure trove of attractive pictures.

In observing how many of the world's great stories and dramas have been summarized here for young readers, one wonders whether the children who make their own from this Encyclopædia a digest of "Hamlet" or "Rob Roy," will ever care to hear any more about them. Boys of thirty years ago whose literary taste was formed by reading entire works of Scott and Shakespeare surely entered youth with a far better intellectual equipment than will many a possessor even of this voluminous Encyclopædia, for the mere acquirement of information is not education and culture.

So far, so good. But when the departments devoted to history, biography and science are perused, the Catholic reviewer is forced to mix some censure with his praise. It is plain that the projectors of "The Book of Knowledge" realized that in these places wary walking would be necessary if they meant to make the Children's Encyclopædia a commercial success; and considering the size of the work, it must be owned that they have succeeded pretty well in avoiding what would be stones of offense to Catholics. The manner, for instance, that the story of Guy Fawkes is told, is an amusing example of how eager the editors are to conciliate Catholic readers, though it is regrettable that they have allowed the objectionable term "Romanist" to slip into this article.

* The Book of Knowledge. The Children's Encyclopædia. Editors-in-chief, Arthur Mee, Temple Chambers, London; Holland Thompson, Ph.D., The College of the City of New York; with an introduction by John H. Finley, LL.D., President of the College of the City of New York. The Grolier Society, New York. The Educational Book Co., London. Vols. I to XII, inclusive.

Since English literature, as Cardinal Newman reminds us, is in the main Protestant, it is not surprising to find that a Protestant and rationalistic atmosphere pervades even a Children's Encyclopædia. For it is natural virtue merely that is held up for admiration; it is to the religious revolt of the sixteenth century, as is often implied, that the world owes all its liberty, happiness and prosperity, and Protestants or unbelievers are the subjects of nearly all the biographical sketches. A few Catholic saints appear, indeed, but their lives are made to read like fairy stories. Father Damien, however, is sympathetically treated, and so is Blessed Joan of Arc, but when children read under a beautiful picture of St. Louis that "though a devout Roman Catholic, he was not influenced by the Pope," their young minds will conceive ideas of that holy monarch's Catholicity that may never be set right; for of a king who always acknowledged the supreme authority of the See of Peter, who secured the Pope's leave before taxing the French clergy for the Crusades, and who defended Innocent IV against the German Emperor, it can hardly be said with truth that he was "not influenced by the Pope." It may also be remarked that when children read that St. Celestine was frightened by scheming cardinals into laying down the tiara, they are not reading true history.

Another glaring misstatement of fact that should be corrected can be found in the account of "The Men who Mapped the Skies," where it is asserted that Giordano Bruno "was burnt to death for upholding the Copernican theory." This, of course, is not the case. It was for denying the Divinity of Our Lord and other fundamental dogmas of Christianity that Bruno, according to the laws of his age, was burned at the stake in Rome—a fate he perhaps escaped in England and Germany for similar offences.

Then follows in the same article the stereotyped Galileo story of anti-Catholic controversy. To illustrate the text a striking picture of that obstinate astronomer's condemnation is given bearing the inscription: "The Trial of Galileo who was tortured for telling the truth," to assert which, however, is not "telling the truth," for tortured he never was, nor till Galileo had been a hundred years dead did anyone hear him saying "under his breath," as the children are told: "And yet it does move." It is worthy of note in this connection that while the Church's blindness and intolerance in Galileo's case are descanted on at some length, not a word is said, when treating of Kepler's career, of how warm the Lutherans made it for him.

In chapters and paragraphs bearing on the sixteenth century rebellion against the Church's authority, though considerable care has evidently been taken to be moderate in the expression of views, the danger of understatement or of exaggeration, while trying to be concise and simple, has not always been avoided. For instance, there is room for a wide difference of opinion, to put it mildly, as to whether John Huss died "for the truth," or as to whether England's absolution from heresy by Cardinal Pole was a national calamity comparable to John Lackland's making his kingdom a fief of the Holy See, or as to whether Luther's was really the first readable German Bible to come from the press, and other statements of the kind. Then, too, it is to be feared that an impressionable child will rise from the reading of many pages in the "Book of Knowledge" with the conviction that the main occupation of the Catholic Church through the course of her history, has been fiercely persecuting men who were far purer, nobler and wiser than the persecutors themselves, and this may so prejudice against the Church of his fathers many a youthful reader of this Encyclopædia, as to put an effectual barrier to his subsequently learning the truth.

So while the editors and compilers of the "Book of Knowledge" have doubtless labored hard to make its volumes safe guides for little readers of any creed or of none at all, there seem to be indications of considerable carelessness and inaccuracy when touching on questions or events in which the Church had a part, that frequent reference to a work like "The Catholic Encyclopædia" would have prevented. For just as prudent editors who are seeking accurate information about the present state of our knowledge of electricity would be sure to apply to a distinguished specialist in that branch of science, should not the same wisdom suggest their consulting on Catholic questions Catholic authorities, rather than accepting without reserve the time-worn calumnies and falsehoods, that lie embalmed in the books written by the Church's ignorant or malicious enemies? If such precautions should be taken in compiling any book of knowledge whatsoever, how much more needed are they when it is a Children's Encyclopædia that is being edited, for who are more disposed than our little ones to believe that whatever is down in print must be so, and "what's said three times is true"?

Gubernatorial Pardons

It is affirmed, and with a generality that makes one hesitate to pronounce the judgment an unfounded expression of the chronic fault-finder, that the ancient respect of Americans for the law is fast passing out of the characteristic life of our countrymen. The reproach concerns too important a phase of the social and moral status of the American people to permit its off-hand acceptance or rejection; but here and there evidences do crop out which dispose one to concede a certain misgiving lest the point be well taken.

The Governor in one of our Eastern States, a man who, for one reason or another, has been much in the limelight for the past two years, proclaims that he has in six months let out of jail, by using his pardoning power, as many convicted criminals as his predecessor did in a year. The obvious complacency with which he boasts of his course implies a conscious personal assurance of the rectitude as well as of the prudence of the policy he has followed. In explanation and justification of that policy the Governor protests his belief that the system obtaining in the majority of the penal institutions of to-day merely punishes the criminal; that there is neither a deterrent nor a corrective influence exercised in them to legitimize the harshness of restrictions put upon evil-doers in the methods used by society to vindicate respect for its laws.

That there is room for change in the matter of prison management, as well as of reform in the conditions surrounding men condemned to pay the penalty for violating the law, is a sentiment commonly enough expressed. Yet one may question whether the manner of furthering this reform adopted by the Executive of Massachusetts will appeal to even the most advanced among penologists.

It is easy enough to sentimentalize concerning the remnants of goodness and of honor surviving in all save the most depraved of men and to plead that a chance should be given to the law-breaker,—but has not society its claim as well as the criminal? As a writer in the New York Times suggests: "A gubernatorial pardon should remedy the law's mistakes and not bring the law to nothing. It needs to have behind it something more than the belief that our treatment of criminals is unwise, and that our prisons and reformatories could be better managed. If that were enough, every Governor could find warrant for making a general jail delivery at once—a proceeding that, with good reason, would cause public alarm, amounting almost to a panic."

American admirers of Tom Paine, if there are any left, will find it difficult to continue such if they still cling to any old-fashioned notions of patriotism. The New York Evening Post of August 9 informs us that after describing the Father of his Country, as "one who put all those men called kings to shame," Paine changed his tune, and addressing Washington directly, said: "As to you, Sir, treacherous in private friendship, and a hypocrite in public life, the world will be puzzled to decide whether you are an apostate or an imposter, whether you have abandoned good principles or whether you ever had any."

The President had refused to make him Postmaster-General, and would not interfere when Paine had embroiled himself with the French Government. So that after all the author of the Age of Reason was merely a common self-seeking politician.

Lay Apostleship in South India

The Jesuit College at Trichinopoly is an important centre of Catholic education and religious zeal in South India. Ever since its foundation sixty-five years ago, the chief care of the Fathers has been to impart a thorough training, intellectual and religious, to the Catholic students, and to inspire them with zeal to propagate the Faith, which they, among so many of their countrymen, are privileged to possess; in short to make them lay apostles in their after life among the pagans. For a long time, however, the appeal for apostleship fell on deaf ears; but during the last few years a movement of Catholic zeal and activity is in evidence among the undergraduates, and promises soon to extend to the former pupils all over the Presidency. Some account of its beginning and progress may interest all readers of AMERICA.

It was during the latter half of 1903 that the movement was heralded by a desire expressed by a few undergraduates to do some work of apostleship. The Fathers exhorted them to undertake the teaching of catechism to poor children; the idea was soon taken up and realized. Under the guidance of a competent director, the senior students formed themselves into an organization of voluntary catechists, and undertook to teach elementary catechism to all the neglected children in the town and the adjoining villages. It was an immediate success, and became, as it were, a souvenir of the jubilee of the Immaculate Conception, 1904. Soon some Catholic graduates employed in the town followed the example of their younger brethren, and thus the movement began to spread.

The missionary Fathers, who were watching the movement with much interest, were thereafter relieved of their onerous work to a great extent, and they took every means to encourage and promote this new activity. The Bishop of Trichinopoly and His Excellency, the Delegate of the East Indies, praised and blessed the association; and ever since then the Lay Apostleship has continued to prosper in South India.

The great jubilee of the Apparitions of Lourdes was a golden opportunity to give a fresh impetus to the movement of lay apostolate, begun just four years ago. Accordingly, as a permanent remembrance of "The Great Mission of Our Lady," a small magazine, dedicated to her honor, was started. It was to be an organ of the Sodality and an efficient means of promoting the students' interest in Catholic journalism. Under the auspicious title of The Morning Star this magazine keeps its readers in touch with the various developments of Catholic activity among the College students, and has already contributed much to make these "new ideas" familiar to Catholics all over South India.

To keep up the zeal of our young men during vacation days (which they spend at home), there is another organization, called the League of Charity. Its members undertake to distribute among Catholics and non-Catholics tracts and pamphlets on doctrinal and controversial subjects. Moreover, on leaving the College for the holidays, the members propose to themselves various undertakings of zeal and charity, such as teaching catechism, visiting and comforting the sick, baptizing pagan children at the point of death, and even bringing non-Catholics to the knowledge of the true religion. From time to time the members inform the Director of the nature and success of their private activities, and receive from him advice and direction. The sum total of the results thus achieved is then published in the Star, and this affords a mighty incentive for others to work in the same field.

Another important step was taken during the past year. The problem of conversion in India began to be studied systematically, and, through the columns of the Morning Star, experienced priests and laymen were invited to contribute towards explaining the mysterious barrenness of missionary labors in India. Why India is not converted is a question too complex to be solved in a short time. However, one of the many contributions on the subject deserves special attention. It was from the learned pen of a prominent former pupil, Dewan Bahadur L. D. Swamicannu Pillay, M.A., LL.B. He had read and studied Father Palau's famous book "Le Catholique d'action," which has everywhere been hailed as "the twentieth century Imitation," and which he (Mr. Swamicannu) called "the layman's Imitation." Applying Father Palau's teaching to India and Indian Catholics, he said: "If I may give the answer in two borrowed words, it (the reason why India is not converted) is the Catholic layman's inaction, and what we are in need of as a remedy are good 'Catholics in action.' Educated men, above all, ought to be made to ask themselves frequently, nay every hour, the question, 'What am I doing for the Catholic Church, and for this or that association to which I belong?' . . . My scheme is this: Let a few young Catholic graduates, imbued with a spirit of self-sacrifice and humility—these are necessary assets more difficult to procure than money—offer themselves to undergo a post-graduate course of two years . . . in what are called Catholic sciences, namely, philosophy, theology, Holy Scriptures, Church History, etc. They cannot undergo complete courses in these subjects in two years, but they may learn enough to help them in controversy with Protestants and non-Catholics. Thus armed, they would go into the ordinary vocations of the world, but with the special mission of making inroads into Hinduism and Protestantism . . ."

This scheme has not been yet realized; but a very practical step towards it has been taken in the formation of a new association, called "The Catholic Truth Society." Its members meet once a fortnight and take part in discussions or lectures on Catholic and missionary subjects. The best lectures are then published in pamphlet form and circulated among all classes of readers. This is the latest development of Lay Apostleship begun in St. Joseph's seven years ago. And we confidently hope that in a few more years the scheme of a post-graduate course in Catholic sciences will be brought to a practical issue, and be the crowning point of a movement, silent and modest, yet big with promises of greater achievements in the cause of the Church in India.

Such manifestations of Catholic zeal may be a matter of course in a Catholic country; but in a missionary country like India their spiritual significance can be gauged and appreciated only by those that have grown gray amidst the aridity of lay apostolate among the native Catholics. No one, of course, expects this humble movement to result in the wholesale conversion of pagans in South India. But it will at least make individual Catholics zealous for their Faith; and this is already very much. The dictum of His Holiness Pope Pius X: "The greatest need of the day is Catholic laymen," is specially applicable to India, with its teeming millions of pagans.

When the movement of Lay Apostleship, which is already making way among the many former pupils of the College, shall have imparted an ardent, apostolic zeal to native Catholics all over the Presidency, we may reckon the dawn of a new era of missionary success in South India.

Rome is Quiet Civilly

ROME, July 23, 1911.

Civilly Rome is quiet, both because Parliament is adjourned and because the heat discourages polemics. There seems a bit of a tempest brewing over the recall of Baron Mayor des Planches, remembered at Washington as dean of its diplomatic corps, from his post of Ambassador to Constantinople. His successor, Signor Emilio Garroni, is a strong personal friend of the Prime Minister, Giolitti, and though a man of considerable ability, his appointment is widely attacked in the press as based upon the personal political gain of Giolitti and not upon the competency of the appointee, and that at a moment particularly critical for Italian interests in the Orient.

Naples the unterrified is still struggling against the sanitary precautions of the Government. In spite of the Prefect's threat to declare the port infected, in case of further recalcitrancy, the commercial organizations have declared one day of universal strike and lockout as a protest against the political conspiracy, as they aver, to rob Naples of her commercial prestige and transfer her trade to rival ports. Tourists who have recently passed through the city report it as still unspeakably unclean, and of a surety the cholera will not down. Here's a state of things that would douche with cold water the ambitions of most men to rule the queenly city on its bay of unrivalled beauty. It obviously needs a year of a Colonel Waring.

In a recent letter to AMERICA was noted the fact that the Commune of Venice was insisting upon retaining religious teaching in the primary schools. Well, it seems they are not to have it. The situation is peculiar and suggestive of governmental policy. The legal regulation of 1908 left religious teaching in such schools, wherever the majority of the commune did not call for its removal. In conformity with this regulation, Venice wished to retain the teaching, and the provincial educational council decided that it should take place within school hours. Then one Vittorio Pellizzoni, whoever he may be, appealed to the Minister of Education, who annulled the decision of the provincial council. The commune of Venice then took the matter to the Council of State, which has just rendered a decision turning down the appeal. This is sheer blindness: for besides the fact that you cannot dragoon a majority of the community, even a Catholic majority, into a surrender of their legal rights, if ever a class showed the need of religious education it is the graceless scamps in Italy turned out of the irreligious school-room. Furthermore, here at Rome measures are being taken to force the private Catholic schools to throw out their present text-book of the history of Italy, because forsooth it does not sufficiently exalt the ineffable blessings consequent upon the uprising which resulted in the existence of United Italy. The book in question is the work of Father Fidelis Savio, the professor of history at the Gregorian University, a scholar whose judgment is sought on matters of accurate research in the history of Italy by fellow-scholars of every shade of personal and political conviction. It is a true word uttered by many a Catholic in Italy: "We are in the hands of our enemies."

At the anniversary Mass for Leo XIII, on July 20, the Sistine Chapel was filled with all the ecclesiastical distinction of Rome. The Noble Guard, the Switzers and the Papal Gendarmes attended under their respective commandants, the religious orders were represented by their General Superiors, and the entire household of the Pope by its chief members. The holy Father presided on his throne during the Mass, assisted by Cardinal Rampolla. Cardinal Vincenzo Vannutelli sang the Mass. Mgr. Perosi himself directed the famous Sistine choir, which sang, as it does each year on this occasion, the Mass which Perosi composed for the funeral service of Leo.

Father Giovanni Genocchi sailed from Genoa to South America the same day, on a special mission for the Holy Father in behalf of the aborigines. There are hundreds of thousands of these poor souls in the inner parts of the continent, and their condition, owing to the greed of many of the settlers and the oppressive cruelty of others, is a deplorable one for soul and body. The Franciscans, Augustinians, Dominicans and, of recent years particularly, the Salesians have labored industriously in their scattered missions for the betterment of the native. But the Holy Father desires a detailed report on the entire situation, with a view to enlarging and improving the efficiency of the work done there. His commissioner is a fortunate choice. A man who has given his life to that class of work, of wide experience in the mission fields in Mahometan Asia as well as in New Guinea, he brings to his task a full knowledge of the difficulties of the problem and a warm sympathy with the toiling missionary and his scattered flock of untutored souls.

The Congregation of Rites has issued a decree forbidding the publication of any of the ritual books of the liturgical service of the Church unless with the imprimatur of the Ordinary, to be given only after a competent revisor has declared upon comparison with the "Typical Edition" its exact conformity with the same. The "Typical Edition" is to be published only from the Vatican Polyglot Press or by such publishers as obtain leave for its publication from the Congregation of Rites. This edition is to be published only after its sheets have been submitted to the Congregation and approved by respective Commissions appointed for that purpose. Two copies of each "Typical Edition" are to be deposited in the archives of the Congregation.

The Cardinal Secretary of State has authorized Mgr. Eshes, the author of the recent commentary on the Acts of the Council of Trent, to declare that the Corrispondenza di Roma has no official character whatever, but is a private publication on its own responsibility, and that the confidence of the Vatican in all the German bishops and German Catholics has not been shaken in the least by any clamor or controversy in the press. The Corrispondenza is a news-letter published from time to time on ecclesiastical affairs and edited, it is commonly understood in Rome, by Mgr. Benigni. The news therein has been commonly accurate, and, from the fact that the editor was last year an undersecretary in the Cardinal's office, doubtless arose the misapprehension as to its character. There has been some friction between the Corrispondenza and the Catholic press of Germany.

On the feast of St. Vincent de Paul, in the Consistorial Hall of the Vatican, in the presence of the Holy Father and a most distinguished assembly of ecclesiastics and religious, was promulgated the decree of the Congregation of Rites solemnly affirming proof of the heroic virtues of the Venerable Servants of God, Louise de Marillac Legras, associated with St. Vincent de Paul in the foundation of the Sisters of Charity, and Mary of the Incarnation (Marie Guyart-Martin), foundress of the community of Ursulines at Quebec. By a happy providence Archbishop Bruchési of Montreal was in Rome for the occasion, and to him was assigned the office of thanking the Holy Father for the decree. C. M.

Sidelights on China's New Cabinet

SHANGHAI, July 10, 1911.

The daily attendance at the palace by the Ministers of State is just like a farce, for the President and the Vice-Presidents occupy an apartment of the Cabinet, and the so-called Ministers of State are given another apartment, the two forming two separate groups, isolated as it were from one another. When a decree is issued, requiring the signature of a certain Minister or Ministers, he or they are called in to sign it in the presence of the Presidents, without knowing one iota of what it contains until after it is published.

Since the establishment of the Cabinet, no formal Council meeting has ever taken place. Should there be any documents requiring the signature of these Ministers of State, the Cabinet secretary will carry it to them, and then, one by one, they sign it without a murmur.

Thus one fails to discover any difference between the present "constitutional" method and the practice of "blind signing" which prevailed during the old régime.

Prince King is constantly indisposed and has not been present at the Cabinet for weeks. Na-Tung has been ostensibly relieved of his co-comptrollership of the Foreign Office (Wai Wu-pu), yet that Ministry is still consulting him or asking for his advice on all foreign questions of importance. Again, not the slightest divergence from old ways and customs is evident.

The breaking up of the social fabric of centuries and the destruction of abuses cannot be attained before long years. China is attempting to emerge from the chaotic state of the past, but we are still far from finding any eminent statesmen, there is little order and no pure and efficient administration. Many reforms are but a sham, only surface deep and largely on paper. Western life is aped, but the reality is lacking. A Chinese Parliament, if it ever exists, will be, according to the North-China Daily News, which is responsible for all this information, thoroughly Chinese.

The first instalment of $2,000,000 of the International Currency and Manchurian Loan was paid to the Government in the last week of May. It is all to be employed in Manchuria, $1,500,000 on plague measures and $500,000 for commercial and industrial purposes.

A Sino-American bank and steamship company will be soon formed, with a capital of $10,000,000, each country to subscribe half. The head office will be at San Francisco, and branch offices will be opened at New York, Peking, Shanghai and Hankow. This scheme is creating much anxiety in Japan.

Independence Day was gloriously celebrated in Shanghai. Many ships in the harbor dressed up, and the "hongs" displayed the "Stars and Stripes" in honor of the occasion. In the afternoon a game of baseball attracted a large number of spectators, and the Consul-General, Dr. Amos Wilder, gave a reception at his country house. Members of the Consular body and Chinese officials attended, and the function was, in every respect, worthy the day.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

The Pope's Illness

Considering that our Holy Father is an old man in his seventy-seventh year, one feels that the reports published from time to time about the state of his health, give grounds for anxiety. We trust God will leave him with us to carry on the great work he set before his eyes in the first days of his pontificate, and in which his labors have been by no means fruitless—to restore all things in Christ; but there is the fear of the contrary.

None of us can know how great is the burden of the apostolate. Heavy in the best of times, it is ten times heavier in these evil days. But we can enter into the heart of the old man bowing down under the weight of many years and grievous afflictions. With St. Paul he sees, that to be dissolved and be with Christ, is the better lot. But above every other desire is the supreme one, to accomplish God's holy will; and so in the spirit of St. Paul he cries with the great Bishop of Tours: "Lord, if it be still necessary to thy people, I do not refuse to labor."

This we do know, that the number of the Sovereign Pontiff's days, by reason of his office, are in God's hands in a very special way. Far less than ours, than those of any temporal ruler are they determinable by the natural happenings of daily life. We may say even that in a certain sense many, high things for him, in God's providence are more absolutely decreed, because his office of God's Vicegerent joins him more closely to God than any other human creature existing on earth. Still, this does not mean that he is removed from the universal law that the graces necessary to accomplish fully one's work on earth and win the crown in heaven are to be sought by prayer.

And so the Church prays at all her altars first of all for the Sovereign Pontiff. In most dioceses, too, on account of the evils of the times, a special prayer in the Mass is imposed by the Bishop. The incense of prayer for the Holy Father never ceases to pierce the heavens; and now every faithful child of Holy Church is multiplying prayers for the Father of all Christians suffering the infirmities of mortality.

Knowing this we join with our Holy Father in leaving the issue to God. If it be the call to eternal rest it will be so, because the servant's work is done; if it be the restoration to health it will be so, because there is yet work for him to do.

Protestant Vacation Schools

One of the recent forms of proselyting is seen in the vacation schools for poor children in New York. We refer to those that are conducted by the Federation of Protestant Churches in this city. How is it that Protestants generally do not, and many of them will not see the unalterable position of Catholics, who so long as they are loyal children of the Faith must believe, and live up to the belief, that they cannot save their immortal souls in any but the Catholic Church? To wean therefore, the little ones away from their Church or their Faith is to force them into the commission of an act of treason, the maliciousness of which over an ordinary act of treason is to be measured by the sacred character of that Society, whose founder and invisible head is Christ, and whose members owe Him their allegiance from the day of their baptism to the day of their death. Presbyterians may, as they see fit, make inroads on Methodists, and Episcopalians on Baptists, without incurring any such reproach, for they all admit virtually that one religion is as good as another, and that Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians and Episcopalians all stand an equal chance before the Just Judge of receiving a reward for their good works. Catholics concede that they do. But why will not our denominational friends be considerate towards Catholics and not make them perforce renegades to the highest allegiance that man can have on this earth? A writer in the New York Tribune gives a picture of what she saw when she strolled into the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church on a sultry, humid morning a day or two ago. The place was alive with children of every age. "An attractive Barnard girl in crisp white linen was seated at the piano, and the music was being led by an energetic youth, whose physique bespoke the Princeton foot-ball field. And the children! What were they? Not well dressed, conventional little Madison Avenue Presbyterians, but Giuseppe and Moses and Esther and Pat and Fritz, hatless and not seldom shoeless, who have traveled all the way" from the East Side. At sight of this the visitor falls to dreaming. A vision arises. Is not this church unity, if only in embryo? It is quite as wonderful as the Pentecostal gathering addressed by Peter. Moses and Esther and Fritz and Pat and Giuseppe are there, and, of course, Carlotta and the bambino. More fortunate than Peter's audience they can talk English, for here is the song they sang:

"Somebody did a golden deed,
Proving himself a friend in need;
Somebody sang a cheerful song,
Brightning the skies the whole day long,
Was that somebody you?
Was that somebody you?"

And this doggerel is set forth as the common ground of a united Christianity! It is simply rank paganism. Cannot something be done by Catholics themselves to prevent these inroads upon the faith of the little ones?

Catholics and the Local Press

A subscriber sent us, some time ago, a copy of a paper widely circulated in its State, which devoted three columns from its eight pages to a somewhat blasphemous and wholly offensive lecture on "The Hereafter," by an itinerant preacher from Brooklyn. Perverting some texts and ignoring others that were in obvious contradiction of his theory, the lecturer informed the Bible Societies who had invited and advertised him, that the Catholic teaching of hell and purgatory, and the Protestant legacy from the "Dark Ages," were "the doctrine of demons," and he was there with the true heavenly doctrine, which turned out to be a crude form of the millenium. His statements travestied the belief and practice of Catholics, whom he contemptuously designated as well meaning but ignorant creatures of medieval minds. Our subscriber urged us to "handle this fellow and send him into retirement."

Why, we ask, did he not himself refute the lecture in the place where it was delivered and in the organ which gave it circulation? His letter shows he has ample ability, and the collation of a few texts of Scripture was all that was required. This man, he says truly, is a type of "the religious counterfeits who, unhampered by truth and self-sufficient enough to ignore facts, are invited to spread popular poison by Bible Societies, which likewise interpret Scripture to their liking. Their coming is hailed with delight and their departure for other fields, wherein to sow tares of misinformation, is gladdened with glowing newspaper notices."

Our subscriber and his friends should not have left the field clear to such quacks to publish broadcast gratuitous insults to themselves and every Catholic of their city and State. His city has a large and influential Catholic population. The Mayor is a Catholic, and a good one, and practical Catholics are prominent in every department of its civic life. They have a strong branch of the Knights of Columbus, of the Catholic Knights of America, the Ancient Order of Hibernians, etc., and the Church is thoroughly organized and respected. Why do they permit this paper to insult them? They form a larger proportion of its subscribers and of its best advertisers, and yet they have to appeal to others for protection.

Catholics cannot control the proceedings of Bible Societies in halls which these own or hire. But the local papers that publish such slanders circulate among the people slandered. Why do these support the slander-monger without plaint or protest? Why do they pay promptly their subscription or advertisement and allow the payee to continue to insult them? Often they are afraid that their business will suffer if they show any resentment. We recall an instance of the kind that occurred a few years ago in the city referred to. A leading minister having written and distributed a violent pamphlet against the Church, a Catholic priest composed a forcible rejoinder, and was about to circulate it when a deputation of Catholic merchants requested the Bishop to suppress it, on the ground that it was likely to injure their business with non-Catholics. They were told to be not afraid, as the pamphlet could hurt the sensibilities of no reasonable person, but in any case a priest's primary duty was to guard the spiritual and not the material interests of his people. The pamphlet was distributed and the merchants managed to survive.

It is pusillanimity more than prejudice or anti-Catholic feeling that is responsible for the publication in hundreds of local newspapers throughout the country of articles and items unjust and offensive to Catholics. As a rule the editor has no desire to offend anybody. He follows the line of least resistance. Finding prepared and contributed articles, such as the lecture in question and its press notices very convenient on slack days, he uses them to fill out his columns, and when no objection is made continues the practice. Generally he and his reporters in their ignorance of Catholic matters are unaware when most offending that they have at all offended. It is the duty of Catholics in such cases to enter respectful protest against the publication and point out the ground of offence, and to urge that it is contrary to journalistic ethics to admit controversial discourses which misrepresent the Faith and wound the feeling of a large portion of his readers. No reasonable editor will require further urging, and journalists as a class are eminently reasonable. A few representative men presenting a just cause and resenting manifest editorial injustice will usually get a hearing and redress.

Recent Musical Politics

The Fifteenth of August, as everyone knows, is a great holiday in the Catholic world. Belgium especially is very fond of it and Antwerp celebrates it with great solemnity. The "kermess" is held at that time, and the gorgeous paintings of Rubens are unveiled in the cathedral. But long before the Fifteenth of this year it was proposed by the enemies of law and order to put an end to the piety that characterized the festival. The Socialists resolved to appropriate the day by organizing imposing processions in all the cities, and to send them tramping through the principal streets shouting out with all the vigor that a Belgian mob is capable of the war cry of what they regard as their emancipation. The Flemish Socialist paper, the Vooruit, of Ghent, wrote a battle hymn for the occasion. It reads or sings more or less as follows. Its coarseness is a tribute to the masses:—

What wipes all priests from off the earth
And kicks out all the kings?
What portions out the real estate
And puts an end to rings?
What makes the troops fling down their guns
And scoff at war's commands?
What puts all offices of State
In Socialistic hands?
What makes a wreck of every church,
Of palace and chateau?
'Tis Universal Suffrage.—Give us that or go.

Three other songs built on the same subversive scale were also written for the marching legions. The worst feature of it is, however, that these revolutionary manifestations are stupidly backed up by a large section of the Liberal Party, which is composed mainly of rich manufacturers and comfortable property holders. They hate Socialism and all its works and pomps as their forefathers did the devil, but they hope that their despised allies will help them into power and oust the Catholics. We are going to press too soon to know what kind of a triumph Universal Suffrage scored on that occasion, but the very anticipation of such a daring defiance of royalty, and Christianity, attempted in the cities of Catholic Belgium must make its serious and saddened inhabitants, whether practising their religion or not, mourn for the days when piety, not politics, characterized the Fifteenth of August.

Triumph of English Democracy

As AMERICA foretold after the general election, the House of Lords has accepted the inevitable. There was nothing else to do. The majority of Scottish, Irish and Welsh voters wanted it out of the way. English voters were evenly divided, which in modern constitutional language means that England did not care what happened to it.

Of course, Unionists make light of their defeat, and many of their opponents are afraid to express the fullness of the victory. Only one word fits it, that is revolution. Unionists are telling one another confidently that the Government will go to pieces over Irish Home Rule. Two years ago they were sure that an open attack on the House of Lords would be its ruin. The fact is that England is greatly changed, and it is clear from the last election that the voters within the three Kingdoms feel towards Home Rule, much as they do towards the Peers.

No one imagines that more than the first step has been taken. The Unionist Party is to be still further weakened by the fixing of one day for elections, which means the introduction of the "one man, one vote" principle, and the abolition of the system whereby a man might have a vote in several constituencies, provided he could qualify in them; and further legislation to strengthen the party in power seems certain to take place.

What will be the condition of the sovereign? Many dispassionate observers judge that the days of the monarchy are numbered. The King has two courses open to him, either to drift with the tide, and the direction in which it is setting is clear enough, or to attempt to revive his constitutional powers over legislation, and to perform the functions hitherto exercised by the House of Lords, which could only hasten the catastrophe.

What concerns Catholics most of all is, that when the Home Rule Bill shall have taken the Irish members out of the House of Commons, or, at least, reduced them to a mere handful, the Government will pass its Educational Bill in a more radical form than ever.

A Dictionary Long Defunct

Imagine, if you can, a distressed Liberal writing to the British Cabinet: "I found Johnson's Dictionary in our parish library the other day; and see how it defines a Whig!" It would make even Mr. Birrell impatient; and the answering of the letter would fall to Mr. Winston Churchill, who would tell the distressed Liberal very vigorously that the equivalent of Johnson's Dictionary in the matter is something less than the Duke of Wellington's historic measure of worthlessness.

A distressed Catholic writes from Los Angeles, California, that he has found among the standard reference works of the public library Blunt's "Dictionary of Sects, Heresies, etc.," and quotes its definition of Roman Catholics, viz.: "A sect originally organized by the Jesuits out of the relics of the Marian party of clergy and laity in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and further organized into a Donatist hierarchy by Cardinal Wiseman in 1850."

Well, what of it? Blunt's authority in the matter is as worthless as Doctor Johnson's was in the matter of Whigs; and if the public librarian of Los Angeles puts his dictionary among the standard Reference Works, he does so, no doubt, to gratify certain people as ignorant of history as Blunt himself, feeling sure that no person of common sense will ever consult him. Blunt was a clergyman of the Church of England, a very profuse, very prejudiced, and very inexact—not to say mendacious—writer of the Littledale kind during the second half of the nineteenth century. Of his "History of the English Reformation," the Saturday Review said: "He did not possess sufficient acquaintance with the works of the so-called reformers to be able to appreciate their tone of mind, or the systems of theology they represent"; and it characterizes the Dictionary so honored in the Los Angeles public library as "a slovenly and illconsidered compilation."

The sight of Blunt's name, once more after many years, made us rub our eyes; for we had thought that the writings of this friend of our youth had gone long ago with him to the grave. We suspected that ministers of the Church of England, might, here and there, have reserved a copy for furtive circulation, just as they keep Littledale's "Plain Reasons" for the same purpose; but we did not dream that they would put it in the Los Angeles public library. One would have thought that such historians of their own as Gairdner would have prevented this. But, perhaps, many of them do not know him; and audacity born of ignorance is boundless.

The definition itself is comparatively harmless. To the ordinary man or woman "the Marian party" and "a Donatist hierarchy" are mere words, but the absurdity of "sect" is manifest.

For the rest, the distressed Catholic may make up his mind that such writers as Blunt, notwithstanding their pretended learning, are impostors too shallow to be worth his notice.

Mexico's Political Situation

It is complicated and bodes ill for the future. Antagonistic forces are already active and threaten to wax stronger and more violent as the campaign goes on. By the force of his personality, by his resourcefulness, by his quick and vigorous action, Porfirio Diaz held Mexico helpless for a generation. During that time, even his most intimate advisers, friends they could hardly be called, for he did not cultivate friendships, did not pretend to foresee his course of action, much less direct it. He consulted them freely, kept his own counsel, and did as he pleased. Only his failing strength and his waning faculties made him depend, though unwillingly, upon others. Then came his downfall. It was a case of hunter or hunted. Since his mighty grip on the throttle relaxed, the political engine in Mexico seems to have been running wild. Who will gain control? Who will quiet the angry passions that have burst forth?

The early division of Mexican politicians into Conservatives and Liberals was not wholly unlike our own division in the early days of the republic into Federalists and Republicans. The Conservatives were the party of caste and privilege, the sticklers for old-time principle and practice; the Liberals, like the Republicans of Washington's day, were not influenced by the traditions of the past, for they were too recent in point of time to have a past. The great misfortune for religion was that the Conservatives linked their cause with that of the Church, while the Liberals hopelessly confusing official ecclesiasticism and churchliness, resolved to crush the Church by burying it under the ruins of the Conservative party. The contest lasted with varying success for nearly fifty years and ended in the overthrow of the Conservatives and the triumph of the Liberals. As far as cunningly contrived and rigorously executed laws could effect it the Church was driven from the light of day into the sombre recesses of the few temples which it was permitted to occupy as a tenant at will. Who can number the rights that were trampled upon and the innocent people that suffered?

From the final and definitive triumph of Benito Juárez and his partisans in 1867 to the present time, Mexican Catholicism has been in hiding. Will it now do more than peep out and mumble a few half-inarticulate words as a sign that it is still alive? In Mexico, as elsewhere, there are Catholics and Catholics. To some their political creed seems as sacred as their faith, in the sense that the two must flourish or fade together. The somewhat long period of forty-four years of Liberal rule seems to have taught them nothing. Like the aged, they live in the past, oblivious of the present and its lessons. Their political attitude is such that they place themselves outside the Mexican Constitution, as the Jaimists in Spain are an anti-dynastic party. Other Mexican Catholics do not close their eyes to the fact that religious unity is something that no longer exists in their country. Aware of this and admitting it, they entertain no wild dreams of reestablishing laws and usages proper enough where the faith of all the people is the same; but they are intent upon working within the recognized constitutional limits for the relief of the Church and for abolishing some of the iniquitous laws which now discriminate so cruelly against her. Will they succeed?

The National Catholic party expressly denies that it is the child and successor of the former Conservative party. It appears without a past before the people and asks support at the polls for the principles contained in its platform. If those Mexicans who call themselves Catholics would rally to the support of that platform there could be no occasion to fear failure; for the anti-Catholic elements are wrangling among themselves and several candidates will be looking for votes. There is a conservatism which means moderation and prudence; there is a conservatism, so called, that means obstinacy in fixing the gaze on a past which becomes more distant as the days slip by. It is too soon to classify and qualify the conservatism that now exists in Mexico. Will it break with the dead past? Will it rise to the energetic action demanded by the living present? If there be, as promised, a free and fair vote for President at the approaching election, the returns will classify Mexican Catholics.

Professor Polacco, the Jewish rector of the Ateneo of Padua, has certain old-fashioned notions about divorce. "The indissolubility of marriage," he says, "is either admitted absolutely in its full sense, or it is unqualifiedly condemned by the recognition of even one exception; for the possibility of undoing any matrimonial union for that one cause is enough to change the very nature of marriage. The element of temporariness which will soon work its way into every marriage cannot but finally change its nature by taking from it the characteristic element which differentiates it from illegitimate unions. There can be no question here of more or less; it is a question of being or not being."

LITERATURE

Mementoes of the English Martyrs and Confessors for Every Day in the Year. By HENRY SEBASTIAN BOWDEN of the Oratory. New York: Benziger Bros.

Those who would daily keep before their eyes a new model of steadfastness in the Faith and arouse their hearts each morning with a new stimulus to Catholic loyalty should secure this attractive book. Somewhat after the fashion of the well-known leaflet lives of the saints, Father Bowden has now made up a neat volume out of the acts and writings of the victims of the Protestant persecution in England, by assigning a sketch of a martyr or confessor to each day of the year. Men and women as varied in rank and character as Cardinal Fisher and Yeoman Milner, Margaret Pole and Margaret Clitheroe, Chancellor More and Archbishop Plunket, are cited as true and fearless witnesses of the Catholic Faith. Good taste and originality are shown in the choice of the title at the head of each page, and at its foot an apposite text from Holy Writ tersely sums up the main characteristic of the life sketched. By such high examples the daily reader of Father Bowden's mementoes will be heartened to hold, even in our day, without concession or compromise, the Faith that these confessors and martyrs defended of old so valiantly.

A Medieval Mystic, A Short Account of the Life and Writings of Blessed John Ruysbroeck, Canon Regular of Groenendaal, A. D. 1293-1381. By DOM VINCENT SCULLY, C.R.L. New York: Benziger Bros.

"You are as holy as you wish to be," said Blessed John, the Belgian mystic, to some Parisian clerics who had traveled far to seek counsel from him on the conduct of life. Much chagrined at this answer, and quite at a loss how to reconcile sarcasm with holiness, they were about to retire, when Ruysbroeck, observing their discomfiture, continued: "Is it not quite true? You are as holy as you wish. Your good will is the measure of your sanctity. Look into yourselves and see what good will you have, and you will behold also the standard of your holiness." Whereat the pious clerics departed, marvelously comforted. Now, those who would read more of the sage maxims of the Blessed John, or would learn how strong his influence was on other fourteenth century mystics, like Gerard, Groot, Thomas à Kempis, Tauler and Gerson, or would be glad to know that the canons regular of Groenendaal were so eager to hear the inspired conferences of this holy cleric that they would often sit at his feet from compline to cock-crow, quite oblivious of their idle beds; or would be told how learnedly and voluminously the saintly mystic wrote in excellent Flemish about visions, ecstasies and elevations, but yet how practical withal he was in his piety, should all get Father Scully's little biography of the Blessed John, which wins by its brevity and charm, and though perhaps a trifle costly, lures one to purchase by its attractive appearance, the which, it might be remarked, is not the invariable rule with its publishers' books.

The Art of Living—Sources and Illustrations for Moral Lessons. By DR. FR. W. FOERSTER. Translated by ETHEL PECK. St. Louis: B. Herder.

This is a good book for parents and teachers. It is designed for training children in self-control and thoughtfulness of others. As the work is apparently meant for readers of all creeds or none, there are few appeals in it to religious motives, but these the Catholic instructor can readily supply. The book abounds in apposite anecdotes and apt illustrations to drive well home its moral lessons. No thoughtful child can read it without being convinced that no one in this world is really at peace except the self-sacrificing and the considerate. That when we show kindness and sympathy to those in trouble we benefit ourselves more than them; that the happiness of man does not depend fundamentally on electricity, flying machines and telephone wires; and that the true way of making a friend is to make your own friendship attractive; are a few of the lessons well taught in this book. The Irish Nationality. By ALICE STOPFORD GREEN. (Home University Library.) New York: Henry Holt and Co. London: Williams and Norgate. 75 cents net.

Up to the last few years our retailers of history were apparently convinced that Ireland had been a semi-barbarous country until British benevolence civilized it—to some extent and against its will. The researches of O'Curry, O'Donovan and others and the Gaelic League publications revealed that ancient Ireland had an elaborate code of laws, a highly poetic literature and refined social customs, with a great variety of arts and crafts; but the notion that she had suffered a lamentable decadence and her people degenerated into "the wild Irishry" was still prevalent until, a few years ago, Mrs. Green's "The Making of Ireland and Its Undoing" completely upset the Anglo-Irish historical legends which, radiating from London, had spread throughout the world.

British editors were shocked to be told by the wife and collaborator of the English historian, who was known to have collected her husband's materials and to be herself an authority on the history of the British Isles, that the Norman invasions, instead of forwarding, had arrested Irish progress; that Ireland was then in advance of England in laws, literature, commerce and the amenities of social life; that, rather, she had civilized her invaders as her missionaries and scholars had civilized Britain in other days; and that England's central and persistent purpose was to plunder Ireland for her own advantage and, as a means thereto, to crush out the language, literature, customs and, later, the religion of Ireland, with all that gave the Irish people a national and individual entity. The facts were found indisputable. Sources and reference were carefully noted, and all attempts to refute her statements were triumphantly rebutted.

"The Making of Ireland" was confined to the Anglo-Norman period, 1200-1600; "The Irish Nation," a neat duodecimo of 254 pages (a companion volume of "The French Revolution," by Hilaire Belloc), reviews the whole course of Irish history from Cormac MacArt to John Redmond, and has for its central theme the unity, the indestructible persistence and the peculiar character of Irish nationality. The Roman and Teutonic idea of unity centered in an emperor or king, with proconsuls or earls to execute their mandates, and the essential life of a nation was symbolized in its ruler. In Ireland, on the contrary, law and tradition—the Brehon code and immemorial custom which, irrespective of local affiliations, were binding on all the people, and on king and chiefs as well—were the motive and formative forces of national life.

In feudal countries the king and his barons owned the land, and the people who tilled it were their servitors. In Ireland the people owned the land and paid fixed dues to the chiefs, whom they chose from an ancient line, thus combining the elective and hereditary principle; and neither chief nor king could alienate property nor impose new laws contrary to the traditional code. This formed a national bond more intimate and binding, though at great crises less objectively noticeable, than the dictates of centralized power which could concentrate a people's force in battles that loom large in historical text-books, but exercise no influence on the art, literature, domestic habits and moral and religious ideals that constitute essentially the life of a nation. The Irish tribal system of self-government, broadened by common acceptance through all the land of the same traditions, music, art, literature and national customs, gave an intensity to national life that was unknown to feudal peoples. Ulster might occasionally war on Munster or Connacht or Leinster, but the glories sung by the bards of each were common to all, and they were each bound by the same laws when they resumed their normal life. The poets of Tir-owen were welcome in Kincora and Columcille was as revered in Durrow as in Derry.

This communism of ideas, preserved and transmitted by unbroken lines of bards, jurists and historians, was so widespread and predominant that St. Patrick found individual tribal customs no barrier to the diffusion of Christianity; and so pure were these ideas that his doctrines flowed in upon them, intermingling as by natural affinity, till in a few generations the religion and nationality of Ireland became inseparable and almost indistinguishable. This national spirit, refined and supernaturalized in a thousand schools where Christian ideals were happily wedded to pre-Christian lore, gave to the Irish missionary an individuality that for centuries laid deep its impress on European peoples, and gave to the home abiding Gael the charm and power by which he assimilated Dane and Norman and Saxon and rendered all who came within his spell "more Irish than the Irish."

The new religion of the Tudors kept the Protestant invaders long outside its range, but Mrs. Green is proof that, in a few generations on Irish soil, the national spirit can Hibernicize even the Protestant children of Clan-London. It had so grown into the nature of the Irish people that unless they were destroyed it was indestructible. It survived penal laws, famine, pestilence; plunder by sword and statute; persecution unparalleled in extent, ingenuity and duration; and now, after 700 years, it is clamoring lustily for its old autonomy and seems to have retained the power of regaining and upbuilding it. The schoolboy who wrote, "The Conquest of Ireland commenced in 1170 and is still going on," answered more wisely than he knew.

Mrs. Green's story of the march of Ireland's idea of nationhood, often checked but never stayed, is well proportioned, scholarly in style, whole-heartedly Irish in tone, and particularly satisfying because one feels she knows whereof she writes. Her religious limitations lead her into a mistake about the origin of Irish Christianity and prevent her from realizing to the full, though she by no means ignores it, the motive power of the Catholic Faith in forming and preserving the national spirit; but her work is creditable to head and heart, and should effectively help her country, while winning back its nationhood—"the union of all her children that are born under the breadth of her skies, fed by the fatness of her fields, and nourished by the civilization of her dead"—also to win back its reputation. Education, How Old the New. By JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., Ph.D., Litt. New York: Fordham University Press.

In this collection of essays and addresses Dr. Walsh, the well-known author and lecturer, undertakes to show that many of the good features of modern educational methods, vaunted as late discoveries, are in reality as old as the hills, or, at least, the pyramids. For example, the famous schools of Alexandria, as the Doctor shows, were in many ways quite like a university of to-day, and even the "new woman" is proved to be quite venerable. Incredible as it may seem to those who accept without reserve the Protestant tradition, scientific studies were actually pursued and encouraged in medieval universities, medicine in particular being held in high honor. There is an enlightening chapter on the services the guilds, under the guidance of the Church, rendered popular education during the ages of faith. For it is made plain that the much-lauded grammar schools of Edward VI "were nothing more than reestablishments of popular schools of the olden time," the suppression of which had caused great discontent.

Dr. Walsh's chapter on "Origins of American History" is perhaps the most interesting and enlightening in the book. With the help of Professor Bourne of Yale, the author gleefully pricks the bubble of the "Anglo-Saxons" being the pioneers of learning and civilization in North America. For he reminds us that the College of Santa Cruz, the first institution for higher education in the New World, was founded as early as 1535, with graduates of Salamanca and Paris on its staff of professors; and shows how the University of Mexico, organized in 1553, antedates Harvard by nearly a century, and surprises us with the announcement "that seven printing presses were at work in Mexico during the sixteenth century, fully fifty years before the Massachusetts Bay Psalm Book was issued" from the press in 1637. Finally, we learn from the authorities quoted in this chapter that the greed, cruelty, bigotry and ignorance of which the Spaniard in America supposedly enjoyed a practical monopoly, were possessed in a large measure by his northern neighbor too, and the Spanish colonist's virtues were no less conspicuous and attractive, after all, than those of the Puritans. In "New Englandism," the last chapter of his book, Dr. Walsh, tired of hearing Shawmut and her environs proclaimed this country's spring of learning and culture, sets about picking flaws in her pretensions. Whether the judicious will accept all of the author's dicta is doubtful, but that he makes out a good case for the plaintiff must be owned. Dr. Walsh, as those who have heard his lectures will bear witness, is always interesting and entertaining. He is not too much concerned at all times to keep the subject matter of his chapters in strict accord with their titles, but, without much warning, will often lead his readers down attractive by-paths. But in spite of an explanation in the preface that somewhat disarms criticism, the public perhaps have a right to expect that when lectures appear in book form repetitions of facts or of phrases should be avoided. The book is gracefully dedicated to the Xavier Alumni Sodality, at whose quarterly post-Communion breakfasts "most of the thoughts in the volume were originally expressed." W. D.

"The Mother," by Katherine Tynan, published in McClure's Magazine for August, 1911, is such an amazing, distressing and shocking piece of writing that we almost hesitate to call attention to it. "The Mother" is in heaven, and she leaves it to go to hell with her son. The manner in which Almighty God is represented, the blasphemous utterance attributed to the Blessed Virgin, and the unnatural, degrading and un-Christian character of the whole picture, which is carried on the backs of a set of crippled and shambling verses, makes us doubt very seriously if the author of this horrid screed is the Katherine Tynan who was formerly such a favorite.

In the imperial library of St. Petersburg a curious manuscript has been discovered. It is a volume in 16mo, bound in calf, with a large L surrounded by a crown on the cover. It is called Catéchisme ou Brieve Instruction du Chrétien. It was owned by the famous bibliophile Zaluski, who wrote under the title: "For the use of Louis XIV, King of France." There is no doubt that such it was. Written for him when he was a child, on the first page we meet with the question and answer:

"Q. What does your Majesty mean when you say that God created and put you in this world? A. I mean that He has made and taken me from the nothing in which I was, to give me being, life, my kingdom, and all the other advantages which I possess."

The same hand that wrote the book has put at the foot of the title page the date 1645, so that Louis, who was born in 1638, was seven years old when he was studying this catechism. The binding is that of the time. Its literary style is very elegant, though it has still some old manners of speech. It is thought to be the work of the Archbishop of Paris, Mgr. Hardouin de Pérèfixe, who was the preceptor of the young king. It is he who wrote the history of Henri le Grand, and the style is the same as that of the catechism. There are some pages at the end of the book written in a different hand.

The Revue des Deux Mondes finds that there is a return to religious sentiments in the French poetry of the present day. It began to declare itself before the end of the nineteenth century, and became quite pronounced at the beginning of the twentieth. At first it was merely natural religion, or a mysticism tainted by sensuality, but nevertheless there is a genuine resurrection now in progress. The fear of the beyond in a poet brought up on pure science like Sully-Prudhomme and in a convinced pagan like Albert Samain is very marked. The figure of Christ, veiled for a time, is again appearing. An out-and-out Positivist like Hauraucourt is writing a "Passion." Jean Aicard is evidently very much impressed with his "Disciples of Emmaus," and Rostand yields as much as one such as he can to the Christian spirit in his "Samaritan Woman." A whole group of poets, among whom we may cite Jules Romains, André Lafon, Noël, Nouet, Mme. Virenque, are showing the same tendency. Others are making faith the foundation of poetry, notably Schuré Cardonnel, Retté, Guérin and Jammes. Only the women writers show no sign of a return, but as they entered later than the men into the regions of unbelief, they have not yet made up their minds to come back. Their writings are so far without any religiosity whatever, and the problem of the world beyond does not seem to have so far disturbed the minds of those feminine worshipers of the Muse. Perhaps they will return to where they belong when they begin to suffer.

EDUCATION

In the report handed in at the meeting of the National Council of the Knights of Columbus at Detroit, August 13, by the committee on Catholic Higher Education, consisting of Rev. Dr. J. S. Creagh of the Catholic University, Prof. James C. Monaghan and Dr. James J. Walsh of Fordham University, a number of interesting and encouraging facts about the present efficiency of our educational institutions are recorded: We learn that there are now seven Catholic Universities in the country that have each one thousand students and all the university departments. Most have developed out of colleges within the last ten years, yet have attained a high standard of efficiency. For instance, the graduates of St. Louis University have not failed either in the law or medicine examinations; at Creighton the Supreme Court of Omaha holds a session on the stage at commencement and formally admits all the graduates to practice before its bar, and Fordham's Medical School, though still but an infant, was raised last year from Class A to Class B by the American Medical Association.

* * *

The report leaves no doubt in the mind of its readers about the committee's opinion concerning the peril to which Catholics attending secular institutions of learning expose their faith. "The whole atmosphere of our American universities," it is asserted, "is agnostic, if not positively atheistic. Example speaks louder than words to growing youth, and the fact that their teachers do not consider religion of sufficient value to make it worth while to belong to any church or profess any faith undermines religious principles and, above all, religious practice. It is well known that in Protestant institutions, of those who attend Mass during their first year at college, about one-third fail to do so during their second year. Nearly one-third of the remainder begin to be negligent of their religious duties during their sophomore year. More than one-half of all who go to such institutions probably have their faith seriously undermined. There are many who know from experience, who declare that it is an exceptional young man or young woman whose faith is not grievously tainted by the years in the atmosphere of indifference to religion, or worse. There are striking examples which serve to show that the brighter the mind, the more conceit of knowledge there is, and the more their professors think of them, the greater is the danger. This is particularly true for young women."

* * *

The committee finds but too many melancholy instances of silly parents, with social ambitions, sending their boys and girls to non-Catholic colleges, thus sacrificing, as a rule, the most precious heritage they can leave their children, "the faith delivered to the Saints." It is instructive also to observe from the findings of the committee the close connection there is between godless education and mixed marriages. "Social climbing," the report continues, "is responsible for the presence of many of the Catholic students at secular universities, and we venture to say that their mothers are often more responsible for this than their fathers. There is an opportunity, then, for fathers to exert the weight of their influence in the matter. It may be well to remind mothers that sisters usually marry their brothers' friends; at least two-thirds of all the marriages in the country probably occur in that way. Many of the mixed marriages, then, are due to this meeting with Catholics and Protestants brought about by the brothers' presence at a secular university, with the acquaintances which it inevitably supposes. Mixed marriage is one of the important sources of the unfortunate leak at the top which has led many of the so-called better-class Catholics out of the Church. The other phase of that leak, though they are really coordinate factors, is education in secular universities."

* * *

If each of the 40,000 religious in this country now occupied exclusively, as the report notes, in educating the young were to receive, instead of what is just sufficient for food and clothing, a salary of seven hundred and fifty dollars a year, the sum total would amount to $30,000,000. If this amount were capitalized at 5 per cent. interest $600,000,000 would be the sum required to produce it. This is what religious, by giving themselves, are giving to Catholic education. But the commercial value of their services is as nothing compared with the worth of the motives that animate them in this work and the spiritual advantages enjoyed by the children who have as teachers such devoted men and women as these, of course, is above all price.

St. Vincent de Paul workers complain of the crying need in our large cities of Catholic high schools for girls, which they can be urged and encouraged to attend after finishing their course at the parish school, and thus equip themselves for securing better positions. As it is now, we are told that a large number of poor girls, as soon as they have attained the legal age, pass from the grammar school to the department store. Young, unskilled and inexperienced, they can earn but a pittance there. With little hope of advancement and with few opportunities of self-improvement, these unfortunate children too often fall victims, it is said, to the temptations and snares that so abound in a big department store, that such places are now no less dangerous to the morals of poor young girls than the district messenger service is to those of their brothers. But if these girls could only get a two-years' training at a Catholic high school they would be able to secure such positions and command such wages that they could avoid three-fourths of the moral pitfalls now surrounding them. It is gratifying, however, to observe that steps are being taken in some of our large cities to meet this need. The Archbishops of New York, Philadelphia and St. Louis, and the Sisters of St. Joseph in Brooklyn are soon to start large Catholic high schools for girls, and it is to be hoped that before long no bishop will consider his parish school system complete without having a good central high school for girls in each city of his diocese.

"It may seem strange to some," says the Catholic Standard and Times, quoting the Lutheran, "that so able and devout a man as the venerable ex-president of the Augustana Synod, Dr. Norelius, should deplore the attempt to introduce the teaching of religion in the public schools. He did so in his report to that body. In expressing this view Dr. Norelius does not stand alone, but practically the whole Lutheran Church in this country stands with him." The development of the argument by which Dr. Norelius establishes his contention is at once clear and convincing. Religion, he says, "if taught in these schools can never be 'sectarian,' as many call it. That is, nothing very definite in the matter of doctrine can be taught without awakening the opposition of Unitarians, agnostics and downright unbelievers. Nothing very definite can be taught without meeting with the disapproval of the majority of the 'sects' that divide Christianity in this country."

If nothing definite can be taught without giving offence, he goes on, then only that which is very indefinite and nondescript in character can be taught. This would at once rule out most that is fundamental in Christian teaching—the deity of Christ, the Incarnation, the Atonement, original sin, regeneration, repentance, conversion, eternal life and eternal death. If such teachings as these be ruled out, what would be left that is worth having? Can the flower and fruit of Christianity be kept alive by cutting them off from the trunk and the stem? Likewise, what would be left of religion if the wilted leaves and flowers and fruits were to be held up before the boys and girls as all that need be known of Christianity? It is impossible, Dr. Norelius concludes, to teach the Christian religion in the public schools—that is why the Lutheran Church has no faith in it.

The worthy Lutheran leader might, with entire safety, so have broadened his conclusion as to include Christians of every phase of religious belief. No genuine follower of Christ may accept as satisfying conscience a manner of religious instruction which necessarily excludes the essentials of the Christian faith.

The Classical Association of Ireland is raising a fund for the improvement of classical teaching in schools and colleges by supplying archeological aids which will serve to enlighten and interest the students. They propose to lend or make easily procurable lantern slides on Classic subjects, illustrative collections of Greek and Roman coins, pottery, replicas, electrotypes, etc., and to offer medals and money prizes to students for excellence at public examinations, especially in Greek. Professors of Trinity and the National University and of Catholic and non-Catholic colleges are members of the Association, and their appeal is addressed to all who are interested in the preservation and advancement of humanistic study. "In this country, as elsewhere," says the circular, "Classical education, and with it all literary study of high value, is seriously threatened." The State prefers to subsidize "paying" branches of education; hence private resources must be invoked in order to provide teachers of Classics with the practical equipments required to bring their discipline into line with modern methods. Professor Browne, S.J., of the National University, one of the leaders in the enterprise, hopes that American friends of higher education in Ireland will contribute to a movement which is intended to revive Ireland's ancient fame for Classical scholarship; and he wishes to get in touch with American educators who are interested in the promotion of Classical studies in this country. Remittances and communications should be addressed to Rev. H. Browne, M.A., University College, Dublin, or Dr. L. C. Purser, Trinity College, Dublin.

MUSIC

THE CHARACTER OF ITS EMOTIONAL APPEAL.

There is a curious tendency at the present moment to parody the religious motive in art. A recent and glaring example, which indeed need hardly be discussed in these columns, is the "Saint Sebastian" of Gabriele d'Annunzio. Were the "mystery" less dull one might suspect it of being diabolical, for here we find the spirit of sanctity and asceticism transformed, as it were, into terms of the sensuous, so as to appeal to the taste of those whose jaded appetites are tired of the subjects usually set before them, and whose minds would seem incapable of taking in the ideas of real sanctity.

Leaving aside, however, this crude and deliberate parody on religious emotion, it might be interesting to stop and inquire how many sins of the same kind,—indeliberate indeed, but more frequent than might be supposed,—are committed every day. For the tendency to confound religious emotion with sensuous emotion is not always confined to birds of the d'Annunzio feather.

It is in music that we most often notice this confusion. In the other arts it is not so easy, it would seem, to be deceived. Any one can recognize an objectionable painting or piece of sculpture when he sees it. Yet, strangely enough, not every one, not even every sincere lover of music, seems able to recognize objectionable music when he hears it. There are many people, often very well meaning people, whose critical faculty seems atrophied when it comes to music. They expect from this art only a sort of emotional excitement, and do not stop to discriminate between one kind of emotional excitement and another. They seem to be in a maze. They will listen to a musical composition, feel an emotional appeal, and conclude that it must be fine music.

All music is emotional, but music is capable of several kinds of appeal to the emotions diametrically opposed to each other in character, on the one hand ennobling and uplifting, on the other debasing and sensuous. What constitutes a pure emotional appeal? The line is hard to draw on paper, as is indeed the case with any art, but it is perfectly plain to musicians when it comes to concrete examples. We can all realize, if we stop to think, that the emotional appeal in the works of Bach, of Mozart, of Beethoven, is a pure appeal. (We are, of course, speaking now of secular music.) At the other extreme we might place the crudities of the Russian school of composers, frankly barbarous, violent, self-indulgent and relaxing, and the debilitating, saccharine sweetness of the French composers of the clan of Massenet and Gounod. The sensuousness of the barbarian and the sensuousness of the drawing-room. And between these obvious extremes there lie many less obvious pitfalls.

The difference between the uplifting and the degrading in music is a reality as definite as in painting or any other art, and indeed more dangerous in character, inasmuch as the emotional appeal of music is more interior and subtle than in the other arts. The Greeks recognized the danger in their system of education, and would not allow their young men to use certain musical modes, because they considered the melodic progressions morally debilitating.

When d'Annunzio's immoral mystery was brought forth, the Archbishop of Paris spoke out in no uncertain terms, lest some simple soul be taken unaware and deceived into thinking that "Saint Sebastian" was a religious drama. But in the case of music making a similar appeal, where can we find a remedy? Shall we organize a censorship of sound? Would that it were practicable. As far as Sacred Music is concerned, the Holy Father has attempted something of the sort, but for music in general we can see no such hopeful outlook, and the remedy must come, if at all, through a more general and thorough musical education and a more serious attitude toward music as an art.

ECONOMICS

There are various ways of betting on horses. The simplest and least dangerous is to look the horses over just before the race, and, if one be a judge of horseflesh, make a rational choice, if not, an irrational choice of an animal to carry the money you have to spare. Another way is the plunger's, who puts large sums he cannot afford to lose on one horse. If the horse wins, he makes a fortune; if it loses, he is a beggar. The most numerous class is that of the scientific bookmakers, who arrange their bets so as to stand to win as much as is compatible with keeping a prudent eye on possible loss. Such bookmaking requires one to begin betting long before the day of the race, to gather in the clubs the gossip of the stables, to multiply bets, setting one against the other. The large bookmaker will have his agents watching the horses at exercise, pumping jockeys and grooms. His humblest imitators have to draw their information from the sporting page of the newspapers and the seller of tips. This so-called scientific betting is the great evil of horseracing.

It is not easy to see how speculating in wheat and cotton is any better than such betting. Like the bookmaker, the speculator begins early in the season to bet on what the crop will be at harvest time. As this depends almost exclusively on the weather, speculating in wheat and cotton is practically a betting on future weather conditions and their effects on the growing crop. Gamblers on a large scale collect their own information on its condition from day to day. Others pick up the gossip of the exchange, and others again depend on the newspapers and the rumors of the street. This speculation is worse than horseracing in this, that it offers larger opportunities of working the market by the dissemination of false reports.

Setting aside the question of its morality, one may ask what are the economic results of such speculation? Sound economics require from every exercise of energy some proportional advantage for the community at large. If the economist is assured that a certain exercise of energy produces intellectual or moral gain he stands aside, as the matter does not concern him directly. But when, as in this case, it is clear that no such gain is obtained, he has a right to ask, what is the material profit?

No one can deny the enormous expenditure of energy in wheat and cotton speculation. The speculators expend it in shouting and struggling to buy or sell; the messengers, in rushing hither and thither with orders and calls for margins; bankers, in welcoming safe customers and in showing others the door; clerks, in scribbling and calculating; winners, in boasting and celebrating; losers, in wringing their hands and cursing; editors, in composing financial reports; printers, in printing them; newsboys, in selling them. Then there is all the subsidiary expenditure of energy, from that of the architects who design exchanges and offices to that of the men hired to keep them clean, and of the vast army that get their living one way or another out of this gigantic gambling.

But what comes of it all? Could not the fields be sown, and the harvest reaped, and its price returned to the growers and all who really work in its production and distribution, without the operations of the produce exchange? Suppose that all the speculators and their hangers on, instead of gambling on the injury the crop may receive from the weather, were to go out into the fields and exert their energy in averting the injury as far as possible, they would be doing something as economically sound as their existing practice is economically unsound.

And this leads to another consideration. The conditions of to-day, under which immense populations are gathered into cities to spend their lives in such barren pursuits as those of the produce exchange, while a comparatively small number sow and reap with machines thousands of square miles to feed them, are dangerous. To cast seed into the ground and wait idly for a harvest might have suited, had Adam not sinned. Now, cultivation is the law of the earth. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread"; and it is to be noticed that our great grain fields are not cultivated in the true sense of the word. Our methods are a tempting of Providence. A general failure for two or three successive years is not only possible, but, perhaps, probable. Should it come, what would happen in the huge, hungry, unemployed populations of our cities? And what would the produce exchanges be able to do to avert calamity?

SCIENCE

We hear of a new process, called coslettizing, for the protecting of iron and steel against rust. The metal is immersed for a few seconds in a boiling solution of potassium or sodium hydroxide, after existing rust or tarnish has been removed in the usual solution of sulphuric acid. After a thorough rinsing in water, it is coslettized, i.e., boiled for two or three hours in a 4 per cent. solution of phosphoric acid mixed with iron filings. This gives the metal a greenish black rust-proof coating which, oiled with linseed or paraffin oil, changes to a grayish black lustre.

Experiments have been made in the University of Michigan to ascertain whether smoke can be washed by being forced through sprays of water and ammonia hydroxide. The greatest ratio of water to coal used was forty to one. The result desired was not obtained, although the temperature of the flue gas was reduced to 60 or even to 50 degrees.

The use of gas for heating as well as lighting has made obsolete the old unit, the candle power, owing to the fact that this unit rates merely the brightness of the flame, not the heating power. Deville and more recent experimenters discovered a remarkable proportion between the light and heat of a mantle, and, using this, makers are rating burners according to the units of heat given to them per unit of time in standard calories. Gas of 5,200 calories efficiency per cubic metre has been recommended as the standard. The latest designs of burners for heat and lighting require that the gas have a fairly constant consumption, since the maximum efficiency of the burner is attained only when the relative quantities of air and gas are closely regulated. Water gas may be added to prevent excessive variation in calorific value.

A metal of considerable importance in aerial navigation is the new compound known as Liège metal. The specific gravity is about 1.762, about 40 per cent. lighter than aluminium. Its surface is of a grayish-white hue, reflecting rays analogous to poorly worked aluminium. Its composition is Aluminium 0.04 per cent., Iron 0.01 per cent., Zinc 0.44 per cent., Sodium 0.21 per cent., Magnesium 99.3 per cent.

The authorities of Karlsruhe, Germany, are using a novel method to protect gas and water mains from electrolysis by stray currents. At suitable locations electrodes are sunk into the ground, and these are coupled to the positive pole of a source of low-tension electricity—for instance, an accumulator or a dynamo. The pipes to be protected are connected to the negative terminal of the same source. The protection is said to be complete.

It is reported that a wireless telegraph station will be installed shortly by the Norwegian government at Spitzbergen. This will be the "farthest north" station, and will undoubtedly prove of great value to Arctic explorers. Its distance from the Pole will be about 800 miles.

Birkeland some time since advanced the theory that electrified corpuscles emitted by the sun were responsible for magnetic storms and auroral displays. Strömer would extend this same hypothesis to the solar corona. The structure of the corona induces the idea that the sun is surrounded by a magnetic field, the coronal rays apparently indicating lines of force. On the assumption that the sun acts as a simple magnet, it is assumed that the corpuscles only are subject to this magnetic force, and that they move in accordance with the law governing kathode corpuscles in a magnetic field. The computed forms are very suggestive of coronal streams.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

His Excellency, the Most Rev. Diomed Falconio, the Apostolic Delegate, has announced the receipt of a cablegram from Cardinal Merry Del Val informing him that the Holy Father has appointed the Right Rev. James J. Keane, D.D., Bishop of Cheyenne, Wyoming, as Archbishop of Dubuque, and the Right Rev. Joseph B. Schrembs, D.D., Auxiliary Bishop of Grand Rapids, as first Bishop of Toledo. An odd coincidence is the similarity of names of the Archbishop-elect of Dubuque and his predecessor in that archiepiscopal see, the Most Rev. John J. Keane, D.D., who recently resigned his see because of ill health. The new Archbishop of Dubuque is noted as an eloquent preacher and lecturer. He was born on August 2, 1857, in Minnesota, and studied for the priesthood at the Grand Seminary, Montreal, Canada. He was consecrated Bishop of Cheyenne October 28, 1902.

Bishop Schrembs, the first Bishop of the new Diocese of Toledo, is a man of remarkable abilities, which have made him widely known and respected throughout the country. He was born in Ratisbon, Bavaria, March 12, 1866, and came to the United States in 1877. His studies were begun at the Archabbey of St. Vincent, near Pittsburgh, where an older brother had entered the Benedictine Order some years before. After completing his college course he taught school for two years in Louisville, Ky. In 1884 he was adopted as a student of the Grand Rapids Diocese by Bishop Richter. He entered the Grand Seminary in Montreal, and for five years studied theology, philosophy and the higher ecclesiastical studies, and on June 29, 1889, he was ordained in St. Andrew's Cathedral, Grand Rapids, by Bishop Richter. Father Schrembs was made Vicar General of the diocese in 1903, and in February, 1906, he was raised to the dignity of a Monsignore and a Domestic Prelate of the Papal household. He is noted as a student of economic problems and for his sympathetic interest in the working classes.

The closing business session of the annual convention of the Knights of Columbus was held in Detroit, Mich., on August 3. Cambridge Springs, Pa., was selected as the meeting place for the 1912 convention. In executive session an attempt was made to amend the by-laws so that wine and other liquors which are now prohibited might be served at banquets and in the club-rooms of the organization. There was a storm of opposition, and the amendment was overwhelmingly defeated. The annual report of Supreme Knight Flaherty shows that on April 30 last the membership of the order aggregated 256,000, a net gain for the year of 18,015. A net gain of 83 councils for the year was reported. This includes the establishment of the first council in Porto Rico, and makes the order active in the United States, Canada, Newfoundland, Cuba, the Philippines, Porto Rico and Mexico. The amount paid in death claims since the organization has been in existence is over $5,000,000, with an aggregate collected in assessments of more than $7,000,000.

The Rev. Michael Joseph Spratt, Pastor of Belleville, Ontario, has been nominated to the Archiepiscopal See of Kingston, made vacant by the recent translation of Mgr. Gauthier to Ottawa. The newly elected Archbishop is fifty-seven years old, and was ordained by Archbishop Cleary on the same day as the late Archbishop McEvay. "The great confidence reposed in Father Spratt, the pastor," says the Catholic Register and Church Extension, "will not be diminished now that he takes the highest command in his Church. With the prayers and affection of his people, and the respect and good will of all Canadian Catholics, he assumes control of the Kingston Archdiocese." We gladly join in the wish that "his administration may be of the happiest and fraught with every blessing to the people."

The diocese of Mysore is deploring the death of the Rev. Theodore Gerbier, which occurred at Bangalore on July 5. Father Theodore was for fifteen years the Superior of the Native Ecclesiastical Seminary, and had labored for nearly forty years in India. The Catholic Herald of India gives an interesting episode in connection with his early career as a cleric in Paris. Sent in disguise by his Superior to gather information about the doings of the mob in the days of the Commune, he was stopped at a barricade and compelled to work for the Communists. He was a prolific writer in French and English and the author of "The Hindu Examiner of the True Religion, or Dialogues on Religious Matters Between a Catholic Priest and a Hindu," a work said by many Archbishops and Bishops to be a real treasure.

In The Catholic Times of Liverpool, August 4, "Cranford" writes: "I hope the discussion on the Catholic Press at the Newcastle Congress (which opened on August 4) will be productive of practical and permanent results, and if every clergyman who attends the Congress makes it his serious business to urge upon his congregation the importance of subscribing to the Catholic weeklies the discussions will not have been without value. When "Papyrus" tells us that "the journalist is the modern preacher," when Archbishop Ireland rebukes the pastor of souls who does not labor to put a Catholic journal into every household, and when the great and saintly pastor of souls at Rome clearly sets before us our duty in this matter, the Catholic Press should surely be encouraged in every possible way. Occasionally one hears of an enthusiast having dreams of a 'Catholic Daily.' A daily Catholic newspaper would land the promoters in the Bankruptcy Court within twelve months of the first issue, and it is absolute nonsense to talk of the prospect of a 'Catholic Daily' when there are thousands of Catholics who do not take even one penny Catholic weekly. The newspapers are the people's text-books, and we should all realize this. The clergy can and will, I am sure, do much for the good work."

On the 2d of August the relics of St. Francis of Sales and St. Jane Frances de Chantal were transferred to hte new monastery of the Visitation at Annecy, built on the slope of the Semnoz. Although religious processions are forbidden in France, 60,000 people assembled to carry the precious remains to their new resting place, among whom were 400 Canadians and 1,000 Austrians. Fifty bishops and three Cardinals took part in the procession. The demonstration was too enthusiastic for the authorities to attempt to suppress it. The celebration lasted nine days, and Mgr. Rumeau saw the throng increasing every day around his pulpit in the Visitation monastery. The church was packed on the night of August 3 and 4, for the nocturnal adoration, and thousands of people received Holy Communion. It is to be remembered that Francis of Sales was one of the fathers of French literature, and founded his Académie Florimontane, in Savoy, twenty-nine years before Richelieu organized the French Academy in Paris.

On Sunday, July 30, took place the annual pilgrimage to Croaghpatrick, which, discontinued during the centuries of Ireland's persecution, was restored some years ago by Archbishop Healy. Over 15,000 pilgrims from all parts of the country, and not a few from Britain, America and Australia, climbed the two and a half miles of steep ascent that led to the summit of the mountain on which St. Patrick knelt in prayer 1470 years ago. A storm and heavy rainfall did not deter the pilgrims from making the ascent or kneeling in the open around the Oratory on the mountain top, where Mass was celebrated continuously from dawn till mid-day. Canon Curran of Galway preached in Gaelic. Father Gwynn, S.J., speaking in English, said that from that hill in 441 St. Patrick sent a messenger to Rome to lay his allegiance at the feet of Pope Leo. Those grey boulders bore witness that then, as now and through the centuries, Ireland was true to the Vicar of Christ. Archbishop Healy said the Pilgrimage was a proof of the marvelous life and progress of the Faith in Ireland through fire and blood—a proof that the spirit of St. Patrick was availing and abiding.

The Osservatore Romano has published the report of the amount of money given by Pope Pius X to the earthquake victims of Calabria and Sicily in 1908. The pontifical agents, Mgr. Cottafavi and Count Zileri dal Verme, received 3,790,000 francs. Of that sum 2,150,000 were employed to build houses, and the rest for wages to workmen and subsidies to the afflicted. The number of constructions ran up to 407. A detailed account of every outlay is given. This vast sum represents only one-half of the Pope's contribution. Four millions more were given to the bishops of those parts, to be distributed among the families of the victims, for the orphans, seminarians and lay students, and for the wounded in the hospitals. The Holy Father had received 6,849,998 francs in alms from the whole Catholic world, and in some way or another he obtained another million for the same purpose.

In recognition of the hearty cooperation of her royal highness the Infanta Doña Isabel in the work of the twenty-second International Eucharistic Congress, his Holiness Pius X sent her a valuable gold medal commemorative of the Congress and an autograph letter, in which he expressed his appreciation of her zeal and devotedness.

Archbishop José Mora y del Rio of Mexico has issued an appeal for funds to repair the cathedral. As it stands on the site of the Aztec temple to the god of war, the excavations made near the foundation, in search of archeological specimens, have weakened the walls, which have also suffered from seismic disturbances. The edifice, which is the largest cathedral in Spanish America, was opened for worship in 1626, replacing at the time an older structure, which dated from the days of Cortés.

PERSONAL

By the will of John Curley, a wealthy carriage manufacturer of Brooklyn, who died on July 30 in Badgestein, Austria, sixty-three bequests are made, of which fifty are to charitable organizations, mostly Catholic. The will disposes of an estate of about $200,000. Some of the bequests to Brooklyn institutions are: the Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis, in charge of St. Peter's Hospital, $15,000; Hospital of the Holy Family, $5,000; St. Mary's Hospital, $5,000; St. Catherine's Hospital Association, $10,000; the Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn, $3,000 in trust to educate young men for the priesthood; the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, $5,000; Sisters of St. Joseph of St. Malachy's Home, $2,500; Convent of the Sisters of Mercy, $2,500; Home for the Aged of the Little Sisters of the Poor, $2,500; House of the Good Shepherd, $1,000. The other beneficiaries take in a large proportion of the charitable organizations of Brooklyn, the gifts ranging from $250 to $1,000.

The Rev. Stanislas Chevallier, S.J., a French missionary at Shanghai and Director of the Astronomical Observatory of Sikawei, has been appointed a member of the Society of "Spectroscopisti Italiani," the Italian academy for solar observations. The academy is composed of thirty Italian and thirty foreign members. Father Chevallier is one of the two Jesuits among the latter.

CHRONICLE

The Recall Veto.—President Taft vetoed the joint resolution of Congress providing for the admission of New Mexico and Arizona to Statehood. His reason for exercising the Executive power of veto was based on his disapproval of the recall of judges clause in the Arizona constitution. The fact that New Mexico's Statehood was bound up with that of Arizona meted out to her the same fate. The President in his special message to the House of Representatives treats the whole subject of the recall in a lofty philosophical manner worthy of one who had been himself an occupant of the bench. He declares that this feature of the Arizona constitution would compel judges to make their decisions "under legalized terrorism," and that he could not escape the responsibility for the judicial recall if he signed the resolution. It would not do to say that the President had only to see that the resolution contained nothing inconsistent with the Federal Constitution, the Declaration of Independence, or the enabling act, and in that case to sign it. On the contrary, he was discharging his constitutional function in regard to the enactment of laws and his discretion in that capacity was equal to that of the houses of Congress. Judges, he declares, are in a proper sense servants of the people, that is they are doing work which must be done for the government and in the interest of the people, but it is not work in the doing of which they are to follow the will of the majority, except as that is embodied in statutes lawfully enacted according to constitutional limitations. They are not popular representatives. On the contrary, to fill their office properly they must be independent. "This provision of the Arizona constitution in its application to county and state judges," the President says, "seems to me so pernicious in its effect, so destructive of independence in the judiciary, so likely to subject the rights of the individual to the possible tyranny of a popular majority, and therefore to be so injurious to the cause of free government, that I must disapprove a constitution containing it." The document, says the Evening Sun, "is a fine exposition of our judicial system and worthy of a great occasion."

Wool Tariff Bill Vetoed.—In another message to Congress the President vetoed the wool tariff bill which had been passed by a combination of Democrats and insurgent Republicans. Declaring himself in favor of a revision of the wool schedules, the President insists, however, that the revision should be based upon the report of the tariff board, which will be ready at the opening of the regular session in December, rather than upon incomplete information which might lead to legislation hurtful to business interests. The World notes that "Mr. Taft especially denounced the wool schedule of the Payne-Aldrich tariff as indefensible," and declared that "it should have been lowered." Moreover, "the people voted for immediate tariff reform when they elected a Democratic House last November. They are entitled to action now, not next year or whenever the extreme protectionists may consent." An attempt to pass the wool bill in the House over the President's veto was defeated by 227 yeas to 129 nays, the Democrats failing to muster sufficient insurgent aid.

Farmers' Free List Bill.—The Farmers' Free List bill with Senate amendments passed both houses of Congress, but was likewise vetoed by the President. This bill placed on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt and other articles. A similar attempt to override the veto failed in the House.

Campaign Publicity Bill.—The campaign publicity bill received the signature of the President on August 19. It requires publicity in congressional elections of all campaign funds before election, and extends the publicity features to primary campaigns and nominating conventions. The bill limits the amount candidates may spend to $5,000 for congressional candidates and $10,000 for senatorial aspirants. Candidates are also required to make public all pledges of political appointments.

Dr. Wiley's Case Won.—Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, chief chemist and central figure in the controversy in the Department of Agriculture, finished his testimony before the House Committee on Expenditures in that department. With respect to the original charge that the chief chemist had violated the law regarding the compensation of experts, it appears now that this charge was based at least in part upon a garbled letter that was never sent. The cabal against Dr. Wiley reached such a point that Government officers—in some cases members of the Personnel Board which found him guilty—were detailed by the Secretary of Agriculture to go into other States and give evidence against the main contention of the Bureau of Chemistry, the expenses of these experts being paid by the Government itself. The records show that all sorts of underhand methods were used to trap the confidential agents and friends of Dr. Wiley in the work for pure food, and that the whole pure food propaganda has had to proceed under the most harassing conditions for him and his assistants. The testimony disclosed that the decisions of the "board of food and drug inspection," consisting of Dr. Wiley himself and two other members, were uniformly against the chief chemist; one member, Dr. Dunlap, always disagreeing with Dr. Wiley automatically, and another, Solicitor McCabe, always agreeing with Dr. Dunlap—even changing his vote at once and in all cases where inadvertence, or ignorance of the circumstances, had led him to decide the same way as Dr. Wiley. That almost all the evidence in the case has been in favor of Dr. Wiley and confusing to his accusers gives great satisfaction to the public, which regards him with favor as a particularly zealous and efficient public servant. The New York Tribune voices the general sentiment of the press when it declares that "the usefulness of Dr. Wiley's enemies in the department is ended, even on their own admissions before the investigating committee."

Mexico.—The attempt of Francisco I. Madero to reorganize his quondam Anti-Reelectionist party under the name of the Constitutional Progressist party, on the plea that the former title had lost its significance by the success of the revolution, has resulted in the rejection of his leadership by many of the Anti-Reelectionists and the choice in his stead of Francisco Vázquez Gomez. If the dissension results in nominating a candidate in opposition to Madero for the presidential chair, the likelihood is that neither will be elected and that a third, presumably Reyes, will win. Open letters and handbills against what is styled "the Reyes peril" have already made their appearance.—Over seven hundred claims for damages at the hands of the revolutionists have been filed with the indemnity commission. The largest claim of any one individual is that of a German, who fixes his loss at seventy thousand pesos. The various railway companies demand two million, five hundred thousand pesos.—President De la Barra has decided in a cabinet council to appoint a commission to examine and report on the division and distribution of large landed estates.—On August 16, Archbishop Mora y del Rio, of Mexico, officiated at a Mass in the cathedral to call down the blessing of God upon the deliberations of the first meeting of the Catholic National party. Sessions were held on that and on the three following days. Besides completing the organization of the party, it was decided to support Madero in the coming presidential election.—Mexico has recognized the Republic of Portugal.

Canada.—The weather in the Northwest has been more favorable, and the wheat crop in Manitoba and Eastern Saskatchewan seems to be safe. In the rest of the region there is still danger. The crop will not be ready for harvest before the beginning of September, and the end of August is usually marked by frosts.—The election campaign is being carried on vigorously. Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Lemieux, Minister of Marine, met at St. Hyacinthe. So far as speech making was concerned, it seems that the latter had somewhat the best of it. He charged Mr. Bourassa with having taken issue with the Government, because Sir Wilfrid Laurier refused him the offices he begged, namely, the Commissionership in Paris, the Postmastership in Montreal, and the Deputy Speakership of the House of Commons. Bourassa admitted that he had asked for the last, but denied that he had solicited the others.—William Smith was brought before the magistrate in Montreal for stealing copper wire from the Canadian Pacific Railway. As he could not speak a word of English, a Yiddish interpreter had to be summoned.

Great Britain.—The Government retains the Middletown Division of Lancashire by a majority of 411, in a total poll of 13,315. The majority is but little more than half that of the general election.—An amendment to the Coal Mining Bill, introduced into Parliament, would deprive of work the girls engaged at the mouth of the pits to pick out stones, etc., from the coal as it passed down the chutes. A deputation of them from Lancashire went up to London, furnished with doctors' certificates, that their employment is favorable to health, and with clergymen's certificates, that it is not detrimental to morals, to petition for its abandonment. The Assistant Home Secretary who received them, said that the presentment of the case inclined him to believe in the necessity of female suffrage to look after the interests of women.—A report is current in the South Pacific that Germany is trying to settle the Morocco difficulty by obtaining from France the cession of Tahiti, and strong protests from Australia and New Zealand have reached the Colonial office.—Mr. Fisher, Premier of Australia, declares that the report in the Review of Reviews of his repudiation of the notion of the Empire, misrepresents him. Mr. Stead replies that he put down what Mr. Fisher said, and what he had said repeatedly during his visit to England for the Imperial Conference.—The House of Commons has voted a salary to members of £400 a year.—The strikes became very serious, especially in Liverpool and Wales, where much property was destroyed and some lives were lost. The cruiser Antrim was sent to the Mersey to protect the shipping, and others were held in readiness. About the end of last week the railways became involved, their employes being dissatisfied with the way in which the companies were carrying out last year's agreement. The Government proposed a Royal Commission to examine the matter. The companies accepted, but the men demanded a conference with their employers. This was refused, as it implied recognition of the strikers as an organization. The strike was ordered. The men did not all come out, but sufficient to make the effective running of trains impossible. Troops were in every station to protect the train crews, but there were few to protect, and when a train could be prepared it was often impossible to move it, as the signalmen and others in the yard had struck. The Government, therefore, persuaded the companies to agree to the conference, promising, it is said, to allow traffic rates to be raised sufficiently to pay the increased wages demanded. The strike is announced officially to be at an end.

India.—It is reported that in spite of the efforts of the Government to check the pestilence that is raging in India, there have been no less than 650,690 deaths from the beginning of the year 1911 up to June 30. The outlook for the remaining half of the year is still dark.—The Additional Sessions Judge at Dacca has sentenced to transportation or to various terms of imprisonment some thirty-five Hindus, for conspiring against the British government. All belonged to the Samiti, an apparently innocent organization for the physical culture and training of youth for the support and protection of helpless sufferers. But the leaders of the movement were accustoming young men and boys to a sort of military discipline and rigor, with a view to effecting a successful rebellion against the government twenty years from now.

Portugal.—The troops seem to be the real masters of the situation, for they show no regard for military formation or for the orders of their officers. Those who mount guard in different parts of Lisbon lounge about in a most unsoldierly fashion. They lean against walls or sit down in the sentry-boxes and amuse themselves by eating lunches and addressing insulting remarks to passers-by.—The Government has directed that Father Arpais, the Portuguese priest who was seized on Spanish soil and incarcerated in Portugal, shall be permitted to return to Spain.—Details of a hostile demonstration by a Socialistic association, headed by Deputy Pereira, against the Constituent Assembly were conveyed to a German steamer and thus communicated to the outside world. The mob made two attempts to force its way into the hall where the assembly was in session, but the guard, reinforced by a troop of cavalry, prevented it. The cavalry brandished their sabres and the mob threw stones, displaying very poor marksmanship. Deputy Joao Menezes came out to harangue the crowd, but they shouted, "Clear out, you thief!" His speech, which had promised to be a very moving one, was not delivered. The noise and the stone-throwing continued until half-past two o'clock in the morning, when the arrest of forty rioters soothed the others.

Spain.—The mayor of Madrid has undertaken to force bakers to lower the price of bread, which is kept at the same high figure, although the tax on wheat and flour has been removed. The law removing the tax demanded a corresponding lowering of prices in favor of the consumer, but in many cases this is impossible. A dispenser of soft drinks, for example, represented to the commission that the new law obliged him to make four dollars extra profit daily. His explanation was that he had paid that sum daily as a tax on the ice that he used in his business; he was anxious to lower his prices, but as his trade was exclusively retail, he could not figure out the reduction on each glass of lemonade, etc., and there was no coin small enough to make change, any way. As a law-abiding citizen, therefore, he had to make a greater profit than before. The reduction in the price of chick-peas, which are the Spanish laborer's "staff of life," comes to a little less than one-half cent a pound; and so of other staple groceries. Minister Canalejas has rushed into print with the announcement that many laborers have written to him warm letters of thanks, and have informed him that they are now able to save as much as fifteen cents a day on their grocery bill! One of the administration papers thinks that the saving lies between ten and fifteen cents, but it does not give figures. There is a decided saving, however, for those who buy pheasants and other fancy meats, but the gain to the poor, for whom the law was ostensibly framed, is not so clear.

France.—For the past week France has been silently worrying over the conference that was going on in Berlin about the Morocco embroglio. On August 18 there was a flurry of excitement when Cambon arrived in Paris and hurried to the Foreign Office. That visit seemed to have had the effect of making the Minister of Foreign Affairs post off to Caillaux, the Prime Minister, who in turn called the Ministers of the Army and Navy to discuss the situation.

Italy.—The Italian Government's official statement shows that from August 8 to August 12, inclusive, there were 1,736 cases of cholera in Italy, 632 of which resulted fatally. They were chiefly in Naples and Palermo. In Rome there were 40 deaths.—The health of the Holy Father is reported to be such as to give no more occasion for anxiety.

Germany.—A heat-wave, such as had been experienced in the United States, has recently passed over Germany, and was likewise accompanied by vast forest fires. The public fountains were sealed because of the dearth of water. Fresh milk was scarcely to be procured at any price, and infant mortality increased to an alarming extent. The paintings in the Kaiser Friedrich's Museum had to be removed to the cellar spaces because of the crumbling away of the colors in the excessive heat. The conflagrations, which became frequent in the cities, were rendered more terrible because of the scarcity of water supplies.—The general statistics of the business transacted in the Prussian courts during the year 1910 have just been issued. The figures tell the same sad tale which is everywhere repeating itself: there is an increasing number of criminal as well as of civil cases, but especially of marital accusations and of divorce pleadings. The courts in every country are the most faithful barometer to tell of the rise and fall of Materialism and Socialism within a State.—The long Sphinx-like silence of the government in its Morocco politics has made the agents of the press most keen to catch at any cue that might lead to some indication of the final outcome. So a vast significance was attributed to the remarks of the Emperor when, at the late maneuvers of his troops at Mainz, he gave expression to his great satisfaction by exclaiming: "With such an army we need not fear to face the future!" The recent departure, however, of the German Foreign Minister from Berlin and the return to Paris of the French Ambassador, Mons. Jules Cambon, are significant facts which are construed by many as an indication that the Moroccan conference has been broken off. Even more sinister interpretations are given to certain rumored mobilizations of French troops. Some countenance is given to these views by the prolonged conference between Mons. Caillaux, President of the Ministerial Council; Mons. de Selves, Foreign Minister; Mons. Delcassé, Minister of Marine, and General Messimy, Minister of War, which took place upon the return of the French Ambassador from Berlin.

Austria-Hungary.—The latest official census of the Catholic population of Vienna has now been published. It places the total number of Roman Catholics at 1,742,878. There are, besides, 2,494 Greek Catholics and 121 Armenian Catholics.—The Catholic Volksbund is to have a week of social studies at Vienna, beginning with September 4. The most experienced speakers have been engaged, and invitations have been sent over the entire country, calling attention to the fact that the last elections have made plain the need of an energetic propaganda of social and economic education among the people, if they are not constantly to be deceived by Free-thinkers and Socialists. Austrian Catholics are now applying to their own situation the words spoken of Germany by a famous member of the Centrum: "The decisive battle between Belief and Unbelief will, in our country, be fought upon social grounds." Active interest is at present manifested in the Catholic workingmen's organizations of the country, and it is hoped that a considerable impetus will be given to this movement. The enthusiasm manifested at the late Christian Industrial Congress seems to give foundation for such hopes.

China.—An imperial edict makes some changes in the National Assembly. Hitherto there were two presidents and four vice-presidents, the offices being equally divided between Manchus and Chinese. Henceforth there will be one president and one vice-president. Article 24 permits the making of charges in the Assembly against viceroys and governors for malfeasance in office. Article 28 allows direct appeals of the people to the chief executive. The Assembly thus loses one of its privileges, and is also shorn of its right to act in a judicial capacity. Article 32, Chapter VII, declares that the Emperor alone can convoke an extraordinary session. Article 34 rescinds the arrangement of two-thirds for a quorum, and now puts it at one-half. This is significant, because one-half of the Assembly is made up of Government nominees. To pass to the Order of the Day permission must be obtained from a competent minister. Up to this the Assembly was sovereign in that matter.—Floods in the Province of Anhui have destroyed 325,000 acres of rice, and 500,000 people are homeless, their houses having been swept away.

Russia.—In a section of Russia as large as France, Germany, Austria and Hungary together, a terrible drought, which began in the month of May, has completely destroyed the crops, and a terrible famine is feared.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Obstacles to Frequent Communion

The difficulties which naturally suggested themselves when the decree of Frequent and Daily Communion was first proposed are gradually disappearing. Fortunately by the voice of sovereign authority all theoretical doubts have been swept aside at once and forever, and only the practical application of the Church's decree can still be subject to discussion. After the long night of torpor and gloom another day has broken upon the world like to that in which the early Christians walked, when the shadow of paganism was slowly fading away and the light and grace of the Spirit of God were passing over the earth and making it fair and fruitful. There is in all this no empty optimism. The supreme work of Pope Pius X, the renewal of all things in Christ by the power of the Holy Eucharist, shall not cease with him. It shall continue ever living and operative through the years to come, and future generations shall greet his memory in the words of a recent singer, "Pope of the Blessed Sacrament, all hail!"

Everywhere the number of Holy Communions is wonderfully increasing. Each day sees the Table of the Lord filled with those who have been invited to the banquet of their King and who have heeded the invitation given them. As in the rough-hewn crypt and by the dimly-lighted altar of the catacombs the faithful knelt for that daily Food which was to be their strength in the voyage through a world of carnal lust and idol worship, so in these times of a new paganism, when the abominations described by St. Paul are repeating themselves in a godless world, the Christian flock, with the same assurance as in days of old, and with the same great hope of final victory, come in ever greater numbers to receive that Bread of Life which is to be their joy and strength in the battles for the Faith. Thus the promise of Our Lord is daily approaching its fulfilment, "My Sacred Heart shall reign!"

Everywhere, too, the young of the fold are sweetly attracted to the Shepherd of their souls Whose supreme delight it is to take them to His Heart. Even during the vacation months frequent and daily Communion is practiced by children in many parishes, and the little ones are coming of their own accord to beg for their daily dole of that Bread for which the Master Himself has taught them to ask, in each Our Father from their lips, that it might be daily given them.

What has been dreaded by many as the main obstacle in the way of this great renewal of the world through frequent and daily Communion is the multiplied making and hearing of confessions. The fact, however, is that whatever difficulties may here present themselves in the beginning, it is clear that the number of confessions can soon be considerably reduced. The more frequently the Holy Eucharist is received the less is the need of the sacrament of Penance. As Canon Antoni so well says in his precious booklet which has received the special approbation of the Holy Father:

"If we desire that daily, or at least frequent Communion . . . should not be a dream and a chimera, we must, while striving that frequentation of the Holy Table may flourish in the world, strive also to render less frequent the confessions that are not necessary (i. e., not of obligation because no mortal sin has been committed). Let us teach souls to receive every day they can, without fear and with joy, during weeks, even during months if this be necessary, so long as they are not sure of having sinned mortally since their last confession." ("Why Do so Many Vain Fears Deter," etc.)

It is of supreme importance that children and adults alike be well instructed upon these points: that where there is the right intention and no certainty of mortal sin, it is always better to receive Our Lord in Holy Communion than to abstain from this divine banquet even for a single day. How many pious souls will even now fear to approach the Holy Table merely because they could not go to confession, although they are not conscious of any mortal sin, perhaps not even of a deliberate venial sin. Let this fatal delusion, so detrimental to the spiritual welfare of school and parish, be driven from the minds of the faithful, and at once the altar rails will be thronged with ever greater numbers of devout participants. How many a poor working girl, who is occupied until late hours on Saturday evening, could thus receive her Divine Spouse at least every Sunday, although her opportunities for confession are of necessity somewhat limited. How many a youth might thus preserve his purity intact by the watchfulness imposed upon him, not even to mention the transformation which would take place in his soul by the frequent contact with the Body of the All-Pure.

What concerns the hearing of the children's confessions likewise affords no insuperable difficulty, if proper method is employed. Experience has shown that frequent Communion is entirely practicable for our schools. By assigning special days other than Saturdays for the various grades, the confessions of all can readily enough be heard and an opportunity be afforded each of the children for frequently and daily receiving the Body of the Lord. These confessions of the children can soon be considerably reduced and will become but a short tale, briefly told and full of consolation for the priest who hears them. Indeed what greater joy can there be for him than thus to secure the purity of the younglings of his flock, and so in time to sanctify the entire parish. Even should the labor appear great, the fruits are inestimably greater and beyond all estimation.

We are not to be understood as wishing to depreciate the value of the sacrament of Penance and the advantages of frequent absolution; but neither may we insist upon these things unduly, not to say wrongly and unjustly, at the expense of that which is of the very greatest importance, the utmost frequency of Holy Communion. With what can we ever hope to repay the soul that has through our fault been deprived of even one single reception of the Blessed Sacrament, and how, by the same measure, can that soul ever repay us for even one sacramental union which we have procured for it. Yet it will be well where advantage is taken of such instruction, to counsel an act of contrition in cases of venial sin, or of doubt or fear. Indeed an act of perfect contrition will always be useful and salutary for the soul. Nor must we forget the important clause of the decree which insists that "care is to be taken that Holy Communion be preceded by serious preparation and followed by a suitable thanksgiving, according to each one's strength, circumstances and duties."

With regard to our little ones we must be careful, as we are warned, not to fear their giddiness and irreverence. All who have experience in these matters know what fatal mistakes parents and even teachers are so often making in this regard. A refractory child is kept from the Holy Table and the one great means, especially instituted for its improvement, is most unreasonably denied it. We have here again the old misconception as to the purpose of the Holy Eucharist, the old leaven of Jansenism in our dealing with souls! Why do we not allow our Lord to have care of the child, as He so much desires, and why do we not patiently abide His own good time for its correction without casting up to it its frequent or daily Communions as a reason why it should be better. This last, indeed, would be the most unpardonable mistake of all. Let us not meddle with the most intimate secrets of the King. The child is His and has now become a hundred fold more dear by its Eucharistic unions with Him. Even to mention these when there is question of correction means to endanger their continuance. If we ourselves have not become saints in all these many years, why do we expect the little ones to be made such in a week or even in a year? There is, moreover, no reason for supposing that the children in our charge are different from those the Holy Father knew when he was still a simple parish priest; or from those others who climbed our Saviour's knee and laid their head upon His Sacred Heart. What though they shouted about Him in their play without heeding in the least how tired He was, or how His own apostles were annoyed and vexed at them—He had but one word to say, "Forbid them not!"

Finally, in promoting frequent and daily Communion we must be careful not to consider the rules of our schools to be, as Father De Zulueta says, the laws of the Medes and Persians, which can never be changed. It would not do, for instance, to insist upon the pupils hearing the common Mass when they had already heard a Mass and received Communion. This would make the desires of the Church impossible of fulfillment.

The Holy Eucharist, as the centre of our religion; and Holy Communion, as the greatest act in the individual life of each Christian; and frequent reception of the Blessed Sacrament, as the ultimate remedy against all the evils of our time and the ultimate means of renewing the child, the home, the parish and the world itself in the spirit of Christ—these are matters too sacred and important to be hindered by any petty considerations of long-standing law and order. We are not pleading for a relaxation of discipline, but for a readjustment of it wherever this is needed. It is absurd, as all admit, to trim a diamond to one seventh of its size merely because the setting is too small, even should that setting be of purest gold. It certainly would be as unreasonable to restrict students to one Communion a week, and that on Sundays, because we have a rule which makes seven Communions a week impracticable or impossible.

Organization will help us to overcome these obstacles more easily, and will suggest solutions for farther difficulties that may occur. It will prompt us, likewise, to resolve with greater generosity that where others have succeeded we will not permit ourselves to fail through want of energy or tact or zeal for the glory of God.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Child-Training, Old and New

Long ago, when political reform was first really agitated in England, many, believing that it could give a Medean formula for the world's renewal, were ready to do for existing society what the daughters of Pelias did for their old worn out father. Such treatment, which no writer of newspaper English to-day could qualify otherwise than as "drastic," was in less cultured times called "radical." Whence the name of the political system which has supplanted Whig Liberalism, as every system true to principles, whether good or bad, must get the better of cousins, thinking to live by compromise and half-measures.

In those days, too, was a nurse impatient of novelties, whose bitterest reproach to an unruly child was, "you young radical." For there were then certain dicta, expressing so exactly the rudimentary relations to society of children, whose social rights are what theologians call "futuribles," that they were looked upon as axioms. Their origin was lost in antiquity. Some thought them to be in remarkable harmony with Holy Writ. But, however this may have been, their importance in the education of youth was such that to violate them deliberately was taken to be possible to only a revolutionary spirit. Among them were, "Children should be seen and not heard"; "They should speak only when spoken to, and should be respectful to their elders, both in word and in carriage"; "They should eat what is set before them, neither picking, nor choosing, nor complaining"; "They should not question commands, but obey immediately; and should go straight to bed at a fixed hour and get up the instant they were called." These and similar maxims formed childhood's rule; and many beautiful stories to illustrate them may still be read in families so fortunate as to have preserved "The Parent's Assistant," "Sandford and Merton," Miss Edgeworth's "Moral Tales," or other such wholesome books.

But even these principles are called in question. Why should children be seen and not heard? Why must they eat bread and butter while grown people have cake? Why are they alone to be subject to the Draconian law: "Either butter or jam, but not both." Why should they go to bed and get up by rule, while their elders are as irregular as they please? One considering human nature in the abstract only, may find it hard to answer; and many reformers of child-training remain too much in the abstract. Such as draw from the concrete daily confirmation of their faith, that in Adam all sinned, and that his sin works in every child born into the world, darkness of the understanding, weakness of the will, and a strong inclination to evil, find the answering very easy indeed.

In the first place, put comparisons aside. We elders are not free to talk when, where, and how we please; nor are fastidiousness at table and irregularity of hours privileges allowed us. We have to mortify our corrupt members; but, having the full use of our intellectual and moral faculties we are usually left to our own initiative. Children, with as great a repugnance to discipline as we, but without our maturity of powers, must be forced to what they will afterwards have to do freely; and this is the sum and substance of moral training.

"Adeo in teneris consuescere multum est," that, unless trained early to obedience and self-restraint, men hardly practise them in riper years. Some pretend that a strict bringing up of children only makes them the laxer after their emancipation, and quote examples to prove it. Such examples may show sometimes an imprudent application of the system; more frequently they demonstrate the malice of the human will, which nothing natural or supernatural, binds absolutely in this world; but they do not touch the system itself. On the other hand are cases innumerable of happiest results. Lady Georgiana Fullerton, Lord Granville's daughter and granddaughter of the Duke of Devonshire, was, with her brothers and sisters, brought up under the old rule. Once, when about twelve years old, she got into her mother's boudoir, where she saw some brown lumps in a pretty box. They looked nice. She smelt one, and the smell was agreeable. She licked it, and found the taste more than pleasant. Mother Eve awoke within her, and she swallowed it. Then came the fear, perhaps she had taken poison. She watched for the symptoms of death. They came not; for the lumps were only chocolate creams. Lady Georgiana was the flower of the Granville flock; but all showed, more or less, the fruit of early training. And so, when she had become a Catholic and was leading her penitential life in London, neither her unfashionable dress and ungloved hands, nor her life so alien to that of the Established Church, made her unwelcome in her brother's house; for he had learned in the stern old school, that virtue, not luxury, nor exterior show, is the mark of nobility pleasing to God.

Parents nowadays seem too ready to let children do what they like at home and abroad. Take, for instance, ball-playing in the streets. It is a small matter. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred no harm comes from it to anybody. But inasmuch as it is forbidden, it is a misdemeanor, a setting at nought of public authority. Yet parents look on without a word of reproof. "Would you deprive the poor children of their pleasure?" they ask, showing how weak is their own notion of obedience. Any pleasure that puts one in conflict with lawful authority must be renounced, and the sooner children learn this the better. Get the ordinance in the matter changed, and then let the children play; but so long as the ordinance stands no parent who understands his duty will tolerate its violation. Should one think the departure from the old "abstine et sustine" discipline is not preparing danger, let him watch a band of respectable boys deliberately tearing pickets out of a fence in order that, playing ball on forbidden ground, they may have a ready means of escape when watchers warn them of an approaching policeman.

A new instrument for the training of children has just been invented, the boy-scout organization. This has its own laws, not bad as far as they go, with this evil, that it tends to become an imperium in imperio, to look upon its private code as sufficient for its members, and to ignore the greater family and public law. Hardly had it begun than complaints were heard of hedges broken through, fields trampled, etc. But its great evil is that, at present it seems to violate the fundamental principle of all sound training: "children should be seen and not heard," which means that, as their social status is rudimentary only, implying no more than the rudiments of personality, rights, acts and responsibility, they should know their place in all modest humility and govern themselves accordingly. Instead of this, the scout, seen and unseen, makes himself heard more than distinctly; and whatever skill he may gain in building fires, boiling kettles, reading shop windows at a glance and tracking imaginary foes, would be too dearly bought at the price of elementary virtue. The fault is not his. He is encouraged in his natural bumptiousness by those who should know better. When the coronation festivities were preparing in England some proposed to send a party of Canadian scouts to share in them. Others of better principles objected, but the former carried the day, and an overweening vanity was stirred up in the undisciplined souls of the boys selected. The importance of the boy-scouts had been recognized, and of them they were the chief. No wonder that complaints come back of disorderly conduct, violating not only public law, but even the sacrosanct scout law itself, and that all who had to do with them, scout masters included, were glad to get rid of a band of unruly children.

We have no idea of condemning the boy-scouts absolutely. But their organization, if it is to be profitable, must be subordinated to the essential law of moral training. If its patrons find this impossible, they condemn the organization, not we. HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Portugal's Metamorphosis

It is now ten months since the youthful representative of a long line of royal predecessors went down to the beach from his country house, entered a small row-boat and then boarded the yacht which conveyed him, a fugitive, to "the very noble and very loyal town of Gibraltar, in the temporary occupation of the British." The shock then experienced by Portugal's political fabric has not been succeeded by public tranquillity; the air is still full of the mutterings and the protests of those who were hurled from their pinnacles when the monarchy was overthrown; and the feverish haste, the extravagant projects and the autocratic brutality of the successful conspirators are convincing proof, if proof were wanting, that their triumph was that of a clique, not that of an emancipated people.

An outsider, however, now has ample time, opportunity and data to examine the crisis of October 5, 1910, and to study it in its causes. It is easy to say, "I told you so"; the world is full of self-constituted prophets over whose shoulders the mantle of Elias was never draped. But, if the political life of Portugal shows anything, it shows that some kind of a violent social upheaval was bound to come. During the thirty years that preceded the revolution of 1910, Portuguese politics had hinged upon a fundamental error. That error was that the royal ministers fancied they could save the country by means of decrees and political reforms, whereas what was really needed was honest administration, the organization of labor, education, and moral discipline.

Properly speaking, Portugal has not had different monarchistic parties. It has had instead different rings of professional politicians who, indifferent to the interests of the country, have sought nothing but their own advancement and the humiliation and defeat of their adversaries.

In 1892, when the financial straits of the nation threatened to precipitate foreign intervention, a puff of patriotism seemed to stir the oligarchy and led to the formation of a cabinet blessed with lofty views and recognized uprightness; but after a short and uneventful existence it gave place to a ministry chosen from the ranks of the "Regenerators," as they pompously styled themselves, which managed to hold the reins of power for four years.

From 1897 to 1900, the so-called "Progressists" were in control, under the leadership of Luciano de Castro. It was then the turn of the Regenerators, with Hintze Ribeiro at their head and Joao Franco as a member, somewhat dissatisfied, however, and therefore dangerous and disliked. For the sake of shutting Franco out of Parliament, Hintze Ribeiro changed the election laws, not by act of Parliament, but by royal decree, a piece of absolutism against which the Radicals of the day raised no disturbance and entered no protest. Their silent acquiescence was bought at the price of a bombastic royal decree against the religious Orders. By these and similar makeshifts Hintze Ribeiro kept the whip-hand until 1904, when Luciano de Castro ousted him. But the new premier soon had troubles of his own, for one of his nominal adherents, Senhor Alpoim, nosed out a tremendous scandal in the tobacco taxes and proved that the politicians were robbing the country and enriching themselves with incredible shamelessness. During his two years in office Luciano de Castro had the Parliament in session for just twenty-five days. In March, 1906, he had to yield his place to Hintze Ribeiro once more, but the new premier resigned after a troubled administration lasting only two months.

Thus the game of political seesaw went on, first one then the other rising and then yielding to his rival, if there were real political rivalry. The occupation of each during his short tenure of office was chiefly to try to undo what the other had done, but of statesmanship, of highmindedness, of sincerity, neither showed a vestige.

In a place like Portugal, where eighty per cent. of the people are illiterate, the suffrage was of necessity a mockery and a sham, and the Parliament was a hypocritical lie. The laboring classes voted as their employers bade them, or sold their votes for wine; politics could be called nothing but an unclean traffic in which everybody sought to gratify his greed or his ambition. The king was at the mercy of cheap politicians; he was powerless to check their boldness, equally powerless to punish their crimes. In the meanwhile demagogism went on gathering recruits from the dregs of the population, and the Republican press vomited insults against the monarchy and threats against the king.

Public affairs had reached this pass when Dom Carlos decided that the time for energetic action had come. His eye fell on Joao Franco, the dissatisfied Regenerator, dissatisfied because he could not brook the dishonesty and the dastardly meanness of his party. When, in answer to the telegraphic summons of King Carlos, Franco arrived in Lisbon, the new premier, whose one great object was to rescue his country from the abyss of anarchy and political corruption into which it had sunk, was welcomed with hoots and jeers and a volley of stones. Seeing in Franco an insuperable hindrance to their success, the monarchistic ringsters made a scandalous alliance with the Republicans for the purpose of crippling him and preventing him from governing with the Parliament. But Franco, strong in his convictions and purpose, believed that he could successfully withstand the first onslaughts of his enemies and therefore issued writs for a general election. The result showed that it was probably the most honest election ever held in Portugal, for of the one hundred and fifty deputies only seventy were supporters of Franco. But there was an ominous sign in the political heavens. Many years had passed since anybody but Monarchists had sat in Parliament, whereas in this election four of the successful candidates called themselves "Republicans."

Franco effected a combination with his political adversary, Luciano de Castro, who controlled forty-three votes in Parliament, and thus had a "working majority," unsteady and uncertain though it was. But it was bought at a great price, for Franco secured the needed help only by relaxing the severity of the laws against anarchism and by otherwise playing into the hands of the Progressists.

In spite of the factious opposition of those not in the "combination," Parliament was in continuous session from September 29, 1906, to April 11, 1907. The fiercest encounter took place over the loans or anticipated payments to the crown. The civil list was, in 1906, what it was in 1821, namely, $400,000, a heavy burden, undoubtedly, for a poor country like Portugal, but at the same time insufficient for the king to meet becomingly the expenses of his position. All the various cabinets had met the difficulty by granting to the king secret advances, adeantamentos, they were called, and thus he had obtained his allowance before it was due. The first result of this secret anticipation of payment was that the king lost his authority over the cabinet and became practically their captive.

With a loyal determination to remedy the evils of the anticipated payment system, Franco publicly admitted its existence, hoping thus to legalize it and to secure an increase in the king's allowance. Would that he had never taken the fatal step! The Republicans said that his action was not loyalty but contempt; the Regenerators saw in it only rashness and impropriety; the Progressists viewed it as an insult to the national misery. The parliamentary alliance between de Castro and Franco came to a sudden end, and the premier laid the question of governing before the king. The story goes that Dom Carlos then said to Franco: "Remember the Potsdam grenadier whom Frederick the Great surprised when he was on the point of deserting. Resting his hand on the shivering grenadier's shoulder, the Prussian monarch said: 'Wait till to-morrow, for there will be a battle; if we are defeated, let's desert together.'"

Thus began Franco's dictatorship, if so it may be called, for it was in name rather than in reality, since he was unable to master the situation as the circumstances imperatively demanded. Timid and hesitating, Franco undid on one day what he had done the day before. Without being either a tyrant or a Liberal, on one day he acted as a tyrant and on another day as a Liberal. Not strong enough to make his opponents fear or even respect him, his course emboldened the ruff-raff and prepared the way for mobocracy. Hatred for the king and his premier increased. A revolution was planned for the night of January 28, 1908, but it came to naught, for Franco nipped it in the bud. As the Government knew every detail of the plans and preparations of the revolutionists, the most elementary political sense would have suggested that the attempt should have been permitted and then met with the mitrailleuse, thus putting an effective and permanent end to it. Unfortunately, such was not the view taken by Franco, who limited himself to the arrest of some of the chief conspirators. A few days later, February 2, 1908, King Carlos and his heir were brutally assassinated for the sole crime of trying to save Portugal's treasury from the burglarious activities of political gangsters. Before their corpses were buried their assassins were called to form a cabinet for the youth who came to the throne. Franco's dictatorship speedily gave place to license. The crime went unpunished; the criminals were glorified. The graves of the conspirators who died in the act were decked with flowers, and a national subscription was started for their surviving kindred. Two years later the monarchy fell. The teachings of experience, which history gathers and preserves, will tell future ages that those who were responsible for the catastrophe of October, 1910, were the Monarchists themselves, who laid the train for it by their dishonesty, their blunders, their disputes, their greediness, their cheating, their selfishness, and their disgraceful rivalries. Treacherous, cowardly, wanting in all moral and political principles, on them lies the blame for the tyranny under which their country now groans.

Present Condition of the Catholic Church in Russia

Judging by the written law we would conclude that Russia is granting the greatest liberty to the Catholic Church. The same freedom would likewise seem to be extended to all other religions. The forty-fifth paragraph of the constitutional laws of the realm thus reads: "Freedom of conscience is granted, not merely to all Christians of foreign denominations (i. e., Christians who are not of the 'orthodox' faith), but likewise to Jews, Mohammedans and pagans. May all nationalities that dwell in Russia praise God the Most High in their various tongues, according to the law and manner of their ancestors, bringing down blessing upon the rule of the Russian monarchs and praying to the Creator of all for the increase of public welfare and the strengthening of the power of the realm."

The liberty of conscience here spoken of and promised to Catholics and to their Church in Russia has its existence upon paper only. Woe to the Catholic who would dare openly to confess his faith! Woe to the Catholic Church herself should she attempt publicly to manifest her cult outside the walls of her houses of worship. In practice there is only one officially acknowledged and legalized religion prescribed for all Russian subjects: the so-called orthodox, Greco-schismatic Church, which recognizes in the Czar the spiritual, as well as temporal head of the nation, and rejects the Roman papacy.

In the year 1847, after many negotiations, a concordat was finally concluded between Russia and Pope Pius IX, the thirty-first article of which—likewise confined to the document only—assured to bishops the free exercise of their episcopal jurisdiction, even in matters of education, and gave official recognition to their consistories. At the same time the metropolitan sees Mohilew and Warsaw, with their suffragans, were newly regulated. This concordat likewise was disregarded. As early as the year 1850 various Catholic convents were closed, many churches were withdrawn from the Catholic jurisdiction, and priests who remained loyal to their offices were removed from their positions. When in 1852 the Metropolitan of Mohilew, without consulting the government, sent out a circular regarding the architectural preservation of houses of worship, he was informed by the ministry that not the slightest change had come about in existing conditions because of the concordat. Significant likewise is the fact that this latter was made public for the first time as late as November, 1856, nine years after it had been concluded, and even then was published only in an entirely mutilated edition, accompanied by legislative enactments which completely contradicted its clauses.

As a sequel to all this we find that the episcopal sees often remained unoccupied for ten or twenty years at a time, processions were forbidden since 1865, and permission to receive the assistance of stranger priests was refused to parishes that existed without pastors. The diocesan seminaries were barred, but license was given periodically for groups of twenty students to be accepted at the seminary of Samogitien. A commission appointed at Wilna translated into Russian the Catholic ritual, a number of sermon models and the most common prayers and books of devotion. These were by force of law to be introduced into the Catholic Church services. The Latin books, meanwhile, were taken from priests and laity by the police authorities. All who would not submit were sent as exiles into Siberia. Even the Catechism was improved upon. So, to give an instance, the corporal works of mercy were reduced to six, that which bids us to console or release the prisoners being omitted as contrary to the laws of the empire. The saying of the beads, May devotions and the Forty Hours Adoration were all interdicted. Religious associations among the laity were not tolerated and the crime of membership was visited with severe punishment. Sermons could not be delivered in the churches, and only a reading out of a legally authorized spiritual book was permitted. Even catechetical instructions could not be given, except with permission of the public authorities.

Under strict enforcement of these laws bishops and priests have gone and still are going to-day into Siberian exile. In 1870 there was but one bishop left in Russia, and he, too, was driven into banishment. Since 1872, however, the government has somewhat relaxed the reins. Four sees were filled and priests were suffered to return from exile; but the State subsidy was withdrawn from Catholics after 1877. Under these circumstances it is indeed an exceedingly great honor for the Catholic priests and laity of Russia to be able to record of them that, with a very few sad exceptions, they chose rather to go into exile, and so to certain death, than in the least to deny their Faith.

Since 1882 the conditions of the Catholic Church in Russia have become more favorable. The exiled bishops were then pardoned, the seminaries were reopened, and in making appointments for parishes only the candidates for the largest parishes of the empire were to be presented for government approval. But already, in 1884, the bishop of Luzk was deprived of half his income, because in correcting a priest he had freely used his own authority.

The edict of toleration issued in 1906 seems, however, to give greater freedom to the Catholic Church. Bishops can independently appoint, exchange or dismiss priests, although report of their actions must be made to the government. Crosses and mortuary monuments cannot be erected without first securing official authorization. Processions may take place anywhere; but the public authorities must be notified of time and place. Catholic priests receive leave of absence for an indefinite time, even as the schismatic clergy, and in virtue of this they may go beyond the boundaries of their parishes. The Catholic convents of Russian Poland, which have continued by tolerance only, remain in existence; but how the public authorities intermeddle in their affairs has been shown in the lamentable case of Censtochan. Governors, however, have no longer the power to abolish the convents.

But Russia never changes. From time to time sham concessions are made to the Catholic Church, either because the political position of Russia makes this imperative, as in the revolution of 1905, or because she desires other concessions from Rome. Her purpose accomplished, the old scenes of violence at once repeat themselves. The Catholic Church possesses no more real liberty to-day than before the act of toleration—except in the statute books. If Catholics, especially bishops and priests, suffer less from the Russian authorities in any locality, it is because they have paid for this immunity with a goodly sum; for everything is venal in Russia. as the old saw has it:

"In Russia all is subject to the Czar;

For gold you buy whatever things there are."

The conversion, moreover, of a schismatic to the Catholic Church has been made exceedingly difficult. The priest who dares to receive a Russian into the Church must pay for his action by the life-long horrors of a Siberian exile, from which there is no relief for him except death. And yet the thirteen million Catholic subjects of an empire that counts about one hundred million inhabitants have assuredly a claim to some right and liberty.

The situation, therefore, of the Catholic Church in Russia is most depressing. The liberty she enjoys is neither more nor less than individual officials have a mind arbitrarily to grant or to deny. An appeal to the statutes of the law would be the utmost temerity; and in these conditions the year 1906 has wrought no change.

WILHELM SCHLÖSSINGER, O.P.

Y. M. C. A. and Portugal

The following letter, written by A. H. Silva, founder of the Young Men's Christian Association in Portugal, and contributed to the Frankf. Warte, needs no comment. It gives us a splendid replica of the work accomplished against the Catholic Church by the Methodism of Italy and of the common cause which it has been making with infidelity. After boasting of the exalted rôle which Protestantism played in the establishment of the new republic "by instilling into the people Christian ideas of truth, honesty and freedom," subjects of which Catholics, of course, have no conception, the naïve epistle thus continues:

"Before the Republic was proclaimed we had about 50 Protestant centres, with about 1,000 adult members, 35 Sunday schools with 2,268 pupils, 69 Young Men's Christian Associations with 765 members, and 8 Young Ladies' Associations with about 400 members. But now the proclamation of the Republic has begun a new era in this land. The country has now been thrown open for the promotion of every good work. We have a great field of labor before us. The new government was said to be inimical to religion. This is not true. It is opposed to monopoly in religion, but in favor of religious freedom. After the proclamation of the Republic I was several times at Lisbon, and have always received words of encouragement. Affonso Costa, the Minister of Justice and one of the leaders, had long before said to me, 'Do not grow weary of spreading the Gospel of Christ among the people.' Five days after the proclamation of the new system, when I was called to him to offer my congratulations, before I could say a word he congratulated me and said: 'Now you have all the freedom which you need for spreading your good work!'

"We Protestants look with great sympathy upon the work of the government. As far as I am aware, no Protestant has suffered directly or indirectly by the revolution" (No. 61, 1911).

In Albania the Malissori insurgents have at last decided to accept the amnesty offered by Turkey. The submission was made only in deference to the wish of King Nicholas of Montenegro, but the rebels at the same time insist that they have no belief in the sincerity of the Turkish offer.

CORRESPONDENCE

Various Phases of Anti-Clerical Activity

ROME, July 30, 1911.

Just before his illness the Holy Father issued an autograph letter to the Father General of the Dominicans, thanking him for his report on the condition of studies and discipline in the University of Freiburg, from a visit to which the Father General had just returned. His Holiness congratulates him on the high standard of teaching and training there, and assures him of his confidence that the university will turn out ecclesiastical students with the true ecclesiastical spirit, as well as sound dogma, to combat with purity of life and doctrine the spirit of the world and the errors of the day.

The agitation against Father Savio's school history of Italy has had results. Its first denunciation was made in the Rivista della Massoneria Italiana, a periodical published at the Masonic headquarters here and circulated privately among the Masonic members, with the natural consequence that it slips out betimes among the uninitiate. The agitation was then taken up by the anti-clerical press, and eventually a government inspector of secondary education was induced to forbid the use of the book in any private school under menace of its suppression. The book recommended to replace it is by one Doctor Simon, published by Luigi Mongini, a former editor of Asino, and is so thoroughgoing in its anti-clericalism as to win the loudest praise from the Asino and its ilk. Father Savio, who is a member of "The National Committee on the History of Italy" and of "The Academy of Sciences of Turin," has committed the unpardonable offence, in writing of the events of the Restoration of Italy, of giving documentary reference to prove his statements in qualification of the ineffable greatness of Mazzini and Garibaldi.

On the octave of the feast of our Lady of Mount Carmel took place the solemn procession of the confraternity of that name at the Church of St. Chrysogonus in Trastevere, a function which dates back in the archives of the confraternity to the year 1543. This year the houses all along the line of the procession were gaily decorated, and from the windows flowers were showered down before the statue of our Lady as it was borne along the way. Over forty thousand people gathered in the district to share in the devout celebration. A counter parade of anticlericals in the evening, in protest against the clerical invasion of Trastevere, caused only a ripple, though it halted before the church to shout, "Down with the Pope!" and "Viva Giordano Bruno!" The carabinieri, this time in sufficient numbers, drove back the paraders from the church door and pressed the line of Catholics inside of the church. The police confined themselves to arresting a few of the more obstreperous Brunoites and confiscating a host of anarchistic emblems. For all the world it would remind you of what one reads of the Orangemen of Belfast, only the local color is not yellow, but red.

The rabid Socialist newspaper, the Avanti, which used to be a near neighbor on the Via del Seminario, has been transported, bag and baggage, to Milan, where, with an increased capitalization, it will continue its energetic propaganda in that centre of industry. At the same time the Seculo of Milan and the Messaggero of Rome, both republican and violently anticlerical, have been financially consolidated. It is said that the Messaggero is the most widely read newspaper in Rome. C. M.

Amenities of Portuguese Republicanism

LISBON, July 30, 1911.

A prominent feature of the provisional Government is the ease with which arrests of persons supposed to be disaffected towards the republic are made on the strength of anonymous denunciations or on suspicion. Some of the charges would be looked upon as laughable if the consequences of falling into the clutches of the self-constituted authorities were not so serious. One of these charges, which has brought many people to grief, is that of defamation, public or private, of the republic.

For the sake of stirring up among the ignorant a greater hatred of the religious Orders, the Government organ announced a few days ago, and the statement was at once reproduced in all the Republican newspapers, that a friar had been arrested in the town of Espinho because it was discovered that he was carrying a valise full of bombs. The most surprised readers of the announcement were the authorities and citizens of the town, for nobody there had heard of the arrest. In other words, the whole tale was a cruel fabrication.

Speaking of the arbitrary arrests which we have mentioned, O Paiz, which, by the way, is the property and mouthpiece of a member of the cabinet, says: "We are told that those who are locked up on suspicion have spent the last fifteen days in the prison of Cintra. Why are they not brought to justice? Where are the proofs of their crimes? Where is the independence of the judiciary? Was it for such purposes that the republic was called into being? It looks as if those who swore to defend the republic are bent upon making it odious."

The sessions of the Constituent Assembly continue to be a ridiculous parody of a congress. When addressing the delegates, Affonso Costa affirmed, amid a burst of applause, that the administration is the bulwark of freedom of conscience, for it is ready to use severe repressive measures against the bishops if they attack republicanism. "The separation of Church and State," he added, "has been very easily accomplished. I hail the Assembly for that achievement, and also for having freed the schools from all ecclesiastical influence." Bernardino Machado, in his turn, stated that separation of Church and State did not imply rupture with Rome, for there were many Portuguese Catholics, and their rights should be respected. This statement, as far as it means anything, when taken with the sectarian fanaticism of the administration, seems to imply that the Government will try to retain the nomination of bishops and other Church dignitaries, as was the practice under the monarchy.

M. Jaurès, the French socialistic deputy, paid a visit to the Assembly on July 20. When his presence in the gallery was noticed, Minister of Foreign Affairs Bernardino Machado moved that he be admitted to the floor of the house. A committee was appointed to conduct him to a seat, where he was greeted by the delegates amid wild demonstrations of enthusiasm.

The latest extravagant tale sent out by the radicals against the Jesuits is that a counter-revolution against the republic is being prepared with the help of Jesuit funds. "This plot, organized with the help of Jesuitism," is the way O Mundo puts it. "The money of the Society of Jesus is filling the conspirators with courage," says O Intransigente. Fearing that such silly statements might be believed by simple and incautious readers, Father Cabral, the Jesuit Provincial, wrote from Maestricht, where he is enjoying the protection of Calvinistic Holland, an indignant protest against the slanderous assertions of his Portuguese fellow-citizens, and denounced their conduct in strong terms.

There are now four candidates for the presidency. They are, first, Magalhaes Lima, whose name has been proposed by the Freemasons, the Carbonari, and the old Republicans; Bernardino Machado, who is in the provisional cabinet; and Basilio Telles and Manoel de Arriaga. Diversity of opinion in the provisional cabinet has the effect of multiplying the candidates.

By a decree of the Minister of War, under date of July 30, glee clubs are to be formed in the barracks, and while on the march the soldiers are to sing patriotic songs; every Saturday the officers are to give addresses on loyalty to the flag; the soldiers are to be careful about their uniforms and their appearance in general; and they are to be taught to be respectful to their superiors.

The venerable University of Coimbra has fallen upon evil days indeed. In the final examinations a youth named Almeida Acevedo rashly wrote the name of God with a capital letter, for which enormity he was forthwith suspended. Other students, having received lower notes than they considered their due, declared a strike, which degenerated into a riot.

Destruction of Village Churches in France

One of the consequences of the Separation Law in France touches upon a subject that, although it does not involve a question of principle, is none the less very close to the hearts of Catholics—the impending destruction of the country churches in France.

The glorious cathedrals raised to the honor of God by the medieval artists are comparatively safe, so are a number of churches that, as is the case in Normandy, for instance, possess special artistic merit. These have been, since 1830, placed under the care of official inspectors, who, as a rule, are men of culture and taste, whose work lies outside the heated sphere of politics.

But throughout the length and breadth of France, from the verdant pastures of Normandy to the sun-bathed plains of Provence, there are hundreds of churches that, although possessing features of artistic or historical interest, are not classed among the "monuments historiques" to which the law of 1830 applies. Then, again, there are thousands of humble little sanctuaries devoid of beauty, but rich in local memories, that have been for centuries centres of spiritual life and houses of prayer.

All these are threatened with destruction, and their impending fate is at the present moment the theme of eloquent protestations on the part of men, like the Academician M. Barrès, who are anxious to preserve the national heritage from wanton ruin.

The danger to which the churches in France are exposed is a direct consequence of the Law of Separation. Under the Concordat, the humblest village church was protected by law; it belonged to the parish; but the Curé and his conseil de fabrique (vestry board) were its guardians. When repairs were needed the expenses were paid by the parish, when possible, with the help of a grant from the Prefect of the "department," and, very often, from the Minister of Public Worship, and this system proved satisfactory. Since 1905, matters have assumed a different aspect: the churches still belong to the parish, but the State ignores their existence, the Curé is a temporary occupant, with no defined claim; the Maire, if hostile to religion, may declare the church unsafe for all and close it without his action being questioned, all the churches having become municipal property.

The expenses for repairs must be voted by the municipality and ratified by the Prefect, and in many cases the latter, to curry favor with the Government, indirectly helps the work of destruction by refusing to sanction the work. In other cases the municipal councillors themselves are too indifferent to care about preserving their church, or, if not indifferent, too poor to carry out their wishes in this respect.

Whatever may be its varied causes, one fact remains certain, there are now hundreds of village churches throughout France that are literally falling to pieces, and this is more particularly the case in the departments of l'Aube and l'Yonne. A remarkable article by M. Ernest Judet, in the Eclair, puts this situation in a strong light. After a thorough inspection of these sanctuaries, a well-known writer, M. Max Drumie, concludes that, owing to their peculiar build and to the materials employed, the churches of l'Aube and l'Yonne are on the verge of destruction, and the reflections that are suggested to him by that discovery apply to the state of many churches in other parts of France. The representatives of the Government are not merely indifferent, they are more inclined to rejoice when "God's houses decay, totter and fall. If necessary, they would gladly help the work, in order to please the Government or to satisfy their taste for tyranny and vexation. The Catholics from whom their churches, schools and hospitals have been taken, in defiance of all justice, naturally hesitate before they venture to incur an enormous expense which may end in the loss of the edifice that they have repaired." Who can be certain "that a church restored by them will not be to-morrow turned into a storehouse by order of the Government?"

The knowledge that they are at the mercy of an arbitrary power hampers the energies of the faithful, whose means, moreover, are straitened in consequence of the heavy expenses that the Law of Separation has entailed upon many of them; they are now called upon to support their priests and schools, and often are not able to do more.

M. Maurice Barrès, the eloquent defender of the country churches of France, is not a practical Catholic, but a patriot and a poet. In a speech that was a public event he pleaded the cause of the village churches before the French Chambers, and initiated a movement for their preservation that has met with warm response throughout the land. The ground on which M. Barrès places himself is one which all men of taste, culture, artistic and patriotic sentiments may follow, whatever may be their religious opinions. He starts with the assertion that religion is closely allied to civilization, and that, given the French temperament, the village churches, being religious centres, are necessary factors in the moral and spiritual life of his countrymen; in his eyes absence of religion in France would mean a speedy return to barbarism.

M. André Hallays, a well-known and popular writer and an excellent art critic, has taken up the subject from another standpoint, and vigorously denounces the culpable negligence, if not worse, that allows so many ancient edifices to fall to pieces. Scarcely a week passes without the appearance of an article from his pen in one or other of the Paris papers, where the claims of a picturesque church or of an artistic dwelling house are set forth. This zealous and enlightened action in the matter has more than once been fruitful in excellent results.

Among the hundred and twenty-five members of the French Touring Club the peril of the village churches has also created a movement that may help to serve the cause. Their point of view is neither social, like that of M. Barrès, nor artistic, like that of M. André Hallays, although the considerations that moved these two writers to act are fully appreciated by them.

In an eloquent appeal to his comrades, a member of the French Touring Club, M. Jean Lechemineau, points out that the neglect and ruin of the village churches is a "national danger" that threatens the common heritage of all Frenchmen.

"We want," he says, "to defend . . . not the illustrious basilicas; . . . the Cathedrals of Chartier, Beauvais, Rouen, Amiens, and others, are not in danger. But the ancient churches of our small towns and villages, all these humble and venerable edifices that are connected with our past; it is these that we must save." He goes on to show that the village church has been for centuries, and is even at the present day, the centre, the living home, the reliquary, around which gather the hopes and loves of generations. Whatever may be the irreligious tendency of the Government, the mass of the French people instructively cling to the buildings that are so closely connected with its family traditions, for in spite of their highflown theories of "progress," the French peasants are at heart staunch conservatives, strongly attached to local memories. They have an innate respect for their dead, and for this reason alone they value the churches where their ancestors prayed and close to which they sleep in the village cemetery.

It is, therefore, most fortunate that men like M. Barrès, M. Hallays, and others, should take the matter in hand.

As a writer in the Saturday Review aptly remarked: "What would be Brittany without its pointed spires, or central France without its massy, romanesque little churches, or the tiny cities crowning the rocky hills of the Rhone valley without the bell in the arch of the blue sky at the top? . . . The village church is one of the chief elements of the unity of France."

What we say of the churches applies in an equal measure to many ancient "Calvaries" that, although less valuable than the churches, represent the faith and devotion of past generations. M. Barrès has just pointed out the impending fate of a "Calvary"—wayside Crucifix—at Moulins sur Noyers, in the department de l'Yonne.

This "Calvary" was erected in 1766 by a certain Abbé Bridan, who belonged to a family of artists. It needs repairs, and, the municipality having declined to move in the matter, the parish priest collected with difficulty 800 francs and requested permission to make the necessary repairs. His petition was rejected, because the "Maire" asserts that 800 francs is not sufficient to put the "Calvary" in a good condition! In reality, the village tyrant knows that the priest's contribution would suffice, at any rate, for the present, to ward off destruction; but he knows, too, that if he succeeds, under pretence that it is falling to pieces, in destroying the "Calvary," he will earn golden opinions from his chiefs.

This is but a solitary instance of what is going on, on a larger scale, throughout France, where hundreds of village sanctuaries, houses of prayer during centuries, closely connected with the domestic life of generations, are now doomed to destruction.

The Pope's Sick Room

We feel it our duty to warn the public against trusting implicitly the newspaper accounts of our Holy Father's illness. The despatches telling that he was very ill, and at one time not far from death, were undoubtedly exact; but as to what passed in his sick chamber, what he said and did, what his sisters said and did, and so forth, these things are known only to his immediate attendants, and are the last that would be given out to the secular press. Reporters, therefore, had to draw such details from their imagination. Now all imagination rests on experience. One can imagine a beast with the body of a stag, the tail of an ox, the head and neck of a horse and a single horn in the middle of its forehead, because he has had actual experience of all these.

The unicorn is an imaginary beast; but no one would say it is a probable beast. Such an assertion goes contrary to our intimate experience of the animal world. When, therefore, verisimilitude is to be obtained in a story, the imagination must work on intimate experience. Give a reporter two or three facts concerning a shipwreck or a riot, and he will be able to build up a very probable account of either, because he has a sufficiently large experience of ships, the sea, sailors, passengers, policemen and other public functionaries, soldiers and the men in the street. He has seen men of the world in their last illness; and so he could give a good account of such. But his experience of the sick chambers of ordinary Catholics is usually very slight indeed; of prelates and popes in the shadow of death he has no experience whatever. His accounts, then, of what took place in the chamber of Pius X may be called: "How a reporter would act were he a sick Pope;" but they do not represent with even remote probability what the Holy Father said or did. The pious Catholic can imagine this much better than the most accomplished newspaper man.

"The Encyclopædia Britannica"

The writers on the "Encyclopædia Britannica"—at least many of them—are the Young Turks of the modern press. The world rejoiced when these new upholders of the crescent promised to be better than their predecessors. They have turned out to be worse. They have added the ignorance, the recklessness, the aggressiveness, the confidence and the conceit of youth to the old time fanaticisms and blind hatred of Christianity that have always characterized the Turk. They are showing it now in a ghastly fashion in their efforts to subdue the heroic Albanians who, in their mountain fastnesses, are making what seems to be but is not, their last stand against the annihilation to which they have been doomed by their enemies. They will still fight and will prevail, even if the Turks, like the rest of the unbelieving world, regard them as ignorant and superstitious barbarians, who cannot be cajoled by fraud and deceit to enter into modern conditions and who, therefore, must be isolated on the rocks, starved or butchered. Meantime Europe, that was once Christian, utters not a word even of protest.

Coincident with this bloody fight against infidelity with material arms, another invasion has been set on foot in the domain of the intellect where infinitely greater ravages may be wrought. Writer after writer of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," in spite of all the promises that have been made, assails the teachings of Jesus Christ and sweeps them aside as the rubbish of a savage or barbaric age, and as absolutely unthinkable in the light of modern civilization and research. To our amazement no word of angry denunciation comes to us from Europe. There is at best only a slight murmur of dispraise. But thank God the Catholics of the United States are not mute. Taking up the alarm which AMERICA sounded the New York County Federation of Catholic Societies has vigorously denounced its calumnies, misstatements and misrepresentations. The Catholic Press throughout the land have re-echoed the battle-cry, and the National Convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies assembled in Columbus, August 20-23, with its representatives from Maine to the Gulf and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, has taken measures against these outrageous attacks on Christianity by the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and will see to it that these new and unexpected assaults by the ally of the unspeakable Turk will not result in the ruin of the Catholic Faith in the hearts of American Catholics.

The Coatesville Lynching

A frenzied mob in a town of twelve thousand inhabitants thirty miles from Philadelphia, Pa., seized a wounded and helpless negro in a hospital and with fiendish cruelty roasted him alive because he had killed a white man. The natural inference from the outrage which the press of the country has been quick to draw is that race prejudice as well as mob violence is not localized in the United States. The lesson of the Coatesville lynching, says the Baltimore Sun, is not that the people of Pennsylvania are lawless and brutal, but that human nature is much the same in that State as in Louisiana and Arkansas.

"The burnings in the South," it points out, "have not been for mere murder, but for that deeper, darker nameless crime that stirs the blood of men to vengeance as no murder can. There is probably not a community in the South with as few negroes as Coatesville where a lynching of any kind would have followed the crime of which the victim of the Pennsylvania mob was guilty. New York, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, New Jersey, Colorado and now Pennsylvania have given exhibitions of mob vengeance equal to any ever given in the South, thus proving that no geographer's line can serve to mark a difference in human nature, and that the different sections of the country are much alike once you scratch through the thin veneer of outward seeming."

The explanation does not go far enough. Is it not rather the relaxing of the hold or the absence of Christianity which furnishes the adequate explanation of these wild outbursts of passion. Right thinking and right living according to the principles of Christian faith will alone render it impossible for a man or a community to sweep aside all law and to seek private vengeance in the death of even the worst criminal. The continual recurrence of such savage acts is full of menace for the future.

A Lesson from the Enemy

If the public schools are a menace to the faith of Catholic children who attend them, the daily Vacation Bible Schools are a direct attack on that faith, and one to which the attention of Catholic parents and Catholic apostolic workers should be aroused. The evil is certainly spreading, and should be remedied before it gets beyond control. In New York there are, we understand, thirty of these schools conducted under the auspices of Protestant Church organizations, and no doubt they are numerous elsewhere. Statistics would be helpful as showing Catholics how widespread is the danger from this source to the faith of their children. The Right Reverend Charles D. Williams, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Michigan, in a recent issue of the American Magazine, makes light of the numerical strength of Catholics in this country, which he calls "a specious appearance of outward prosperity . . . maintained only by the floods of immigration that pour in upon us annually from Latin countries." He adds, "the second generation of these immigrants, born on American soil, largely drifts away from the Church," and plainly insinuates that the "Roman Church" is constitutionally incapable of holding these young Americans. Were Bishop Williams to visit the little Church of Our Lady of Loretto in Elizabeth Street, New York, the very heart of the Italian quarter in lower Manhattan, he would see for himself that if the children drift away it is not through any inherent weakness in the great Mother Church of Christendom.

Beset by an active, tireless and hostile propaganda, with commodious and handsome church buildings and recreation halls, with settlement workers visiting every home and resorting to every device to entice the young and the old from the religion which has moulded their race into the most refined, cultivated and artistic nation in Europe, the four struggling priests, dwelling in little cells that are refrigerators in winter and bake-ovens in summer, have set up a little bee-hive of Catholic activity which speaks well for the power which, if exercised, the "Roman Church" still possesses over the minds and hearts of the second generation of Catholic immigrants. All day long and until late in the evening the Italian children, boys and girls of tender years, hold possession of courtyard and classrooms and sidewalk and street to be near the church and near the Fathers and teachers who pass most of their time among these fascinating and lovable little ones. During the school year six hundred Italian children are crowded into a remodeled dwelling, which is but a makeshift for a school, and hundreds are denied admission, simply because there is no room. Every night in the week boys and young men who are at work during the day gather in the classroom to profit by the various studies and exercises that are to fit them to become good Catholics and worthy citizens. In scores of Italian parishes in the city like work is going on. The difficulties they have to contend with are manifold, but the most serious are unquestionably those which they meet from the proselyting agencies about them. The Vacation School is not the least formidable. Bible lessons and Bible stories are always a part of the daily program, and the impressionable, plastic child, with indifference in the home circle, easily falls a prey to the hostile agents of perversion, who are drawing hundreds and thousands from the fold. One of these agents in Philadelphia writes boldly to the Philadelphia Ledger:

"I should like to call attention to the work of our Daily Vacation Bible Schools, which are doing much for the children during the summer, just as the playgrounds are doing much for those who cannot go away. For several years these schools have carried on their work, and each year we have had more of them. The children are taught many good things, and their bodies and minds are alike developed, and the teachers, largely college men and women, are benefited in the knowledge which comes to them of human nature and how to help it. We have some fifty or more schools in Philadelphia, for many of which the association is financially responsible, and we need $500 to carry us through the summer. Will not some of our generous citizens help us? Money may be sent to me or directly to the treasurer."

The effrontery of this appeal is staggering. The public is called upon to help generously a Protestant propaganda in a city where Catholics form a very large percentage of the population, and Catholics view with equanimity and unconcern the progress in their midst of an active agency of perversion. Catholics have their large parochial school buildings, very often with playgrounds attached, which, with few exceptions, are closed during the long summer months, while the children roam the streets, for they have no other place to go to. If some one were to take in hand the organization of bands of Catholic Sunday school teachers or others engaged in school work during the scholastic year, how easily they might save the children of the immigrants from the harpies that are preying on their precious souls. We wonder at the political inaction of Catholics in European countries where the sanctuary is defiled and the school for Catholics closed, and we shut our eyes to a similar condition existing among ourselves, where inaction to-day is resulting in the loss of the children whose parents through an all-ruling Providence are brought to these shores that they and their children may be saved to the Faith.

Is It Treachery?

We read a few days ago of a lieutenant in one of our men-of-war on Puget Sound who went overboard and saved a diver in trouble. The danger of his task was enhanced, we are told, by his having to grope his way among the "binnacles" which were crowded together on the ship's bottom.

It is all very well to publish the gallantry of our officers; but we have always held that whatever makes the ships of any nation peculiarly efficient should be kept secret in the interest both of peace and of economy. In the old days it was no secret that the Chinese painted eyes on their junks, so that these might see their way to port in safety; but new China is too careful of its navy's special efficiency to let the world know whether it is keeping up the practice in its battleships. If the eyes are there, they are painted with invisible paint.

Who could have dreamed that the bottoms of our ships are crowded with binnacles, evidently to enable them to follow exactly the course laid by compass, and to keep a bright lookout for hidden rocks? The fact, moreover, is revealed, not in an American journal, but in a Canadian! Surely the betrayal of it to our northern neighbors is, to say the least, foolhardy. Had the Niobe had binnacles on its bottom, two-thirds of the Canadian navy would not now be in Halifax harbor in a sinking condition. We hope—it is perhaps a vain hope—that this peculiarity of our ships was not told to Admiral Togo.

Some one suggests that the Canadian editor meant to print "barnacles." This is absurd. Who ever heard of groping one's way among barnacles? In our boyhood we often bathed in North Pacific waters, and, when crawling up a rock for another dive, we cut our hands and feet and knees on the barnacles which certainly abound there. But we never met them so large that we had to grope our way among them, diminutive as we were then. No. The Secretary of the Navy ought to look into this, and, if necessary, order a court-martial.

Cardinal Moran

In the sudden death of Patrick Francis Cardinal Moran, Archbishop of Sydney, New South Wales, on August 6, the Church in Australia has lost a distinguished prelate and scholar and the Catholics of that distant quarter of the globe a fearless and intrepid leader. The four score years of his earthly sojourn, which were fittingly crowned with the highest honors of the Church, rounded out a career of tireless devotion to the noble purposes of an apostolic life. Whether as professor in Rome or bishop in Ireland, or again head of the Church in Australia, his voice and pen were ever employed in the cause of truth and in the amelioration of the lot of his countrymen. As a boy of twelve, he accompanied his uncle, Cardinal Cullen, to Rome, where he remained for a quarter of a century, his early years devoted to the acquisition of knowledge and piety befitting his calling, and after his ordination to the priesthood, consecrating the vigorous years of his young manhood to the duties associated with the Vice-Rectorship of the Irish College and the professorship of Hebrew in the College of Propaganda. During his long stay in Rome his love for the city of Popes as the centre of Christian unity increased day by day, with the added inspiration which enabled him, unmindful of opposition or fatigue, to labor through a long life for the cause of the Church and the welfare of his fellow man. In 1886 he returned to Ireland as secretary to Cardinal Cullen, and six years later was consecrated Bishop of Ossory. During the twelve years of his incumbency of that see he began and perfected himself in the duties of the episcopate, winning recognition from ecclesiastical superiors as the man best fitted to succeed Archbishop Roger Vaughan in the Primacy of Australia. That auspicious event took place in 1884, and little more than a year later he was honored with the cardinalate. Cardinal Moran was an able writer and lecturer, diligently serving his native land as the historian of the Irish Church and the uncompromising defender of her religious institutions. Up to the very last day of his life all eyes looked to him as the champion of Australian Catholics in their struggle for the Catholic education of their children. A few months ago he said: "The present public school system has been devised and carried on in hostility to the Catholic Church and Catholic principles. To defend those principles and to preserve the faith of our children, we Catholics, without any aid from the State, build our own schools, and have successfully carried them on, and will carry them on in triumph to the end with unfurled banners."

From the time of his arrival in Sydney in 1884 the priests of his diocese have increased from 100 to 403; teaching Brothers from 78 to 245; Sisters from 102 to 2,379; school children from 11,000 to 44,000; Catholic schools from 81 to 539; chapels and churches from 120 to 600; and charitable institutions from 5 to 40. Well has it been said that, while his contributions to Irish history and archæology entitle him to a permanent place in Irish history, the name of Cardinal Moran will be imperishably associated with the rise of the Catholic Church in Australia, and his courage and zeal in the cause of democracy and progress will be an inspiration for ages to come.

"THE ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA"

At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the New York County Federation of Catholic Societies held at the Cathedral Rectory on Tuesday evening, August 8, it was resolved that a protest be made against the Eleventh Edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," for its unscholarly treatment of religious subjects, and particularly for its unfair and, in many instances, offensive treatment of subjects of special interest to Catholics.

It was further resolved that a protest be sent to the proper authorities against the proposal of having the "Encyclopædia Britannica" placed in our Public Schools of greater New York, and with this protest be sent instances of the bigoted spirit of this "Encyclopædia," and references to misstatements offensive to Catholics, who are more than a million and a half of the people of Greater New York.

From a number of letters we have received in regard to the latest edition of "The Encyclopædia Britannica" the following selections will indicate the widespread resentment aroused by the treatment its editors have given in its pages to Catholic subjects:

The following letter was sent to the publishers of the "Encyclopædia" by one of the most prominent educators of this city:

Cambridge University Press,
Gentlemen:

I have your letter (per "G. G.") dated August 9, noting your surprise at my dissatisfaction with the manner in which the new Britannica treats topics concerning the Catholic Church, and asking me to mention specifically the articles or statements which I regard as unjust to the Church.

Perhaps you will recall that I expressed my dissatisfaction because articles concerning the Church had not been written by persons who could with authority speak for the Church. Such authority should be recognized by the Church herself. I am not concerned just now with the question as to whether or not the Church is treated unjustly. The Church ought by this time to be accustomed to unfair treatment. But I am protesting that I am not treated justly when you do not give me the Church's side by one authorized to give it in your treatment of such topics as Absolution, Bible, Confession, Divorce, Eucharist, Excommunication, Extreme Unction, Fasting, etc. These topics are treated by Protestant writers, so far as I can discriminate, for I do not recognize among them one Catholic name. You may say that the articles are written in a fair spirit, and I have no doubt that the authors intended to write fairly, but these are nearly all topics that should be presented from the Catholic point of view, if at all.

In some of the articles are positive misstatements. See article on Fasting, concerning modern Catholic teachings as to days of fasting and abstinence, and page 336 of Volume VIII: "The Church has always assumed to itself the right to grant licences for an absolute divorce."

I notice that St. Cyres has a monopoly of articles concerning the French Church during the prevalence of Jansenist and Calvinist doctrines, and that in addition to the articles on Bossuet and Fenelon, among many others he has one on the Arnauld family. In the latter he naively mentions the "incessant controversy with Jesuits, Calvinists, and misbelievers of all kinds."

I could go on to a much greater length. My attention was first called to the loose editorial work, from my point of view, by the articles which appeared in AMERICA, and I wrote to you after reading the second article. When I received your letter I began to make a cursory, and by no means careful, examination of my volumes. The more I read the more disgusted I became. Here I have given only a few of the things which have displeased me. The scholarship of the articles on the Borgias, Copernicus, and the failure to note the position of the early Fathers in the article on Evolution, particularly that of St. Augustine, disappointed me.

From an official of the Catholic Educational Association:
"The articles on the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' have been splendid, and I believe that they will touch the sore spot, the pocketbook. I know of one person who intended to purchase a set and did not do so on account of your articles. I have mentioned the matter to my people from the pulpit."

From a pastor at Crawfordsville, Ind.:
"A note of congratulation is sometimes as annoying as an appeal for assistance, but I must send you a word of congratulation on the Britannica articles in AMERICA. 'The Jesuits want no monument in the Britannica graveyard'—scorn for that unconquerable arrogance of the Britannica editor is the proper remedy. One of your non-Catholic subscribers here 'phoned me this morning, and expressed his pleasure in reading the articles. He said: 'Milk and water are good for babies, but for bigots you must put in a little acid.' I hope it is not your last word on the Britannica, for these things travel slowly and filtrate even more slowly. Keep on for some time with the Britannica."

A priest in St. Louis, Mo., says:
"I was about to write to you for some more, when your second article on the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' appeared. The head of a commercial college in Oklahoma, after reading your first article, declared he would not buy the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' though he had intended to do so. He is an Episcopalian."

A priest writes from Colorado Springs, Colo.:
"Your criticism on the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' is excellent and most timely. Would it not be possible to get all Catholic papers to copy them and get the Catholic Federation interested in this matter? Years ago I was induced to buy the old edition, and from your statement the new one is no improvement. These bigots ought to be hunted down and out of business. Let us fight them to a finish and establish a precedent for the future in similar enterprises. Keep up the fight! I am a poor man and an old man, but I have five dollars to spare to send marked copies to leading editors and wherever they will do any good. God prosper AMERICA!"

One of the best known literary men in England writes from London:

"I have read with great pleasure your 'Encyclopædia Britannica' articles. I have been disappointed at the praise given to it by some of our Catholic papers, who, I suppose, were misled, as others will be, by the fact that many articles on Catholic topics have been entrusted to well-known Catholic writers.

"I suppose you know the University of Cambridge does not really control the enterprise completely, though its connection with it has been paraded as a kind of hall-mark of value. It is not easy to get at the facts, but behind the affair is a syndicate of some kind in which the moving spirit appears to be the smart American who first boomed the old ninth edition in the U. S. A., and then here; then helped to organize the 'Times Book Club' and brought out the Times or tenth edition (i.e., the old ninth with a row of supplementary volumes), and then, after another advertising campaign to work it off, brought Cambridge into his combination for the latest edition as a valuable factor in a new advertising boom.

"It is a curious story of commercialism applied to book booming, and the man is a genius in the advertising line. The Scriptural articles seem to me to represent a most mischievous propaganda of one school of thought (or lack of it). The Vatican Council article is very bad."

From Halifax, N. S., a prominent lawyer sends this:

"I have read with great interest your articles on the 'Encyclopædia Britannica.' It does seem to me that if such articles, dealing with so important a subject, are so unreliable, it leaves the whole work under suspicion, and hence makes it useless as a work of reference. Therefore, I should think that the work is being sold under a serious misrepresentation, which would entitle any one to refuse to pay, or demand back their money and a rescission of the contract, as the case may be. I am afraid very few could be induced to take this course, which is the only one that would appeal to the publishers, as it touches their pockets. So long as Catholics continue to criticise and pay for these articles so long will they continue."

Some Press Comments.

The new edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" is just about as false, misleading and mendacious in Catholic matters as was the old one.—The Catholic Columbian.

Catholics should not purchase the "Encyclopædia Britannica," which has been so largely advertised in the Pittsburgh dailies. A competent Jesuit critic, writing in AMERICA, says of it: "It is, not up to date; it is not fair; it is not well-informed; it repeats old calumnies that have been a thousand times refuted, and it persistently selects the Church's enemies who hold her up to ridicule and contempt."—Pittsburg Observer.

Father Campbell, S.J., has dropped his criticism of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." It must be admitted that he held the work for a long time before letting it drop. If the editors take no steps toward correcting the crimes and blunders of the present edition, we must conclude that they are resolved to remain contumacious in their offending, and have no sort of desire for the patronage of the Catholics of the English-speaking world. The Catholics of the English-speaking world will have to try to get along without the aid of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." Father Campbell has done a good work, and he deserves the gratitude of all lovers of truth and even of the editors of the Encyclopædia Britannica, if they are to be numbered among the lovers of truth.—Catholic Transcript.

The point of these encyclopedic remarks is merely a reminder that the "Encyclopædia Britannica" has not improved with age or a new dress. It is to impress on Catholics and others fairminded enough to desire facts and not imaginings in a work of reference—that whatever encyclopedia they may get, they should steer clear of the "Britannica."—Catholic Universe.

The second installment of its review of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" by AMERICA is timely and educative. The managers of the new revision promised all sorts of fair treatment to Catholics. They are, if anything, worse and more bigotedly treated in this fairer age than they were in the old Ninth edition. The review by AMERICA prevents us from wasting our money on the new edition.—Catholic Register.

Some of our readers may be urged to purchase the new edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" on the ground that it is scholarly and devoid of partisan bias. For their benefit we beg to point out that the Britannica has been examined by our esteemed contemporary AMERICA and has, in many instances, been found prejudiced and untrustworthy. The article "Jesuits" is a blend of absurdity and calumny. Strange, indeed, that the editor should ask men who are antagonistic to the Church to write on questions affecting things Catholic. But a protest in the shape of a refusal to buy it may induce the editor to repudiate the articles that, while unfair to us, are a distinct disgrace to him and his staff.—Catholic Record, London, Canada.

Such is the new edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." And its editor-in-chief had the impudence to say that he "did not think there was anything in the new edition which could reasonably be a cause of offence."

Perhaps that might be true, in some sense, if the work had been lebeled, as it ought to have been, with the word "Protestant" in large letters. The offence lies largely in the fact that it is put forth upon false pretences, and that Catholic support is bid for on the false pretence that they can find in it a fair and true treatment of a Catholic subjects.

All this will, no doubt, commend the work to bigots, and to those who are looking for something,—anything,—written on their side. But Catholics who patronize it will be acting unfairly to their Church and to themselves.—Casket, Antigonish, Nova Scotia.

AMERICA is to be congratulated upon calling the attention of Catholics to the entirely unscholarly and prejudiced articles upon the Church in the new edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. Catholic educational institutions do not need this publication in their libraries. As the Church expands in English-speaking countries Catholics will secure first consideration in works professing to be encyclopedic in character—if they will let publications unjust to them severely alone.—Providence Visitor.

LITERATURE

Political History of the State of New York During the Period of the Civil War. By SIDNEY DAVID BRUMMER, Ph.D. New York: Columbia University; Longmans, Green & Co., Agents. Price, paper, $3.00.

"During the Civil War the administration at Washington waged a twofold contest, political in the North—to secure the support of public opinion—as well as military in the South. . . . To support the war and at the same time to condemn with the most intemperate criticism the administration which must carry on the war, as well as its measures for subduing the enemy, was pulling in contrary directions."

New York was the eleventh and last State to ratify the Federal Constitution before the election of President Washington, and that ratification was only half-hearted, for the final vote stood 30 to 27. It was allowed six votes in the first electoral college, while Pennsylvania and Massachusetts were given eight each and Virginia was honored with ten; but by the time that the presidential election of 1812 was reached New York had risen to the first place, and there it has since remained, the Empire State. Although it was the native State of only two Presidents, for Fillmore was an accident, its importance in national politics has always made it a battle ground where skirmishes and pitched battles have been fought, and all the strategy of political warfare has been pressed into service. Questions of policy, and even of principle, made 1860 a year of years in the field of statecraft, for older party lines were disappearing and the newer were not clearly fixed. Hence, the great importance of Professor Brummer's History. The pages, bristling with references to documents of the time, are an eloquent testimony to the conscientious and painstaking spirit which animated him in his endeavor to piece together New York's political mosaic. Though the period has happily passed, never, we trust, to return, we seem to live once more in those stormy days, so lifelike is the story. Those who faced the ordeal may now study it with the calmness that comes with years; those who are newer on life's stage will there see what the republic could undergo and yet survive. Great and good men, misunderstanding and at times misunderstood, contended earnestly, though not always wisely, with dangerous and designing men, who were prevented from outwitting only by being outwitted. Such was the course of events that the Republican party, which nominated and elected Lincoln in 1860, appeared as the "Union" party in the election of 1864, for the former name could hardly be said to be in good repute. Conditions not fully reproduced in any other State give to the history of New York during the Civil War a coloring all its own. Professor Brummer's industry enables us to grasp the peculiar difficulties of the situation and to form a more just appreciation of the men and measures of the period.

The Education of a Music Lover. By EDWARD DICKINSON. New York: Chas. Scribner's Sons.

There is much to interest in this volume. The author has evidently done a great deal of thinking, and is led to express these thoughts with enthusiasm. He has familiarized himself not only with the composers of note, but with the great names in literature and painting, poetry and sculpture. He brings us into contact with such diversified geniuses as Browning, Lafcadio Hearn, Thoreau, Milton, Boswell, William James, Raphael, Rembrandt, Kenyon Cox, Michelangelo, Ruskin, Edward Blashfield, Tennyson, d'Annunzio, Symonds, Matthew Arnold, and others. We cannot but feel ourselves in an atmosphere of culture.

Moreover, the author rises on some dizzy rhetorical flights of his own. We must try to convey the flavor. On page 281 we read of the power of music "to soothe and refresh, to symbolize what is pure and holy, to promote the social consciousness by effecting a sense of fellowship with others in a refined experience, to brace the mind for coming duties by the tonic of joy. . . . When a man feels himself thus exalted by music, when a glow of tenderness pervades his being as he goes home from a concert hall, he should not be ready to banish the impression. Even so kindly an act as speaking genially to his aunt would be wrong for him were it to bring him down abruptly from the soul's height, which, as Wordsworth reminds us, is so difficult to keep." Alas, that the glow of tenderness should not take in the aunt! On page 287 we learn that "at the sound of music, cares and distresses are overborne and the soul is set adrift on a tide that flows toward radiant horizons." We tremble lest such souls, adrift on tides, might lack that quality of definiteness which, we are told on page 45, lies at the basis of a true musical appreciation.

The author is at once a philosopher and a theologian. To do justice to his all embracing talent would require more space than we can dispose of in these columns. There might indeed be carping critics who would question the right of Thoreau and Lafcadio Hearn to the title of "mystics," or their sensations when listening to the tinkling of a music-box to kinship with "religious ecstasies," but one more familiar with religious ecstasies than the present writer might be better fitted to settle this delicate point. On page 280 we enter the realm of theology, and read, not without surprise, that "the emotion caused by music is itself an end, in the same sense that religious emotion is itself an end."

We feel sure that Mr. Dickinson is right in his contention that "the harm that the art enthusiast may incur is in a too passionate love of the sensuous," but we cannot follow him when he tells us, a few pages later, that "it is doubtful whether music has the power of registering passion." We feel no doubts on this subject.

The author commands a rare and select vocabulary. We confess to a stirring of sympathy for the "earnest mind" with "habitudes" whose acquaintance we make on page 37, for the context leads us to the reluctant conclusion that they must be bad habitudes, which would be crippling to a mind really in earnest.

We feel sure that this book will interest and entertain. It reveals a serious desire on the part of the author to contribute to the era of general culture from which so many good results are expected.

Los Sucesos de España en 1909. Crónica Documentada por SALVADOR CANALS. Tomo II. Francisco Ferrer Guardia. Barcelona: Gustavo Gili, Universidad, 45.

This is a bulky volume of nearly five hundred pages on the chief characteristics of Barcelona's "bloody week." The author spares us a description of those scenes of blood and sacrilege, for nothing was to be gained by dwelling once more upon the shame of the city. His object is to bring together the documents bearing upon Ferrer and his work. That he has been diligent we may gather from the alphabetical index, where we find over fifteen pages devoted to the names of men, newspapers, and societies of various descriptions, all being sources from which he has drawn material for his work.

Señor Canals begins with a life of Ferrer from his earliest days to his end on Montjuich. His career as a secret messenger, as a revolutionary conspirator, and as an "educator," his somewhat complicated domestic relations, and his influence over the elderly French spinster whose fortune fell to him are all pictured by letters and Ferrer's own statements. One hundred pages are given to a presentation of European opinion of the "bloody week" and the actors in it. Even a more considerable space is devoted to a discussion of the effect of the orgy of crime on Spain's domestic life. The closing pages of the work give the author's conclusions from the facts that he has adduced.

The Ferrer case is not ended. We know how brazenly and how cynically the facts were misrepresented by the enemies of religion when churches and convents and schools were still smoldering. The same contempt for truth and the same hatred of the Church may at any moment repeat the foul slanders which were then uttered. We earnestly hope that our readers who understand Spanish will arm themselves against falsehood and misrepresentation in connection with the Ferrer case by obtaining a copy of Señor Canals' invaluable work. The trifling sum of six pesetas and twenty-five céntimos will bring it by registered mail.

The Inner Life and the Writings of Dame Gertrude More. Revised and Edited by DOM BENEDICT WELD-BLUNDELL, Monk of the Order of St. Benedict. In two volumes. New York: Benziger Bros.

Dame Gertrude More, a Benedictine nun, was a great-granddaughter of Blessed Thomas More, the martyr. With a dozen other English maidens, she began her religious life in 1624 at Cambray, France, where, with her own private fortune, she started a new foundation for the little community, convents being proscribed at that time in her native land. Dame Gertrude and her sisters had their troubles during the first few years of the young community, for a succession of confessors, who were quite incapable, apparently, of directing contemplatives, so filled the nuns with doubts and scruples and misgivings that there was little peace in the monastery and but slow progress in the spirit of prayer. Then, in a happy hour, Father Baker, the great Benedictine mystic, became the nuns' director. Though regarded at first with suspicion, he soon won, by his prudent counsels, the confidence even of Dame Gertrude, who had ideas of her own, and quickly made her a proficient in affective prayer.

Meanwhile, however, a former confessor of the convert, whose methods Father Baker's success had discredited, in a pet delated his brother Benedictine to a chapter of the order. So Father Baker's writings and admonitions were all carefully examined, but as nothing save what was praiseworthy was discovered, he continued to direct Dame Gertrude and her sisters till her death, in 1633.

The first volume of the present work is a revised edition of Father Baker's life of his spiritual daughter, written in quaint seventeenth century English, and made up chiefly of a detailed account of her progress and success in practising the higher forms of prayer. The second volume is made up of Dame Gertrude's own writings, some of which have now been gathered into one book for the first time. There are fifty-three of her "Confessions of a Loving Soul," which consist of an account of her lights in prayer, her reflections on passages in Holy Writ and the cries of her heart for God. It is a book that contemplative nuns will doubtless find rich in food for the soul. But the portion of this volume that will prove most interesting to the general reader is Dame Gertrude's "Apology" or defense of Father Baker's method of direction, which she submitted to the commission of inquiry. The Lord Chancellor's descendant was unquestionably a woman of keen penetration, could easily see through shams, and, like him, was not afraid to speak her mind, but, being quite young and inexperienced, was somewhat opinionated. For instance, though she had never had a Jesuit confessor, apparently, she passes rather severe stricture on the Society's manner of direction.

This interesting contemplative was carried off by smallpox when only twenty-seven years of age. Whether she would have become, had she lived, another St. Teresa it is, of course, idle to conjecture, but workaday religious of the twentieth century will think it rather odd that, after being anointed, Dame Gertrude wished no priest to be near her deathbed, as she preferred to be alone with God. España Eucarística. Tradiciones Eucarísticas Españolas por el R. P. EUSTAQUIO UGARTE DE ERCILLA, de la Compañía de Jesús. Un vol. en 4° de 365 páginas. Precio, 5 pesetas en todas las librerías.

The Spaniard is conservative, tenacious of national customs, and a lover of antiquity. His country has a glorious past, and that past is inseparably interwoven with his religion. His Faith is reflected in the laws of his country, in popular diversions, and in the arts. Whatever of moment the history of Spain for the past fifteen hundred years contains on the Holy Eucharist, whether it be public processions, with their religious floats, or choristers dancing before the Blessed Sacrament, or mystery plays for the instruction of the ignorant, or the work of the goldsmith or the painter, or pious manuals or learned treatises, has been brought together in an attractive volume at a very moderate price. Though several photogravures are scattered through the book, we cannot help wishing that place had been found for more; for when one reads of the precious chalices, monstrances and processional crosses whose ages are reckoned by centuries, one longs to catch a glimpse of them such as no written description can give. * * *

Besides publishing many pastoral letters, addressed to the clergy and laity of his diocese, the late Cardinal Moran labored a great deal to promote the study of Irish history and antiquities. Among his published works are: "Memoir of the Most Rev. Oliver Plunkett," 1861; "Essays on the Origin, etc., of the Early Irish Church," and "History of the Catholic Archbishops of Dublin," 1864; "Historical Sketch of the Persecutions, etc., under Cromwell and the Puritans," 1865; "Acta S. Brendani," 1872; "Monasticon Hibernicum," 1873; "Spicilegium Ossoriense, being a Collection of Documents to Illustrate the History of the Irish Church from the Reformation to the year 1800," 3 4to Vols., 1874; "Irish Saints in Great Britain," Dublin, 1879; and "Letters on the Anglican Reformation," and "Occasional Papers," 1890.

EDUCATION

It is reported that every day 400,000 school children in New York City visit moving picture shows, and that in some parts of lower Manhattan 75 per cent. of the pupils go at least once a week. That elsewhere, too, children find this form of amusement very attractive may be inferred from some statistics gathered in a public school of a Connecticut manufacturing town. Out of 350 scholars there, from ten to fourteen years of age, all but 34 went to the moving picture shows; 183 once a week, 130 twice, a half-dozen every day. Now, as to what the little ones see in these theatres, the Rev. Herbert A. Jump, a Congregationalist minister, attests, as the result of visiting scores of such places of amusement in many Eastern cities, that while many motion films "leave much to be desired in the way of refinement, good taste, delicacy of feeling," not one, thanks to the censorship committee, was found to be indecent, and there were only a very few that impressed him as morally dangerous to the community. But it is the vaudeville entertainment interspersed among the films "to rest the eyes, and apparently also to pander to a depraved taste on the part of the theatre-going public," that Mr. Jump now considers the chief peril of the moving picture shows. He would have this part of the program strictly censored, too, and would have laws passed forbidding young children to attend these cheap theatres unless accompanied by their parents or guardians.

In the Catholic Educational Review for June the editor, while taking a "Survey of the Field," has this to say about "Hasty Americanization": "We are so anxious to make patriots or ward politicians in the shortest possible time out of the multitudes who annually reach our shores in search of gold that we cannot wait for our customs to solidify or for our traditions to take root in the lives of their children. We deem it our chief duty to remove from the children of our immigrant population all trace of the national customs and family traditions that for countless generations served in guiding the footsteps of their forefathers through the formative period of childhood and youth to secure manhood. That the children lose their respect for authority and their reverence for parents does not seem to concern us. Since the education which we give our children in the public schools usually results in depriving them of virtues that were long held to be necessary to the wholesome development of their characters, we immediately conclude that we have made another great discovery. What was formerly supposed to be virtue is now seen to be vice, and what many reactionaries and old fogies believed to be vice we now know to be virtues. Mr. La Rue, former Superintendent of Schools in Augusta, Maine, assures us that 'so-called irreverence, disobedience and impudence are but the first crude expressions of a fiery, straightforward, independent nature—something to thank God for, not to wail over.'"

Then, speaking of the "Fatal Compromise" Horace Mann made when he banished religion from the school and left the religious instruction of the children to the Churches, the editor shows how "seventy years of this experiment have resulted in emptying our churches and in filling our prisons. We are not daunted by the fact that during the last decade we averaged one hundred and forty-three felonious murders per million per annum, as against three in Canada and fourteen as the highest record in Europe. We have more divorces in a year than all the rest of the civilized world. Our carelessness of human life permits an industrial holocaust which so far transcends the fatalities in other countries as to stagger the imagination. But all this is not sufficient to cause our faith in the value of our plan to waver for a moment. In fact, we have forgotten all about the pitiful compromise in our action, and hail the policy of Horace Mann as the greatest educational discovery of the century."

In a paper read at a conference of the Teachers' Guild of Worcester, England, Canon Wilson bears enthusiastic testimony to the work being done in the Catholic elementary schools of Tsenon, in Bohemia. With the object of producing "the healthiest, most intelligent and best materials for the nation that are possible," parents and teachers cooperate to draw out from their earliest years the children's activities of mind and body and soul. Canon Wilson was present at a largely attended competition among half a dozen villages to see which had the largest proportionate number of healthy, neat, well-mannered and carefully trained children, and saw the two senior pupils of the winning village carry off as a prize a sacred picture that will hang in the little church of their hamlet.

The aim of Tsenon teachers, according to Canon Wilson, is "to create both a great enjoyment of school and an aptitude and liking for that labor by which the boy or girl would have to live," and they take care that the theory of the school is thoroughly intelligible to the children. The result is a keen interest on the part of the pupils in what they are doing. Both boys and girls, for instance, gave their visitor specimens of their skill in preparing a "cooperative dinner." The Canon was much impressed by the efficiency of the teachers, though they had not read at all widely about the "psychology of teaching," and was deeply interested in the children's education in religion. As a result of their training the people seemed to him "reverent and disciplined." "The town," he says, "was not only moral, but religious," and all attribute "the industry, sobriety, happiness and good sense of this people to the health and vigor and brotherly feeling that result from affectionate early care, and to their intelligent and religious education, and to training in the use of freedom, and of responsibility and of cooperation."

SOCIOLOGY

A fundamental truth, never to be forgotten though one cannot be always repeating it, is that our social work may not be other than Christian. Our civilization is Christian, our social organization is Christian. Their defects, of contrary origin, are to be cured by Christianity.

There are loose notions abroad as to the meaning of Christianity. Some take it to be a profession of the morality merely of the Gospel; and so a number of gentlemen call themselves Christian ministers because they recommend, among other things, the doing to others as one would have them to do to him. But the Golden Rule, considered in itself, is not necessarily Christian. It could have been deduced from rational principles, and, at all events, once it has been heard it can be justified by such; and, as a matter of fact, is made by many to rest on them alone. And so, before department stores came into vogue, more than one Hebrew could have been found keeping a "Golden Rule Bazaar." It is Christian because it is part of the Gospel and because of the words the Gospel adds to it: "for this is the law and the prophets." Thus is it promulgated as a divine revelation, and furnished with motives reason alone could never give.

Christianity is, therefore, a revealed religion, and consequently supernatural. It teaches, moreover, that God has raised man to the supernatural order, giving him a supernatural end, the vision of God in heaven, means directly supernatural to attain that end, and the power of clothing with the supernatural the natural things of earth, for the same purpose. This he is not free to do or to omit. He is bound to use creatures in the supernatural order in which God has placed him.

As this is the essential obligation of man in this world, society must help him to discharge it. The least it can do is not to hinder him. Now, the Gospel which God has given us for our guide is a message of the Cross. It recognizes sickness, suffering, poverty, and so on, as irremovable elements of human life. It commands us to alleviate these for others as far as we can in order to fulfil the law of Christ: it nowhere even encourages us to look on their absolute removal as possible. On the contrary, it proposes them to us as most precious means enabling us to follow Christ, the only Way, to eternal life.

This Christian doctrine must be the foundation of all Christian social work. There are many ways of inculcating it, one of which, highly approved by the Church, is found in the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius. Hence, the getting of men, business men, practical men, men interested in social reform, to make them, is a social work of no small importance.

Our modern retreats for laymen on a large scale were begun, we believe, in South America, whence other good things in religion have come. They were taken up enthusiastically in Belgium and Germany, and other nations, England and the United States included, soon recognized their usefulness. Here in New York they have been conducted for some years, and from small beginnings have grown to be so great a work that a large establishment on Staten Island has been provided for them. In California, too, they are carried on in a country house belonging to Santa Clara College, and in Canada in a similar house attached to St. Mary's College, Montreal. In all these laymen are received, lodged, and fed, so that during the exercises they are undistracted by any communication with the world without. In the Western States they have been conducted for three years past in St. Mary's College, Kansas, not far from Kansas City. Three retreats, each of three days, the usual period in this country, are held there during the summer vacation, each attended by about seventy-five men, varying in class and condition, but all alike eager to lay a solid foundation of what we may call the sociology of the Gospel.

We cannot urge too strongly these retreats upon all anxious for their own salvation, first of all, and then for the salvation of society, the true order of Christian charity. Any one who wishes to make them has only to inquire at the nearest Jesuit college or residence to receive the fullest information concerning them.

Catholic Week in "Golden" Mainz

The glowing accounts of the magnificent display of Catholic loyalty at the fifty-eighth General Congress of the Catholics of Germany are full of inspiration for us all. The Congress was held to honor in a special way the memory of Bishop Ketteler, on the occasion of the hundredth anniversary of his birth, which falls upon the Christmas of this year. His own episcopal city was therefore fittingly chosen as the place of meeting. It was at Mainz, "Aurea Moguntia," that the first General Congress had been held in 1848, and it is now the fifth time that the ancient historic city, once the metropolitan see of St. Boniface, has been thus distinguished.

On August 6 the convention opened and continued for five days. Hardly a house was left undecorated. Banners and streamers waved from all the public buildings, and the street, from the landing place of the guests to the great assembly hall; was one sea of colors where garlands of evergreen swung from flagstaff to flagstaff along the entire length of the way, a veritable "via triumphalis."

Two hundred and twenty special trains brought in the guests for the opening day, and all the water craft on the river were engaged. Nine hundred societies, with fifty thousand representatives, took part in the festivities and deliberations which were held in the various halls of the city. No Catholic interest was left unsupported by organized effort. But what was most encouraging was the number of sturdy young men who constituted by far the greater part of the convention.

In a most enthusiastic tribute from the Holy City, the Avvenire d'Italia says: "We have not forgotten the motto: Germania docet, and while the powers of Catholicism are gathering at Mainz, we express the wish that the victory over a common foe may be for us the bond of a perfect unity, binding together all who are proud to be known as Catholics and who dare to make profession of their faith."

Here, indeed, by those nine hundred societies marshalled together in the field, was a glorious lesson taught to the Catholics of the world. Here were to be seen the unions of Catholic mechanics, of apprentices, of railroad employees, and of laborers of every kind, of officers and of marines. Here were the societies for the press and for the platform, the many and various academic and students' associations, the "Pax" and the "Unio Apostolica" and the other societies for priests. Here, too, the Catholic charities were nobly represented in the Peter Claver Sodality for the African missions, the Vincent de Paul and Holy Land societies, the various women's, young ladies' and students' mission associations, and the Catholic Union for the Protection of Girls. Here, likewise, was the society of women and girl employees who are engaged in the various trades, and who now are preparing to guard their interests and to protect themselves and their less fortunate sisters from the dangers to which they are often most terribly exposed. The music and good fellowship clubs were not forgotten, and the Sodalities of the Blessed Virgin were present to promote the important work for which they have been founded.

At times German organizations are far from perfection, nor do they always receive the support which they deserve. German leaders will be the first to acknowledge this. Yet where is there shown such a spirit and such a genius for organization, the first condition for success in social work?

"Germania docet"—Germany teaches the world. As, with "Golden" Mainz for our vantage point, we look out over the past to see how she has accomplished this mission, for evil or for good, a striking picture unrolls itself before our eyes, which we here would strive to put into words. It is suggested by a scene familiar to our contemplation. In the centre is the Christ in His glorified Humanity. On the left, with rage and hatred stamped upon their features, are the world's worst famous teachers of Rationalism, Socialism, Monism, Higher Criticism and all the other forms of doctrine which the denial of Christianity has assumed in modern times. Truly Titanic figures and inspired with the grim determination to pluck the memory of God from out the heart of man. But to the right of that same Saviour, "set for the fall and the resurrection of many," there stands forth a glorious group no less eager in the protestation of their loyalty than the others are in their hatred, men who were giants in the cause of God, heroes such as Ketteler, Windhorst and the Centre leaders. These are the guides whom we may safely follow, as Leo XIII himself acknowledged that he had done. May we learn from them the lesson.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The second National Catholic Congress in England opened at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, on Friday, August 4. The Congress throughout consisted of elaborate church services, great public meetings, sermons and speeches from prominent ecclesiastics and the foremost lay leaders of Catholic thought in Great Britain to-day. An enthusiastic audience of 6,000 persons greeted his Grace, Archbishop Bourne, of Westminster, who delivered the inaugural address on Catholicism at Home and Abroad. There were present at the Congress their Lordships, the Bishops of Newport, Birmingham, Middlesbrough, Liverpool, Nottingham, Salford, Southwark, Portsmouth, Leeds, Northampton, Shrewsbury, Plymouth, Aberdeen, Galloway, Sebastopolis, his Grace, the Duke of Norfolk, K. G., the Mayor of Gateshead; Sir John Knill, Bart., K. C. S. G., Sir Hubert Jemingham, K. C. M. G., and many other distinguished members of the clergy and laity. The civic welcome to the Congress was given by the Lord Mayor of Newcastle. At the various combined and sectional meetings the speakers on special subjects included the Lord Bishop of Salford, the Right Rev. Mgr. Parkinson, Mr. Hilaire Belloc, Rev. P. Cavois, S.J., Miss Margaret Fletcher, Rev. Father Bannin, Lady Winifrede Elwes, Mrs. V. M. Crawford, Mr. James Britten, Rev. Father E. Bans, Mr. B. W. Devas, and other prominent social workers. The subjects discussed at the Congress were all of great importance, such as Catholic Cooperation, the fight against Rationalism, Temperance, Catholics and Poor Law Reform, Catholic Attitude to State Insurance, the Board of Education and Secondary Schools, What Catholic Women are Doing in Germany and France, Socialism, and the Work of the St. Vincent de Paul Society. There were but two resolutions passed at the Congress, the first pledging its unalterable allegiance to the Holy See, and tendering the expression of its filial love and ardent devotion to His Holiness; the second strongly protesting against the regulations of the Board of Education, inasmuch as they interfere with the freedom of religious instruction in existing Catholic secondary schools, and prevent the establishment of new Catholic secondary schools.

Archbishop Bourne and the Duke of Norfolk were the guests of the Lord Mayor of Newcastle, Sir W. H. Stephenson, during the Congress proceedings. The Lord Mayor, by the way, is a staunch Wesleyan Methodist, and a prominent local preacher.

There is a movement now on foot in European countries—and the hope is that the interest in it will extend throughout America—to build a church in honor of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, wife of a Landgraf of Thuringia. This year being the seven hundredth anniversary of St. Elizabeth's death, it is thought to be an appropriate time to do something to commemorate the Saint. In a letter to her royal Highness, the Duchess of Parma, the Holy Father has expressed most hearty approval of the plan, and, while making his own personal offering for the cause, bestows his apostolic blessing on all those who aid in it.

The church is to be built at Marburg, North Germany, where the Saint lived during her widowhood, and also where she died. A church erected there in the early ages is now in the hands of Protestants, while the Catholic inhabitants of the place, all poor people, have no house of worship at all. The ground, formerly belonging to the estate of the Landgravin Elizabeth, has been already purchased, and the plans for a beautiful church are ready, but the funds are lacking. The Pope invited the Catholics, not alone of Germany and Austria, but throughout the world, to join in this movement. This may be done either by voluntary contributions or by buying penny stamps, after the manner of the Red Cross stamps, which have been so fruitful in America in bringing in large sums for the warfare against the White Plague. The stamps are of artistic design and in several colors, and each with a picture of the Saint.

The circular gives the names of distinguished patronesses in France, Belgium, Italy, Portugal, Spain and England. In the latter country the august patronesses are the Duchess of Norfolk and Lady Edmund Talbot.

Miss O'Sullivan and Miss Gadsby, of London, attended the National Catholic Congress of Newcastle as representatives of the Catholic Woman's Suffrage Society. They devoted themselves to propaganda and distributed leaflets, explaining the object and methods of the Society, at all the Congress meetings.

Considerable interest was aroused in Germany by the conversion of the pastor of the Old-Catholic parish of Graz, Karl Gross, who has since published his experiences in a brochure entitled "One Year an Old-Catholic." When he had newly taken charge of his parish he noticed that several children were absent from his second catechetical instruction. The reason was, as he found to his surprise, that he had made a passing mention of hell. The children resented this and showed their displeasure by staying away, since their former pastor had assured them that there was no such place. One of the boys threatened that he would never come again if this offence should be repeated. Thus put on his good behavior, Gross soon aroused another storm when he strove to introduce the two hours of religion which the school laws require. The parents of the children candidly told him that if they had wanted more hours of religion there would have been no need of becoming Old-Catholics.

At the Notre Dame Convent, Baltimore, on August 15, two Sisters of Notre Dame celebrated their golden jubilee, the fiftieth anniversary of their entrance into the Sisterhood. On the same day thirteen others observed their silver anniversaries. That the Order is flourishing in the United States is shown by the admission of forty-three candidates, who took the white veil on the Feast of St. Lawrence, August 10.

The first permanent mission to be established in the Shetland Isles since the Reformation has been started at Lerwick, writes the Edinburgh correspondent of the London Universe. A substantial church has been built, which was recently blessed by his Lordship the Bishop of Aberdeen. Hitherto a barn or a hall has been used as a temporary chapel, and Catholics are happy that "Ultima Thule" again possesses a Catholic church.

Several charitable bequests were made in the will of Joseph J. Almirall, an importer, which was filed in the Surrogate's office, Brooklyn, on August 15. The institutions which benefit are St. Mary's Hospital, $2,500; St. Peter's Hospital, $2,000; the New York Foundling Asylum, $3,000; the Little Sisters of the Poor, $3,000; St. Mary's Female Hospital, $1,500; St. Catherine's Hospital, $1,500; the St. Vincent de Paul Society of the Nativity parish, $500, and the St. Vincent's Home, $5,000.

SCIENCE

STAR STREAMS.

Dr. Halm, of the Cape of Good Hope, as we read in The Observatory for July, troscope, and found certain peculiarities in them of a rather remarkable kind, which could be accounted for on the hypothesis of two star streams, thus furnishing valuable confirmatory evidence of the results derived from the transverse motions. One of the most surprising results that has been recognized recently is that stars of an early type of spectrum are moving very much slower than those of later types of spectra.

"Now that seems to point almost irresistibly to the conclusion that a star's peculiar motion tends to increase with its age, that they start having practically no motion, and that in some way or another they gradually accumulate velocity: because we suppose all stars to progress through cular motion tends to increase with its age, that they start having practically no motion, and that in some way or another they gradually accumulate velocity: because we suppose all stars to progress through the stages represented by successive spectral types. But Halm has another suggestion. He thinks that Orion stars are moving slowly, not because they are young, but because they are heavy . . . so that the generally accepted order of stellar evolution is also the order of weight."

Dr. Halm "seems also to make out a case for the introduction of a third stream, and shows that it does effect such improvement in the results as to justify the additional complication."

Sir David Gill said, in criticising Dr. Halm's paper, "that it looks almost as if, in the early stage of evolution, before stars are evolved, gravitation does not exist. Of course this is pure speculation and not yet to be taken seriously, but it would be one explanation of some curious facts about stellar motions."

THE PARALLAX OF STARS.

In his seventh and concluding paper on "Photographic Determinations of Stellar Parallax with the Yerkes Reflector," in the July number of The Astrophysical Journal, Frank Schlesinger says that the average probable error of one of his parallax determinations is 13 thousandths of a second of arc. This error is like missing a target by an inch at a range of 250 miles! The whole work is done so carefully that "the measurement of the plates in duplicate adds only 10 per cent, to their weights" or trustworthiness. The fainter the star, the more accurate are the measurements, but when the light of a bright star is artificially diminished, its position can be found with the same degree of accuracy as that of a faint star.

OBITUARY

On August 5 died the Cardinal Prince Bishop of Vienna, Dr. Anton Gruscha, the oldest member in age of the College of Cardinals, in his ninety-first year. Austria loses in him one of her most remarkable men, who for half a century has been a most conspicuous figure in matters of state as well as in his ecclesiastical position. Although his whole life was devoted to promoting the prosperity and increasing the influence of the Church, yet he never forgot to answer those still wider demands which his country had a right to make on him. Prudently, however, he remained aloof from political life when the interests of the Church were not directly or indirectly concerned. His name will long remain in veneration as an Austrian patriot and a great prince of the Church. Dr. Nagl, who had been Coadjutor cum jure successionis, will occupy the high position left vacant by the illustrious prelate.

To the very last the great Cardinal had continued his connection with the working men's associations, for whose cause he had been won fifty years before by the famous organizer, Adolf Kolping. It was in 1852 that Dr. Gruscha founded the Vienna Gesselenverein, which, owing mainly to his persevering energy and self-sacrifice, has since grown into a vast institution. His secret of success consisted in his ability to interest the widest circles in his undertaking, reaching with his influence as high as the court itself. When in 1890 he was presented by Emperor Franz Joseph for the Archbishopric of Vienna, he made the condition that he should not be forced to relinquish his presidency of the social organization which he had founded.

The Rev. Bernard Dornhege, rector for thirty-nine years of St. Elizabeth's Church, Philadelphia, died in that city on August 14. Father Dornhege organized St. Elizabeth's parish in 1872, at the request of Archbishop Wood. The section at the time was sparsely settled and consisted chiefly of open lots, numerous ponds and abandoned clay pits. The lot for the church building was given to Archbishop Wood, after Protestant denominations had declined the offer, by Joseph Singerly, who wished to stimulate the settlement and improvement of the desolate district. Father Dornhege entered upon his duties with enthusiasm. When the little chapel was opened, on Christmas Day, 1872, six persons were present. In two years the young priest's energy and enthusiasm had gathered a small congregation, and a school was built, which was taken in charge by the Sisters of St. Francis. Five years later he built the rectory, and in 1883 began the erection of one of the most beautiful churches in the city. The parish school has an attendance of fourteen hundred pupils, who are taught by four Christian Brothers and twenty-two Sisters of St. Francis. The church property to-day represents an outlay of over $500,000. Father Dornhege was born in Westphalia, Germany, sixty-seven years ago, and was ordained to the priesthood by Archbishop Wood, on April 5, 1869.

Of his character and work, the Standard and Times says:

"Father Dornhege, by his piety, his indefatigable zeal and his remarkable resourcefulness, had won not only the love of every member of his large flock, but also the high esteem of the community as a whole. After thirty-nine years of toil, he leaves as a monument, apart from the spiritual fruits of his devoted ministry, not only the magnificent parish property at Twenty-third and Berks streets, but also, in a sense, the material prosperity of that entire section of the city, of which he was a herald and unwearying promoter."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

OFFENSIVE BILL-BOARD ADVERTISING.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of the 5th inst. appears a protest respecting an offensive advertisement of Coates & Co. now appearing on the bill-boards of New York City. You may be interested in knowing that, prior to that date, the Catholic Truth Society of Canada had taken steps to have this advertisement withdrawn from Canadian papers by writing Coates & Co. direct. It is hoped the protest may result in the objectionable advertisement being at once withdrawn.

Yours truly,

J. P. HYNES.

FOGAZZARO AND HIS NOVELS.

In the review "Fogazzaro and His Novels," in your issue of August 5th, occurs the following passage: "The question arises how, if he was a devout Catholic, Fogazzaro could publish 'The Saint' and 'Leila,' not to speak of his other books? The explanation is found in the fact that he was educated by an uncle who was a hardened Rosminian . . ." (italics mine). These words are a gratuitous insult to an honorable body of religious, known as "Rosminians," "Institute of Charity" or "Fathers of Charity," who are doing good work for souls in parishes and educational institutions in Italy, England, Ireland and the United States. The bishops in whose dioceses they are working have nothing but praise for their zeal and good work for souls. But your reviewer, with his superior knowledge, would have us believe that a "hardened Rosminian" is capable of any iniquity. If he really had, as he surely has not, an intimate acquaintance with Rosmini, his life and works, he would put aside his sneers and unjust accusations, and join, perhaps, with that holy man's disciples and admirers in praying that God would hasten the day when Holy Church in her wisdom shall see fit to raise Antonio Rosmini to the honors of the altar. Meanwhile he owes your readers an apology for his ill-considered, unjust, untrue, unkind, offensive and uncalled for jibe. Unfortunately an apology, however sincere, often fails to undo the harm it is meant to cover.

PHILIP I. BARRON.

Barry, Minn., August 10.

[The expression objected to is merely a quotation from the estimate by the Etudes of Fogazzaro, and refers not to the devoted members of the Institute which Rosmini founded, but to an individual who adhered to the forty propositions of Rosmini, which were condemned by the Holy See, December 14, 1887.—ED. AMERICA.]

CHRONICLE

Veto of the Cotton Bill.—The adjournment of Congress was delayed for a day to receive the expected veto of the cotton bill. In his message refusing to sign the bill the President objected especially to the attempt by Congress to add a revision of the iron and steel and chemical schedules to the cotton bill as amendments. He said: "I find that there was practically no consideration of either schedule by any committee of either house. There were no facts presented to either house in which I can find material upon which to form any judgment as to the effect of the amendments either upon American industries or upon the revenues of the government." Briefly reviewing the manner in which these amendments had been added to the original bill, the President said: "I cannot make myself a party to dealing with the interests of the country in this way. The industries covered by metals and the manufacture of metals are the largest in the country, and it would seem not only wise but absolutely essential to acquire accurate information as to the effect of changes which may vitally affect these industries before enacting them into law." Speaking of the cotton industry, the President said the capital invested in 1909 amounted to $821,000,000, the value of the product to $629,000,000, and the number of wage workers to 373,000, making, with dependents, a total of at least 1,200,000 persons affected, with annual wages of $146,000,000. The bill would not have gone into effect until January 1 next, and Mr. Taft said the Tariff Board would be ready with a report before that time. Investigation by the House Ways and Means Committee,

Mr. Taft said, was purely for the purpose of preparing a bill on a tariff for revenue basis. "Pledged," he added, "to support a policy of moderate protection, I cannot approve a measure which violates its principles."

Speaker Clark's Boast.—In a special statement, following the adjournment of Congress, House Speaker Champ Clark, for the Democrats, thus answered the query: "What do you think of the extra session?" "We have made a record that has surprised our friends and dumbfounded our enemies. Sneered at for years as a party of mere negation and as being utterly lacking in ability for constructive statesmanship, we passed through the House more constructive legislation and better than has passed through any House in the same length of time in twenty years. We redeemed every promise made in order to carry the elections in 1910. It is a record of which we may well be proud and on which we will sweep the country in 1912."

Press Comment on the Special Session.—The tone of the press generally, in its review of the work done by Congress in the special session which closed on August 22, is one of satisfaction over what has been accomplished. Even strong Republican journals appear to agree that the special session has done more and better work than many thought it would last April, and since it has been so fruitful in good results there is little disposition to harp on sins of omission. The important effective work achieved may be thus summed up: The reciprocity agreement with Canada, to consider which Congress was convened, has been ratified. A new campaign publicity law which should be productive of good has been enacted. The terms on which Arizona and New Mexico can enter the Union have been prescribed. The membership of the next House of Representatives has been determined, and provision was made for an enlarged house based upon the last census. The ineffective work of the session concerned the tariff. A Democratic house, the first since 1895, seized upon this session as a vehicle to convey to the country the views of the Democracy on the subject of tariff revision, but executive disapproval rendered futile all efforts to impress these views on the statute books. In the Senate there was noted a straining of hitherto cordial relations between the Foreign Relations Committee and the State Department. General arbitration treaties with Great Britain and France were sent to the Senate by the President, but they received a frigid welcome, because the upper house contended that one provision of the treaties usurped its constitutional prerogatives. As a result the President has made it plain that an issue has been raised which he will carry to the country, in the hope of procuring ratification when Congress reconvenes.

Congressman Underwood and Revision.—Addressing the National Italian Democratic League in New York, shortly after the adjournment of Congress, Chairman Underwood, of the House Ways and Means Committee, had this to say regarding the future revision of the tariff: "I pledge you that if you return to power at the next election a Democratic administration, you will have one that will keep every tariff pledge to the people, and yet do so in a conservative way, without injury to the great business of the country. . . . If the President is willing to give honest, fair, and just relief to the people the Democratic Congress is willing to uphold his hands, as it did in the instance of the reciprocity pact. But if we are to be told to pass restrictive, prohibitive tariff bills, that are only makeshifts and not a revision downward, we will carry the question to the people, and confidently await the verdict they will give at the next election."

Mexico.—The convention of the National Catholic party in the city of Meico was the most imposing demonstration of practical religious feeling that the present generation has seen. For the past fifty years, the terms "politics" and "Catholics" have not been associated; for the political parties that have prevailed in the country have been uniformly against the Church, even if at variance among themselves. Hardly had Diaz abdicated when the first steps were taken to bring together the Catholics who had been for so long shut out from the administration of affairs by the absolutism which had been introduced by Juárez and perfected by Diaz. The delegates, numbering some five hundred and representing all parts of the republic, assisted at solemn pontifical Mass on the morning of August 16, at which Archbishop Mora y del Rio officiated. About three thousand persons received the Holy Communion from the prelate and two canons of the cathedral who assisted him. The sessions of the convention were held in the Teatro Mexicano, seats being reserved for the delegates while the galleries were thrown open to the public. The secretary announced that three hundred and sixty-one local headquarters had been established and that others were forming. Michoacan, Jalisco and Puebla were the States where the work had taken the best hold. Considering that the party had been in existence for only a few months and that the work of organizing for political purposes was new to almost every member, thanks to the system that had so long prevailed in the country, it was decided to support Francisco I. Madero at the polls, for his administration promised to be the best for the party, even though he was not an ideal candidate. President de la Barra was to be supported for the office of vice-president.—General Reyes has given notice that he will make a tour of the country and deliver speeches in favor of a program that he has announced. The newspapers are now speaking of the dangers of militarism, and of the likelihood that if Reyes is elected he will re-establish the autocratic rule of Diaz.—The last important band of insurgents under Zapata have surrendered at discretion; but some small squads of Socialists are still under arms.—Much to the disgust of sundry visitors, Governor González of Chihuahua placed Ciudad Juárez under martial law and closed the gambling dens. Besides the apparatus, 25,000 pesos in specie were seized. Similar energetic steps have been taken in the Federal District.—As a help towards a free and fair election, the students of the secondary schools have offered to teach the unlettered voters how to handle the ballots.—Madero has publicly charged Reyes with trying to tamper with Maderist sympathizers and with officers of the regular army, and declares that, through disloyalty and personal ambition, the general is ready to precipitate a bloody war.

Canada.—A week or so of warm weather helped the western crops considerably. It ended, however, in severe hail storms, which did no little damage, and was succeeded by frosts. These, it is said, were so light and the crop was so far advanced, that little harm came from them beyond a further checking of ripening. But this in itself is sufficiently serious.—The complaints of the British Columbian fishermen regarding the American methods of taking the Sockeye salmon have been redoubled this year. The Americans have added purse sieves to traps, and have been using them at sea outside the Straits of Fuca. The consequence is that only a small fraction of the fish reach the Fraser River, although nearly all have come from the Canadian hatcheries there. The Governor of the State of Washington has appointed a committee to confer with the British Columbian authorities on the matter, but whether his object is to do away with the British Columbian grievance, or to check an appeal to Ottawa and Washington, remains to be seen. President Jordan, of Stanford University, who seems to possess the confidence of President Taft, is strongly in favor of imposing effectual restrictions on the American fishermen.—A representative of some California flour mills has been visiting Vancouver telling how it is the intention to import large quantities of wheat through that port in a special line of steamers, to be established for that purpose, if Reciprocity is sustained.—One of the Conservative candidates in Alberta says that, as he finds his constituency virtually unanimous on the subject, he will vote, if elected, for Reciprocity.

Great Britain.—Though the strikes are over officially, the temper of the working people is very restless, and new difficulties arise almost every day. The status of men employed or promoted to supply the strikers places is one of these. Employers naturally object to discharge or reduce men who stood by them, while strikers demand this as a sine qua non of settlement. In Liverpool the Tramways took the employers' view. The Government, which has taken the men's side throughout, sent Mr. Askwith, of the Board of Trade, to talk the matter over. The Tramway committee have promised to reinstate 250 men as soon as possible, and also to interpret the latter clause in a sympathetic way. Altogether, the men are triumphing.—The attacks of strikers on Jews in Wales is said to be merely an effect of the readiness to hit out, which striking promotes. It has been remarked, however, that among the North of England miners ill-feeling towards Jews has been growing for some time, the causes assigned being the usual commercial ones, and that the same causes are to be found in Wales.—Mr. Keir Hardy attacked the Government in Parliament for having employed troops during the strikes. His character as a stirrer up of strife was shown very clearly, and he gained nothing by his attack.—During the strike in London, a Pickford van, carrying a large box covered with canvas, was stopped by the mob, which threatened to destroy both. The police drew up the canvas, and the mob drew back at the sight of a large lion, which began to roar loudly. It was allowed to pass on its way from the docks to the Zoological Gardens.—Parliament has adjourned. There is to be an autumn session, and in the meantime orators, Unionist and Liberal, are going to stump the country on Home Rule. A Scotch committee is devising a scheme for Scottish Home Rule which, by retaining the Scottish members in Parliament, will be a step towards Federal Home Rule.—The Australian Federal Cabinet has congratulated Mr. Asquith on the passage of the Parliament Bill. Unionists denounce this as an intrusion, asking what would be the effect in Australia of congratulations coming from the Home Government on the defeat of the Referendum?

Ireland.—The United Irish League has received from Mr. William A. Redmond, leader of the parliamentary delegation now touring Australia, a check for £10,000 as the first instalment of the subscription he is collecting in that land for the Home Rule cause. Mr. Redmond estimates that £5,000 more will be forwarded before the deputation returns to Ireland. New Zealand has been visited, likewise Victoria, New South Wales, and most of the more populous sections of the great commonwealth. Recent political developments have altered the plans of the delegates considerably, the imminent campaign facing the Home Rule League having hastened their recall to the scene of action by the party leaders at home. Therefore, instead of waiting over till the winter as they had expected to do, they will most likely close their Australian campaign for funds in the autumn.—The next few months will see the most strenuous political campaigning since the days of the Anti-Corn Law agitation. The two great political parties are preparing for the momentous and far-reaching fight on Home Rule. Mr. Birrell, speaking at the National Liberal Club in mid-August, called explicitly upon the Liberal Party to support the Government next session to carry Home Rule. The position of that question, he affirmed, had completely altered since it was first introduced. It required the united efforts of the party to pass the projected Government bill, but he had no doubt that the great work of next session would be accomplished. The Liberals appear to be entirely sincere in their pledge to settle the question forever. They are bringing into existence an organization under the Government Chief Whip, which, it is claimed, will constitute the most powerful and effective body ever introduced into political strife. On the other hand, the Unionists have two great fighting bodies in the Unionist Association of Ireland and the Union Defence League, both of which will, of course, concentrate against Home Rule.

France.—The latest advices on the Morocco question inform us that instructions have been given to Cambon, the French Ambassador at Berlin, to demand that Germany should recognize a French protectorate in Morocco, subject to the approval of the Powers that signed the Algeciras treaty, and in return to grant to Germany special commercial advantages in Morocco, as well as to offer moderate compensations in the Congo. The part of the agreement which relates to the Congo is not, however, yet clear, and on that point there may be a clash. The extent of French commercial interests in Morocco may be estimated from the fact that last year the export and import trade exceeded $200,000,000.

Germany.—On September 2 is to take place at Potsdam, in the presence of the emperor, the solemn presentation of the Steuben memorial. It was the desire of the American government that a suitable inscription might be composed. This task the Prussian Ministry of War has gladly taken upon itself. The following is to be the wording: "Dedicated to the German Emperor and the German Nation by the Congress of the United States as the token of an unbroken friendship. A replica of the memorial erected at Washington to Frederick William von Steuben, born at Magdeburg 1730, died in the State of New York 1794—in grateful acknowledgment of his services in the American Revolution."

—In contrast with the hostile attitude of England in the Morocco complications is the friendly agreement arrived at between Russia and Germany at the present critical juncture, in spite of the wish of France that Russia should refrain from any such concurrence. Italy likewise seems inclined to manifest a friendly leaning towards German interests. Meanwhile warlike precautions are quietly being taken by France, while Germany is already prepared for any event and looking forward confidently towards the outcome. Neither nation, however, seriously expects the outbreak of a war. Although the maximum terms which France is willing to offer to Germany have now been proposed, it is possible that there may still be a long series of negotiations and of military manoeuvrings for the sake of mutual intimidation before any settlement can be reached.

Austria-Hungary.—The lamentable divisions in the Bohemian Catholic camp have now been emphasized by the formation of a new Catholic national party of conservatives. In their program they profess to defend their civil rights and to oppose the division of Bohemia, while they would unite all the conservative elements into one party, including both nobles and people. It is too early to pronounce any definite judgment upon the effects which will be produced by these developments, although we may well regret the existence of conditions which have led to a rupture of that solidarity which was the strength of the Catholic national party. It is announced, however, that they do not mean to hamper in the least the free expansion of the Christian Social organization or to manifest towards it any political hostility. There is a need of unity above all things in the Catholic camp if the enemy is not to capture the political position.—On August 18 Vienna celebrated amid national rejoicings the eighty-first birthday of her Emperor Franz Joseph, who, despite his advanced age, has retained his bodily vigor to a remarkable degree. What created most comment upon the occasion was the formal congratulation received from the Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Marquis di San Giuliano, an action which is without precedent in the Quirinal cabinet. It not merely indicates the desire of Italy to stand in close relation to Austria, but likewise a change of front in its attitude towards Germany.

Portugal.—Some ladies bent on securing at least partial suffrage are urging with little prospect of immediate success that the franchise be extended to all women holding a diploma, to heads of families, and to women in business; they further insist that the sex be represented in Parliament.—Senhor Homen Christo, summing up the evils of Portugal, states first that the land is largely in the possession of rich proprietors who have very extensive holdings which they rent out. The renters are intent on gaining a bare livelihood and paying the rent to the absentee landlord. Hence, cultivation of the land is neglected, and the farmers are too ignorant to learn better methods, for they are, as a rule, illiterate. Only one-third of the arable land is worked. Not enough wheat is raised for home consumption. The olive flourishes in all parts of the country, yet oil of the first quality has to be imported, for the people do not know how to extract it. The mineral wealth of the country is very considerable, but the mines are owned by foreigners who take the ore abroad for reduction. The general poverty of the people explains why there is little business, why there are few manufactures, why the means of communication, such as roads and canals, are so scanty. The imports of the country are about twice the value of the exports. Even the coast fisheries are undeveloped. He draws attention to these facts as a reminder to the present Government that the country is in greater need of economic legislation than of fancy laws and arbitrary decrees.—The advance of Germany upon the African colony of Angola has brought from Lisbon the declaration that the territory affected is "international" rather than Portuguese. The people are offended, for they have entertained dreams of a Portuguese Africa of imperial extent.—It has been publicly stated that the Provisional Government is spending $180,000 a month on spies.—The Constituent Assembly has elected Manoel Arriaga first President of Portugal for a term of four years with no re-election. He is not identified with any faction of the Republican party, but his success is a defeat for the provisional administration. Antonio José Almeida, now Minister of the Interior, will probably head the permanent cabinet.

Spain.—In spite of the earlier declarations of Premier Canalejas to the effect that the mutiny aboard the Numancia had no political significance, the ministry find themselves forced to admit that a widespread conspiracy existed to seize the vessel and proceed to Barcelona, where others in the plot were to aid in proclaiming a republic. Only one person, a stoker named Antonio Sanchez Moya, was put to death. He was a native of Murcia, and was thirty-six years of age. He left a widow but no children. Six other conspirators were condemned to life imprisonment. They were young men in their twenties. The crew of the Numancia numbered 350 men, of whom it is believed that between eighty and a hundred were more or less connected with the plot. It was Sanchez Moya that broke open the store-room and supplied the arms. The loud whispers of the plotters as they were laying their plans at a very early hour in the morning led to their discovery by an ensign.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Federation Convention

Columbus, Ohio, was very enthusiastic over the Tenth National Convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies. The city never saw a costlier pageant, so the papers say, than the splendid parade which men and women of every condition and creed gazed at with delight as it passed before them on Sunday afternoon, August 20. As late as Tuesday illustrations of the various scenes in the great event continued to appear in the daily papers. Nothing like it had ever been seen in Columbus. The weather could not have been more propitious, nor the sky brighter, and men and women and children were happy as they waited for hours on the sidewalks to see that unusual demonstration. The arches of electric lights which span the principal streets of the city were fluttering with flags; many of the great stores along the line of march displayed the papal colors, and to the delight of everyone the rich musical chimes of the Episcopal church filled the sky above with melody as three thousand plumed and belted knights, with brilliant uniforms and glittering swords, kept step to martial music in unbroken alignment like well trained soldiers, as did the three or four thousand other men of various associations who preceded or followed. A grand stand had been erected on the Capitol grounds, where the Governor and the Mayor and the Apostolic Delegate, the archbishop and bishops and monsignori, and other dignitaries, lay and clerical, were waiting to review them. Cheer after cheer greeted the marching hosts, and everybody rejoiced to see so many valiant men who had gathered there solely for the purpose of proclaiming, with more than ordinary impressiveness, their allegiance to the fundamental truths of religion and morality. There was no religious bigotry in Columbus that day, if indeed there ever is, and the greeting from men and women of all creeds was so cordial and so universal that the papers announced with evident satisfaction that the Capital of Ohio had handed over the keys of the city to the Catholics.

Some of the reporters who had succeeded in entering the Cathedral that morning had probably never been present at a Pontifical Mass before, and all the resources of their rhetoric were called into requisition to describe the splendor of the ceremonies, the flashing and ever changing iridescences of the robes and vestments, the lights and flowers and incense, the searching and almost spiritual gleams of sunlight piercing the illuminated windows and penetrating the mysterious half-gloom of the sanctuary, in which were witnessed the solemn, and for some of the onlookers, the unintelligible ceremonies of the majestic liturgy. All these things were told and retold in a variety of ways by the reporters, but the conclusions that were drawn were full of the deepest respect and reverence for what they saw.

Not only with the ritual in the church, but also with the discourses at the mass-meeting in Memorial Hall, and at the business sessions in the beautiful club-house of the Knights of Columbus, was this same satisfaction evinced and the same approval accorded. Indeed, the whole series of events was comforting to the public at large, and the editors of the various papers did not hesitate to say so. It was like a revelation to many to see laymen of all kinds, judges, lawyers, physicians and business men, some beginning life, others well on in years, all proclaiming on the public platform their belief in the Personality of God, the Incarnation, the Immortality of the Soul, Man's responsibility to his Creator, and appealing to their fellow-men, Catholics and Protestants alike, to stand shoulder to shoulder with them in the fight against Divorce, Irreligious Education, Anarchy and the like. "There was nothing," wrote a Protestant minister to the press, "which every Protestant, and even men without any creed, could not heartily indorse."

The first business meeting was held on Monday morning, and the official reports showed that the association has not been idle. Successful action had been taken against irreligious and immoral plays, the white-slave traffic, violations of Sunday observance, indecent posters, false reports in the press, and many other things besides. The committees were then formed and the hard work began in the various rooms of the club-house, which were given over to the delegates to prepare for the ensuing campaign.

The great predominance of women delegates at the meetings was one of the most striking features in this convention. Whether it is because of a more universal movement of womankind in all sociological and educational questions, or whether this increased attendance at Columbus was due to a greater energy and enthusiasm in these matters among western women than among their sisters of the east, we are unable to say. Of course, their concurrence is not only valuable but indispensable, and it is a question if they have yet field enough for the exercise of their splendid powers.

The work of the convention was brought to a close on Wednesday afternoon and was followed by what has hitherto been unknown at these gatherings—a banquet at which 1,200 covers were laid. On Thursday most of the delegates had disappeared from Columbus, but they left behind them a deep impression of the widespread and lasting influence which these earnest men and women, who come from every part of the Union, from California and Texas and Louisiana, as well as from Massachusetts, New York and Pennsylvania, not to speak of the great Middle West, must exert in strengthening the foundations of law, order and religion in the entire country.

STAFF CORRESPONDENT.

Daily Communion for Children?

The question is asked by a reader, "whether or not it was the intention of the Pope in his new rule in reference to children of seven years or over receiving the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist, that children of seven years or over should receive this sacrament as frequently as possible, or that they should receive it only at stated intervals, to be decided by their pastors?"

The difficulty here proposed is most probably still perplexing many minds. Fortunately, however, the teaching of the Holy Father and of the Church on this point is most clear and unequivocal. Children from the time of their first Communion are not merely to be permitted, but to be urged to receive Our Divine Lord with the utmost frequency, and if possible, daily. In the instruction approved by the Holy Father for the members of the Priests' Eucharistic League he tells them: "They will take special care that during the period of preparation for first Communion, they excite a lively desire of daily Communion in the innocent hearts of children, which are free from vain fears; let them see that they make their Communion as soon as possible, and repeat the act, if possible, every day." (July 27, 1906.)

The final answer, however, is contained in the decree "Quam Singulari," on early first Communion: "Those who have charge of children must take the utmost care that after their First Communion the said children should approach the Holy Table very often, and if possible, even daily, as Jesus Christ and our Holy Mother Church desire it." (Art. VI.)

The age at which they are to receive the Blessed Sacrament is not merely "seven years and over," but seven years and under as well, since many children have in their sixth year discretion sufficient to distinguish the Body of the Lord from common bread and to understand, according their capacity, "the mysteries of the faith necessary as the means of salvation." The age, therefore, may be "the seventh year, or later, or even sooner." (Art. I.) The devotion required is merely such "as their age allows." (Art. III.)

The "stated intervals," spoken of in the letter, "to be decided by their pastors," can refer merely to occasional general Communions of the children which the parish priest is to have for the sake of pomp and solemnity and to afford an opportunity for special instruction. "Once or several times in the year let parish priests take care to announce and hold a general Communion of children, etc." (Art. V.) For the rest it is clearly decided that no ecclesiastic can forbid Holy Communion to anyone, even for a single occasion, when the necessary conditions are not wanting, namely, the state of grace and the right intention. When these are present then the permission has already been granted by the Church. This holds true of children, as well as of adults. The confessor's advice is merely meant to determine the presence or absence of these essential conditions and provide an opportunity of greater merit for the penitent.

"That the practice of frequent and daily Communion may be carried out with greater prudence and more abundant merit, the confessor's advice should be asked. Confessors, however, are to be careful not to dissuade anyone from frequent and daily Communion, provided that he is in a state of grace and approaches with a right intention." (Decree on Daily Communion, Art. V.) The words, as is evident, are applicable equally to children and adults.

Sixteenth Century Education in Mexico

I—THE FRANCISCANS.

To the pens of Prescott, Solis and many other distinguished authors we owe much of our information regarding that most interesting period of Latin-American history known as the Conquest of Mexico. In the works of these authors we find glowing accounts of the high state of civilization which the Aztecs had reached at the time of the Conquest, of the audacity of Cortes and his followers, of the heroism of Cuauhtémoc, last of the Aztec kings. But of the poor missionaries who spent their lives in the Christianization of the Indians, the men who, by their sweetness and charity caused the Indian nations to undergo an evolution more lasting and beneficent than that effected by the force of arms, the evolution of ideas and ideals, they tell us little or nothing. The work of these friars has been often attacked; but the knowledge of what they did for the cause of education in the wilderness of America at so early a time and under so trying and inauspicious circumstances is their best eulogy.

The City of Mexico was captured by Cortes on August 13, 1521, and two years later, on August 22, 1523, the first three Franciscan missionaries arrived in Veracruz, and immediately proceeded to Mexico, and thence to Texcoco, a small town outside the City of Mexico. This town was the site of the first college of Mexico, founded by the venerable Fray Pedro de Gante. The first three Franciscans were followed by twelve friars of the same order, who arrived in Mexico on May 13, 1524. A Chapter was immediately held, and the friars were distributed among the cities of Mexico, Tlaxcala, Texcoco and Huejocingo, there to build colleges and churches and to begin the work of education and conversion.

The first aim of the friars was to instruct the natives in the rudimentary truths of Christianity, for it was evident that it was in vain to destroy the pagan temples if belief in the ancient cult remained in the heart of the people. Naturally, then, the first instruction imparted to the natives was of a religious character. They were taught the Our Father, Hail Mary, the Apostles' Creed, and the Salve Regina in Latin. (Icazbalceta's Opúsculos Varios, Vol. I, page 172.) This strange system, forced upon the missionaries by their ignorance of the native tongues, was far from producing the desired results. It was, however, very soon substituted by Fray Jacobo Tastera, a Frenchman. The system of Fray Jacobo consisted in drawing the principal events of the life of Our Lord, and those more advanced in the native tongues explained the meaning of the mystic paintings. (Op. cit, Vol. I, page 173.) This was most successful. The Indians, accustomed as they were to the reading of hieroglyphics, soon became familiar with the meaning of the paintings of Fray Jacobo, and the system was so adaptable to their nature that it was in vogue late in the seventeenth century, when there were many friars who could speak the native languages.

The first instruction imparted to the Indians was, then, of a religious character; but the progress made by teachers and pupils was so rapid that, two years after the arrival of the Franciscans, there was back of their convent in Mexico a school "attended by over a thousand Indian boys, who combined instruction in the elementary and higher branches, the mechanical and the fine arts." (Prof. Bourne of Yale, quoted by Dr. Walsh. Also Icazbalceta's life of Fray Pedro de Gante.) This was the first college of its kind in the New World, the cradle of American civilization.

Bishop Zumárraga was not satisfied with the rudimentary education given to the Indians. Writing to the Emperor, he said that he wished that there should be in each bishopric a college where Indian boys might take at least a grammar course, and a large monastery wherein the Indian girls could be received. The bishop found the means to realize his noble ambition, and on January 6, 1536, the famous college of Santa Cruz de Tlaltelolco for Indians was inaugurated in the rear of the convent which the Franciscans had in that locality. Among the members of its faculty were such men as Fray Juan de Gaona, an alumnus of the University of Paris; Fray Juan Focher, a Frenchman by birth, who had received his doctorate from the same university; and Fray Bernardino de Sahagun, a distinguished historian, whom Dr. Walsh of Fordham University calls the "Father of American Anthropology." This college disappeared at the beginning of the nineteenth century. Its pupils, besides becoming prominent members of the Church and State, were a great help to the missionaries, who had in them faithful interpreters and intelligent amanuenses for the compilation of their works. (Icazbalceta's Opúsculos Varios, Vol. I, pages 180-182.)

The licentiousness of military life gave rise to a new race, that of the mestizos, or the children of Spaniards and Indians. It was necessary to protect this new social element, whose members, in the great majority the children of sin, wandered through the land without shelter and occupation. Obeying a royal order of 1553, the viceroy, Mendoza, founded the College of San Juan de Letran for the mestizos. Although this college was founded by the civil authority, it also was directed by Catholic missionaries. It was under the direction of three theologians chosen by the King of Spain, each one of whom acted as rector for the term of one year. The students of Letran were divided into two classes: those whose intellectual capacity was little or none were given a primary course and instructed in some mechanical trade, for which purpose they remained in the institution three years. From among the more intelligent six were selected each year, who, remaining in the institution for a period of seven years, went through the regular college course. (Icazbalceta's Opúsculos Varios, Vol. I, pages 189-191.)

There was a similar institution for girls, also founded by Mendoza. The date of the foundation is not stated, but it surely existed before 1554, for Cervantes Salazar refers to it in his Latin dialogues published in that year.

The Indian girls were also the object of the greatest solicitude on the part of the missionaries. In the beginning they were daily gathered into the courtyards of the Franciscan convents and there received religious instruction. Later, boarding schools were opened, a fact which shows that the idea of educational centres for women is not a very modern one. These schools were under the care of some Spanish ladies, and by far the most noted of them was the one founded by Bishop Zumárraga in Texcoco. In the year 1530 the Queen of Spain sent six devout women to serve as teachers, and Bishop Zumárraga brought six more from Spain in 1534. The Indians, however, accustomed to bring up their daughters in the greatest seclusion, did not willingly send them to a college situated in the heart of the city; and, as the professors were not religious, they soon resigned to become private teachers among the Spanish population. Although Bishop Zumárraga did all he could to support the institution, it was closed ten years after its foundation.

As time went on a new race, that of the criollos, or Spaniards born in America, appeared. The Spaniards were loath to send their children to the Indian schools, and to supply the lack of a college for the sons of the Spaniards we find a well-regulated body of private teachers (among whom was the learned Cervantes Salazar), supported by the King and the authorities of Mexico. This state of affairs did not last very long, for the opening of the houses of studies of the Augustinians and of the university (1553) solved the question satisfactorily.

We see, then, that thirty years after the Conquest Mexico had well-disciplined colleges, asylums where both the children of the mestizos and the Indians were cared for, and a number of Spanish gentlemen who attended to the education of the criollos. The work of education during this period was chiefly in the hands of the Franciscans, who, truly and justly, may be called the pioneers of civilization in Mexico.

BENJAMIN MOLINA CIREROL.

The Stage

When President Taft, a year or two ago, observed that a play he chanced to be attending was not fit to be seen, he promptly arose and left the theatre. The worthy head of this nation then taught the American people a lesson they should take to heart. For with the opening of a new dramatic season that threatens to be at least no better than the last as regards the morality of the plays offered the public, it is of high importance that Catholics should know what action they are bound to take in order to protect themselves and their countrymen against the influence of a licentious stage. The American Federation of Catholic Societies have already given us the cue. In the vigorous protest they recently made against the character of certain plays presented last season in our cities they declare:

"We deplore that plays have been produced which mock at sacred things and moral principles which the Christian holds in the highest respect. There are still theatres missing their high and noble aim and debauching the minds and hearts of theatregoers, and especially our young persons." Then after naming a dozen salacious productions, the remonstrance continues: "When such plays are praised and heralded as attractions we feel that producers and managers are menacing the public morality and the welfare of the nation, for these plays being based on abominable sexual perversity and setting up a standard of morality which is open licentiousness will gradually accustom the spectators first in thought, then in deed, to disregard and discard all Christian modesty, and will thus prove the grave of the nation." "We therefore demand of the theatrical producers and managers that vulgarity, indecency and immoral suggestiveness be entirely eliminated from all plays," and "we earnestly request all the members of our affiliated societies, not only to avoid such offensive performances, but to withdraw their patronage from any theatre which lends itself to offensive productions."

Copies of the remonstrance, of which the above words are a part, were sent to all the prominent theatre managers of the country, and by most were courteously acknowledged. Many even pledged themselves to see that hereafter no objectionable plays should be presented in their theatres. Two managers, however, who are among the chief offenders in the matter, called the protest an "unreasonable and insulting document."

Now, what should Catholics do who are ready to endorse this remonstrance and heed this warning? Let them first learn from trustworthy sources the character of the plays to be presented in the theatres of their cities. They will prudently regard with suspicion, for instance, anything that is advertized as a "great Broadway success," for it is ten to one that that means the play is not decent, as the huge theatrical trust, whose centre is Manhattan, has now so successfully corrupted the taste of the common run of New York theatre-goers that the vogue a play enjoys here is by no means a guarantee of its cleanness, but rather of its decidedly objectionable character. Nor should Catholics lend too ready an ear to wily managers or press agents who assure them that "everything that was found offensive in the New York production has been carefully eliminated," for it is the very plot of these plays, as a rule, that makes them unfit to be seen.

But suppose the coming of one of these salacious productions is actually announced, what is to be done? If there is any hope of their remonstrance being considered, let a committee of representative Catholics wait upon the manager of the local theatre and urge him in the name of public morality to cancel the engagement of the play in question. If this procedure is not at all feasible, let them write letters of protest to the papers of the town. Then every staunch Catholic, besides avoiding the objectionable play himself, should use all his influence to keep his friends and acquaintances from attending it. Perhaps the rows of empty seats that then meet the manager's eye on the night of the banned production's first presentation may make him feelingly realize that it does not pay to ignore utterly Catholic opinion, for an argument that touches the pocket is often the only one that these men heed.

Now that all Catholics who find themselves unwittingly attending an unclean play should get up at once, like President Taft, and go out, is hardly to be expected, for have they not paid for their seat? An orchestra chair that is purchased at the price of the soul's purity is costly indeed. Yet these men and women who at such expense keep their seats during a foul or suggestive scene would take great care to avoid breathing a poisoned atmosphere, and would be quick to see the folly of walking near a tottering wall. They are blind, however, to the lasting injury they do their priceless souls and the scandal they give their neighbor by watching a salacious theatrical performance. Yet the same instinct of self-preservation that prompts the one course of action should suggest, it would seem, the other.

It is to be feared, however, that most Catholics who attend unclean plays are not caught there unawares, but go in with their eyes wide open. But it is itself a mortal sin, according to moral theology, to walk deliberately and without necessity into the proximate occasions of mortal sin. How, then, can Catholics who feel any concern whatever about preserving cleanness of heart see enacted on the stage such abundant matter for grievous sin, that nothing but a conscience that is miraculously pure or deplorably indurated can escape contamination? Yet women and girls, the modest and shame-faced sex, who form, we are told, more than two-thirds of the theatre-going public, a fair proportion, also, of these two-thirds presumably being Catholics, seem to be the very ones who make it worth while for managers to put on immodest and shameless productions.

King Lear would have to call for much more than an ounce of civet to sweeten the imagination that has been defiled by witnessing a series of modern dramas and farces with a "long and successful run on Broadway." For a vivid scenic presentation of what is unholy and unclean cannot but affect the onlooker much more forcibly than would the same when only read about or heard of; and how quickly a prurient comedy can awake the beast that is in a man or a woman, and how readily filthy thoughts pass to filthy deeds it requires no profound study of psychology to understand.

"But I must go to the theatre," it will be objected. "I need the recreation, and there is scarcely any well-acted play presented nowadays that does not centre round the sex question, or does not make light of 'conventional morality.' Besides, everybody goes."

It is, indeed, a sad truth that there is a plentiful dearth now of decent plays. Shakespeare, it is said, will no longer draw; the stirring melodrama of twenty years ago is not considered "true to nature" in our day, and now that Sir William Gilbert is gone the operas, so full of clean and clever fun, that he left us are perhaps considered too tame for modern theatre patrons. Consequently we have a sad profusion of "problem plays" (Save the mark!), debasing farces and vaudeville entertainments.

But there are surely some reputable plays presented still, and there would be many more if the American people would only make it emphatically plain to theatre managers that no more filth must be imported from the European stage, and also make it unmistakably clear to playwrights how sick we are of dramatic productions based on violations of the sixth commandment. Then that lame excuse, "We only give the people what they want," that theatre folk offer in extenuation of their outrages on public decency, as if on that ground pandering to the vilest excesses of human depravity can be defended, will no longer have any force.

Nor is it true that "everybody goes" to see these objectionable plays. No one of refinement, taste and virtue goes; no one whose good opinion is worth having goes. It is surely not self-respecting men and women, nor practical Catholics, who crowd those theatres that offer salacious productions. The weak excuse, moreover, that "everybody goes" would justify one's joining the large throng that is walking the primrose path to the everlasting bonfire.

Time was when the stage had a high mission: when tragedy purged the passions and comedy laughed down absurdities, removed abuses, showed virtue her own feature and scorn her own image. But now the stage's purpose, we are told by some, is only to amuse. Be it so, then, but in the name of decency let not its object be the corruption of a people's morals. Not even the desire of hearing a well-graced actor, it must be remembered, nor of seeing a beautifully mounted piece can allow Catholics to witness a play that is objectionable on the score of morals. For it is not true, as a great man once permitted himself to say, that vice, by losing all its grossness, loses half its evil. For never is licentiousness more dangerous and alluring than when ministered to by beauty and genius. The modern trend of dramatics has a tendency to obscure this great truth, and Catholics, the heirs of the saints, are bound to do their utmost to purify the American stage. Otherwise there will soon pass from our land all esteem and love for whatsoever is modest, whatsoever is just, whatsoever is holy, whatsoever is of good repute, and then will follow the nation's ruin; for when a licentious drama is systematically corrupting an entire people the death knell of that country's greatness is already sounding.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

Theosophy in India

The Theosophical Society was established in India by Madame H. P. Blavatsky, a Russian, and by Colonel Olcott, an American. Of the lady, Max Müller, after making inquiries into her ways, wrote the following words, which explain exactly the method employed not only by Blavatsky, but by all Theosophists down to the present day, and account for the rapid spread of Theosophy in India:

"Blavatsky took it into her head that it was incumbent on every founder of religion to perform miracles, and it can no longer be denied that she often resorted to the most barefaced tricks and imposition in order to gain adherents to her faith. In this she succeeded better than she could have hoped for. The natives were flattered, as the depositaries of ancient wisdom, far more valuable than anything that European philosophy or the Christian Religion had ever supplied. The natives are not often flattered in this way and they naturally swallowed the bait. Others were taken aback by the assurance with which the new prophet spoke of her interviews with unseen spirits, of letters flying through the air from Tibet to Bombay, of showers of flowers falling from the ceiling of a dining room, of voices and noises proceeding from spirits through a mysterious cabinet."

When Madame Blavatsky died, her mantle fell upon the shoulders of Mrs. Besant, the present President of the Theosophical Society, "a lady," says a correspondent of the Hindu, "well known in England for the last two generations as a leading atheist." After changing her faith or opinion a dozen times, at least, she came to seek her fortune in India, proclaimed herself a convert to the Hindu religion, and, as she is endowed with a glib tongue, she soon outdid Madame Blavatsky in her praises of Hinduism and of everything connected with India. Her praises and flatteries at once won the hearts of the natives. Her name soon rang from one end of the country to the other, and she received the name of "Sankaracharya" from the residents of Benares, the holy city of India. For several years her annual progress through the country was a series of triumphs. On the occasion of one of her visits to Madras, the capital of the Southern Presidency, the Dewan, or Prime Minister, of Mysore, a native State, came all the way to Madras in order to worship her as an incarnation of the goddess Sarasvati. Madras soon became the centre of Theosophy in India. At the Adyar, on the southern outskirts of the city, was built the sanctuary, "sancta sanctorum," which soon became the Mecca of the Theosophists.

In a short time, more than four hundred lodges were started in the country, most of their members being educated Hindus or Government officials. Profiting by the general enthusiasm, Mrs. Besant raised subscriptions for setting up in Benares a national college, which was to be a great centre for the propagation and support of Hinduism. At the time she gave the assurance that it would be a pure Hindu college and that Theosophy would have nothing to do with its teaching. A few years after its establishment she began to "theosophize" it, as a correspondent puts it, to fill all its chairs with ardent Theosophists, and to claim that Theosophy was the real foundation of the college. This opened the eyes of some thoughtful Hindu noblemen; a warning note was sounded, but was not heeded at the time. In the meantime, Mrs. Besant went on winning triumph after triumph. Wherever she went she initiated disciples into the inner sphere of Theosophy, foretold the near advent of the universal brotherhood of men as the result of the teaching of Theosophy, spoke of her past experiences in the series of lives she had gone through in her various births and rebirths, and claimed that she could leave her material body and go to Tibet in her subtle body, and there learn the truth at the feet of the "Mahatmas" or the "Masters," as she called them.

In connection with Mrs. Besant's visits to this place I remember some facts which throw a strong light on the aims of the Theosophical Society in this country. A young Brahmin graduate, for several years an ardent Theosophist, who had been initiated by Mrs. Besant herself, after a series of discussions with me saw clearly the absurdity of Theosophy and sent in his resignation. He was asked to return at once the diploma he had received as an inner member, which was signed by the lady herself. I had, however, time to examine it, and I found it contained all the ordinary signs of Freemasonry. This confirmed what I had read in a pamphlet written by one high in the sect, and shown me by the son of an influential Freemason of this place. For it was clearly asserted that Theosophy in India was only a veiled and milder form of Freemasonry, and that its main object in praising old Hinduism and India was to throw dust into the eyes of the natives and thus to set them against the Catholic religion.

Had any doubt remained as to the truth of this fact it would have been dispelled on the occasion of the conversion to the Catholic faith of another young Brahmin graduate. The Theosophists argued with him at length, and tried every means to dissuade him from becoming a Christian. At last, when they saw the uselessness of their arguments and the firm determination of the young man, they ended the discussion by exclaiming in chorus: "Well, if you are bent on becoming a Christian, turn Protestant, but never join the Catholic Church." Mrs. Besant's whole conduct, in spite of her hypocritical professions of love for all religions as being all good and true, showed that her aim was really to prevent Hindus from becoming Christians. Never did she show greater horror or manifest her wrath more dreadfully than when, on the occasion of a visit to Trichinopoly, she saw in it a colony of young Brahmin converts. She wrote an article in her Benares magazine, calling the vengeance of Heaven upon the city and calling Trichinopoly a disgrace to India, because it was the only place where she had seen young educated people embracing the Christian religion in numbers.

F. BILLARD, S.J.

IN MISSION FIELDS

A CATHOLIC MISSION IN CHINA.

Father Martin Kennelly, the Irish Jesuit from the Province of Paris, who has rounded out his twenty-five years in China, and whose letters from there are so interesting to the readers of AMERICA, has described the Mission of Kiang-Nan in the last issue of The Field Afar.

Kiang means river and Nan south, i.e., the territory to the south of the Yang-tse river, but this is a misnomer, as the mission extends also largely to the north of the same river.

Father Kennelly says that the Jesuit mission, which has its headquarters at Shanghai, comprises two Chinese Provinces, including an area of 95,000 square miles. This is about three times as large as Ireland, and the pagan population is from 50 to 55 millions. (It is not easy to get exact statistics in China.) The more easterly of these two provinces, Kiang-su, has twelve large cities, some as large as Dublin or larger, and seventy of smaller size; the other province north and south of the great river Yang-tse-Kiang is Anhuy, with thirteen large cities and fifty-five of the lower order. Cities of the first order are called in China "Fu" cities; those of the second order "Chows," and those of the third "Hsiens" or sub-prefectures.

The mission is divided into two ecclesiastical sections, and into some 120 parishes. There is a head priest over each section and one missionary to each of these parishes, besides a helper, if possible. There are about 120 missionaries engaged in active missionary work. In each parish there are from ten to twenty, or even twenty-five, churches.

The staff of the mission is under one Bishop, residing at Shanghai. There are about 200 members of the Society, 160 priests (24 Chinese), 18 scholastics and 28 lay brothers. There are also some secular clergy, about 40 priests, of whom all are natives. There are thus 200 priests, which is more than in any other Catholic province in China.

In the Seminary there are 26 students of Theology and 20 studying Latin. The Seminary is recruited chiefly from the Zikawei College, five miles from Shanghai. The course of studies at the college consists of Chinese literature and classics (eight to ten years), with a foreign program in English and French, the two latter extending over five years and comprising history, mathematics, elementary physics and chemistry, music and drawing. There is a two years' course of Philosophy and a four years' course of Divinity.

Thus we see that the native Chinese priest is very well fitted for his work, and his training is by no means deficient. In fact, our missionaries are far better prepared than the Protestants, who usually get one or two years' training in the Bible, and are then sent to convert the Chinese, whom they do not succeed in winning over to Christ.

The priests of the missions are helped by various religious congregations, male and female. Among these are the little Brothers of Mary (or Marianists). These are 70 in number, of whom 36 are natives. They do excellent work in educational lines, and can all teach in English and French. They correspond to the Christian Brothers at home. They help in the college in Shanghai, as e. g. in St. Francis Xavier's, where there are 650 pupils, including 300 Chinese. The boarders number over 200.

As to nuns, there is one order of contemplatives, the Carmelites, 28 in number, of whom 18 are natives. Earnestly and unceasingly they send up prayers for the success of the mission and that the Lord may "send laborers into His harvest."

There are also the "Auxiliatrices," or Helpers of the Souls in Purgatory, who have the care of the education of foreign girls—English, American, Canadian, Australian, and also Chinese. At Shanghai they have in all about 800 pupils. They prepare many for the Oxford and Cambridge local examinations, both junior and senior.

Then there are the Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul, 54 in number, of whom 10 are natives. They do hospital work. Besides the Bishop's Hospital, they have charge of the General Hospital, or that which belongs to the town. They have also a novitiate. Any native who desires to join them must first unbind her feet. As is well known, the Chinese women of any position pride themselves on the smallness of their feet, these being kept tightly bound from infancy, so that often the foot does not exceed two or three inches in length. With such feet Sisters of Charity could not do much active work, and so they have to give up this criterion of beauty in the Chinese world.

Again, there are the Little Sisters of the Poor, who have the care of about 430 aged men and women. At the beginning it was thought that in China no woman could do work among men; but the contrary has been found, and these good nuns do most valuable work.

Finally, there is a congregation of native nuns. They are trained by European nuns, Helpers of the Holy Souls, and are most successful, especially in the instruction of native women, for whom it is very difficult in China for the missionary to do anything directly. They also make lace and embroidery. These native nuns work in native hospitals, have some knowledge of medicine, and so help in easy cases. They sometimes have occasion to baptize pagan children when they are at the point of death.

Father Kennelly says that he is often asked: "Do you succeed in converting the Chinese?" He answers that in one mission alone there are about 200,000 Catholic converts. This is as much as or more than the Protestants have in all China, though their staff is four or five times as numerous as ours. The aggregate of Catholic converts in China amounts to 1,210,000.

"A notable point about the Protestants is the number of their divisions. There are no less than ninety-two different denominations of Protestants carrying on work in China, and some of these have only two or three members. Individually, I have found these ministers, as a rule, obliging, and some of them have rendered me services for which I am grateful. Many are, however, most bigoted, and do not even admit that Catholics are Christians."

The parishes usually cover large districts. In one parish there are from ten to twenty, or even more, churches. "At one time another priest and myself," he says, "had to attend to twenty-six churches; in such cases the work is very heavy. Some of the churches are really very good; others are not rain-proof."

When a priest arrives at a mission the church bell is rung. The Christians assemble, chant some prayers and are blessed by the missionary. He makes their acquaintance. Then there is the daily round of Mass, instructions, administration of the Sacraments, attending schools, visiting dispensaries, and he is soon quite at home with his flock.

As to his dress, the missionary is clothed as a Chinaman—flowing garments, baggy pants and satin head-gear, and in the heart of the country he generally wears the pigtail. The pigtail is being partially discarded at present. Some of the old missionaries regret exceedingly the change from the time-honored custom of the past, but the young generation is progressive and deems reform necessary.

The Chinese are fond of bright colors—red, green and blue—nothing is too gaudy. The Protestants do not use the native dress, save the members of "The Chinese Inland Mission," who are compelled to adopt the pigtail. Even the ladies dress in native costume, but their "large feet and other outlandish habits easily distinguish them from the home-born belles."

CORRESPONDENCE

Spanish Politics and Bullfights

MADRID, Aug. 1, 1911.

If foreign nations were to judge Spain by the barbarous actions of our Republicans and Radicals it might be believed that the civilization of the twentieth century has not yet penetrated our country, and that we are still thousands of leagues from European progress and culture. The truth is that in Latin countries "republic" is synonymous with ferocity, enmity, tyranny, and barbarity. With our Republicans and Radicals there is no such thing as respect for the opinions of others, there is no recognition of a right to think otherwise than they do, there is no liberty to do more than follow their banner.

Last night the platform of the Ateneo of Madrid, where freethinkers and rationalists have repeatedly spoken without exciting a protest or occasioning a disturbance, was occupied by the celebrated Portuguese monarchist, Homen Cristo, who had been announced for a lecture on the political evolution of Portugal. The young speaker, availing himself of documents and press clippings from his country, began to describe the corruption and abuses practised by politicians, both under the monarchy and under the present so-called republic; but his earnest words soon stirred up the wrath of a group of Republicans who had stationed themselves in the rear of the hall. What with shouts and threats and insults and blasphemous cries, they made such an uproar and created such a disturbance that they forced the speaker to discontinue his lecture, even before it was fairly begun. They had accomplished their purpose. They had silenced the voice which was to make known the enormities which republicanism has perpetrated in Portugal.

But how, we may ask, could those Spanish Republicans be expected to show courtesy to a foreigner when they cannot keep the peace among themselves? The Radicals who look up to Lerroux as a leader, and the Republican-Socialists who follow Azcárate and Pablo Iglesias, are at daggers drawn. Whenever either faction holds a meeting, members of the other, with no invitation to hold a candle at the function, appear on the scene and use their favorite arguments, stout clubs and even revolvers, so successfully that the number of disfigured faces and cracked sconces is, as a rule, quite considerable. Such has been the case at the meetings in Barcelona, Bilbao, and elsewhere.

These divisions and consequent clashes are a source of no little satisfaction to the monarchists, who feel that there is not much to be feared from a party whose leaders bandy coarse insults through the press, and whose members so often come to blows. But these riotous proceedings keep the country in a condition of unceasing agitation, and bring upon it the reproach of being unrefined and barbarous, a reproach which in reality it does not deserve.

In the meanwhile Spanish politics, at least as far as outside appearances go, seem to be taking a nap,—a very rare event in this country. The Cortes are not in session and most of the cabinet are absent on vacation. But Canalejas is on hand as a sort of universal minister; for, parodying the famous words of Louis XIV, "I am the State," he is Minister of Government and of Grace and Justice, besides being President of the Council. Really, Canalejas ought to consider himself the luckiest cabinet officer living. Putting aside the question of Morocco, in which Spain cannot act because of her weakness and lack of military and naval resources, there appears to be no hindrance to the free development of his plans. Maura and the Conservatives are silent; the Republicans are squabbling among themselves; the energies of the Catholics seem to be lulled to sleep. There being no great issue to discuss, the premier furnishes recreation for himself and abundant "copy" to the press by indulging in any amount of small talk on light and frivolous topics. Now and then the spirit of the cheap politician reasserts itself in him, and he regales his hearers with talk about what he is going to do to regenerate the country. Quite recently he gave out that he was intending to reform the penal code by suppressing capital punishment, notwithstanding the fact that France has been driven to enact it anew on account of the increase of grave crimes. Another of the topics of conversation of our peerless premier is the details of the law of obligatory military service, a measure that he will bring before the Cortes in the autumn and expects to see on the statute books by January, 1912.

A third project is the enforcement of a recent law which lays special taxes on all the property, real and personal, of corporations of all kinds whose belongings do not descend by right of inheritance. Here are included, not only religious Orders, but also cathedral chapters, chaplaincies, and the like. In virtue of this law, the Government would make an inventory of all property belonging in any way to the Church, or religious or ecclesiastical associations, so that on the day when Canalejas or any other minister hostile to the Church should decide to seize her goods, the way would be already prepared. It was by such inventories that they began in France, and then proceeded to the sacrilegious spoliation of the Church and the Orders.

The Spanish prelates took advantage of their presence in Madrid for the Eucharistic Congress to confer on the nature and tendency of this law, which they very properly viewed with no little alarm. At their request, the time for making the inventories was extended by royal order to September 30, by which time they hope to have determined upon a course of action.

Spaniards in general give themselves no concern about the grave political questions which agitate the country or materially affect its relations with other states; for them the great, the important matter is the luck, good or ill, of the most popular bullfighter. Towards evening on July 30, all Madrid was in commotion, for word had been received that the reigning favorite in bullfighting circles, Vicente Pastor, had been wounded in the throat by a bull in the bull-ring at Santander. The sidewalks were thronged with excited citizens; the newspapers struck off extras, which were fairly snatched by the eager purchasers; the street where Pastor lives was so packed with people that it was simply impossible to make one's way through it; in clubs and restaurants there was no other topic of conversation.

Not satisfied with private and unofficial telegrams, the citizens went to the ministry of Government and asked that the civil governor of Santander be instructed to telegraph the truth of the matter. Finally, to quiet the people it was found necessary to post a large placard containing the official telegram, which stated that the bullfighter's injuries were not serious. Yet, all night long, the block in which Pastor's family lives was swarming with people.

Such are the Spaniards. What to them are Morocco and Portugal and other problems of a religious or political or financial or social nature in comparison with the fate of a favorite who has been gored by a bull? Such the Spaniard has been, and is, and will continue to be.

Organizing China's New Navy

SHANGHAI, July 18, 1911.

Since her defeat by Japan, 1894-95, now sixteen years ago, China has had no navy worthy a Great Power. The chief obstacle to naval development, as to many other schemes, is the question of finance. The funds of the Ministry are at a low ebb. Naval expenditure is furnished by contributions from the provinces. Telegrams are constantly dispatched to the Viceroys and Governors urging the payment of backward instalments, but these seldom come except in a reduced form backed up by the plea that other calls are numerous and it is impossible to supply a cent more. On December 4, 1910, the Navy was separated from the Army Department, and erected into a regular Ministry with Prince Tsai-hsun, brother of the Regent, at its head. Beside him is a Vice-Admiral, Sah Chen-ping, a competent and able officer, who has been attached to the British Navy during eighteen years. No great scheme of naval construction has been embarked on as yet. A full program is expected to be carried out in 1915, and will comprise 4 naval stations, 8 first-class battleships, 20 cruisers and 2 flotillas of torpedo boats. The cost is estimated at 160,000,000 taels, an impossible sum for China's depleted Exchequer unless she goes a-borrowing.

Amidst projects of reorganization and strengthening what may interest the readers of AMERICA is the state of the small and insignificant naval force possessed by the country at present. The fleet is divided into 3 squadrons, the Peiyang or Northern, the Nanyang or Southern, and lastly that of the Yangtse River. The two former have been lately amalgamated to form a cruising squadron composed of 4 old ships, a few destroyers, sea-going boats and torpedo boats. These will shortly be strengthened by the addition of 3 or 4 more cruisers, one of which a 20-knot ship, 2,610 tons, is being built at Camden, New Jersey, U. S.; another, a 30-knot torpedo cruiser, has been ordered in Austria, and a similar one in Italy; 2 high draught, shallow river gunboats are being constructed at Stettin, Germany, and a few smaller ones, each of about 800 tons, have been entrusted to Japan. The Yangtse squadron consists of 12 small gunboats, intended for river and creek work, and 2 cruisers, with 10 sea-going gunboats forming a training squadron. Two additional training cruisers, constructed in England and now completed, will be brought out with the cruiser Haichi when returning at the close of the year.

As to naval schools, China has four, at Chefoo, Nanking, Foochow and Canton, respectively. In the near future, Chefoo (Shantung province) will become an elementary school; and a naval college combining mining, gunnery and torpedo schools, as well as naval barracks, will be erected at Nimrod Sound, in the province of Chekiang. The schools at Nanking, Foochow and Canton will then be abolished, and two additional naval colleges, one in Peking and another in Shanghai, will be opened to supply their absence.

Naval recruits are gathered almost exclusively from the coast and Yangtse provinces. So far there are few competent naval officers, and there is no admiralty chart, and China cannot make one without foreign assistance. Recently twenty-three cadets have completed their course of gunnery in a torpedo school in Japan, and a practical course on board a Japanese training cruiser. When Prince Tsai-chen, China's delegate to the coronation ceremony, returns from England, experts are to accompany him as naval advisers. Rumors are current that a loan will be soon raised for naval purposes, but this is rather unlikely. Too many other reforms appeal urgently to the Government—army and railway development, educational work, postal reorganization—and it is more fitting that these should take precedence and be carried out without delay. Lisbon Politics

LISBON, Aug. 12, 1911.

While the city is sweltering through the dog days, three topics claim the attention of politicians, namely, the discussions in the Constituent Assembly, the approaching election of a President of Portugal, and the popular demonstrations against the provisional government.

The debates in the Assembly, it must be confessed, are not marked by any brilliant oratorical effort or by a display of profound wisdom; they drag along in a desultory fashion, for the deputies dread the moment for electing a President, which will come on the adoption of a Constitution, and therefore they are doing what they can to stave it off by talking. The final adoption by the Assembly of a bicameral legislative body has found scant favor with the administration and with many prospective lawmakers, who will find their anticipated powers considerably curtailed.

Dom Eduardo Abreu is the only member of the Assembly who shows any signs of independent thinking. At one of the sessions he created a sensation by charging the Minister of Treasury with deceiving the nation. Costa had asked a credit of $718,000, whereas, averred Abreu, more than twice that sum was needed. The friends of the administration interrupted him and tried to drown his remarks in noise.

The election of a President is calling into play all the tactics of the varied interests at stake. A certain calmness is observed on the face of things, but this in no way corresponds to the underground methods and secret intrigues of those most concerned in effecting a choice. Just at present an active but silent campaign is being carried on against the election of any member of the provisional administration, and more especially against the candidacy of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Bernardino Machado. "If the Assembly," says O Seculo, which has an ax to grind, and laments editorially any hostility to the present administration, "honored the provisional Government with a vote of confidence, why should it now exclude them from the presidency? Such a proceeding would be a deadly blow to the worth of the republic; it is planned by some nobodies who aim at scaling the capitol and entering through the back door for the sake of satisfying their delirious dreams." This newspaper is so intimately associated with Theofilo Braga and the majority of the cabinet that its utterances are most significant.

The conduct of the rabble is such that we may have grave doubts about the freedom of action and even deliberation enjoyed in the Assembly. After all, Lisbon is not Portugal, and if a Lisbon mob threatens the Assembly and actually stones the members and some of the cabinet (and all this has actually occurred) how far may the Assembly be said to represent the country? How far do its conclusions express the sentiments of the nation?

Verdesi Condemned Again

ROME, August 10, 1911.

The Court of Appeal has rejected the appeal of the ex-priest Verdesi, against the sentence passed on the 5th of June, of imprisonment for ten months, a fine of 833 lire, and the payment of all costs, for charging Father Bricarelli, S.J., with violating the seal of Confession. The Court confirmed the sentence of the lower tribunal, and in addition condemned Verdesi to bear the expenses of this second trial. His two Socialist lawyers talked platitudes on behalf of their client; while the Public Prosecutor and Father Bricarelli's advocates proved once more beyond all doubt the Methodists' protégé to be a mere hypocrite and vulgar calumniator. Verdesi, however, is safe in Switzerland with a medical certificate alleging him to be unfit to travel back to Rome to pay the penalty of his offence. It is said he is thinking of sailing for the United States, where his Methodist sponsors can further exploit him as a martyr.

Educational Value of Federation

Of course it is only a platitude to say that a society has in the nature of things an educational influence on its members. Every one knows, for instance, how the business associations of to-day have taught men methods of multiplying means to make money in a manner that a short time ago would have seemed next to insanity in the extent and character of the operations entered upon. But the societies themselves need other associations. In the social as well as the physical order in-breeding begets defectives. Blood is needed from outside. Hence the idea of the Federation of Catholic Societies. A number of distinct and autonomous societies, each with its own specific purpose, meet on the sole ground of their Catholicity. They are represented by delegates, assembling annually in some great centre to devise means by which their common object may be advanced. The constitutional structure of each organization is not only safeguarded but strengthened. They are united, not fused.

These delegates frequently travel great distances, put themselves to considerable expense, and make no little sacrifice of time and convenience, solely for the purpose of carrying out the object of this union. Their first act at meeting is one of public homage to their Creator, the solemnity and splendor of which, were it only for the magnificence and grandeur with which it is invested on such occasions, would itself be educational to the highest degree both for those who participate in it, and for the world outside. The opening ceremony of the second day, the Mass for the dead, is a similar proclamation of belief in another world, and a far-reaching reaffirmation of what is in the heart of every man who kneels in supplication before the altar.

These gatherings are not occasions of junketing or amusement. Time is too precious a thing for these earnest men and they plunge instantly into the hardest kind of work for days. They are nearly all drafted into committees and labor all day long. What strikes an onlooker is the character and extent of what these men know, and how wide their intellectual horizon. They are familiar with the world's contemporaneous history, they can tell you what is going on in England, Ireland, Germany, Spain, Portugal, Cuba, Mexico, South America, the Philippines, Russia, Poland, Albania and elsewhere at least in matters that affect the Faith; they have been carefully noting the progress of Socialism; they are close observers of the attitude of the press in the various countries of the world; they have followed the trend of education in Europe and America; they are informed about the world's current literature inasmuch as it is favorable or antagonistic to faith and morals; they can speak intelligently and comprehensively about the divorce question, about the social evil, about the condition of the stage, about the attitude of the various governments of the world anent the Church, etc. In these meetings the information grows or is corrected, wrong or dangerous tendencies are deflected in the right direction; and by contact with their associates from all parts of the country their confidence and self-reliance is increased and their cooperation made more enthusiastic and aggressive.

In the public gatherings the subjects which come up for consideration always cover an immense field of thought and they are explained and urged in such a clean-cut, convincing and frequently eloquent fashion, sometimes by men not in professional life, that not only the ordinary hearer, but even those who themselves are trained to public utterances are both surprised and delighted. But what most frequently puzzles the outside world at these gatherings is, that these laymen in their discourses, often pronounced on the spur of the moment, are evidently familiar with an immense number of profound religious truths, such as man's essential and inalienable obligations to his Creator, the Incarnation of the Son of God, divine grace, the sacraments, etc., none of which are, of course, discussed but which come to the speaker's lips as a matter of course and seem to run like a thread through all their utterances, and are moreover referred to or explained with perfect confidence in the correctness of what they advance.

Perhaps the presence of the prelates in these assemblies is one of the most notable features in the educational growth which is perfected in such gatherings. The fact that the speakers are most ready to accept any warning or advice that might be given on such occasions, if any deviation from the strictest orthodoxy occurs, is itself a splendid mental and moral training for the speaker, or rather an evidence that he is already excellently equipped in that respect, while it is at the same time a startling revelation to those in the audience who have thrown off all religious authority. The familiarity of these Catholic laymen with the profound doctrines of the Church is a constant source of astonishment to heretics and unbelievers.

In brief the Federation meetings are condensed and concentrated Summer Schools of education on the most vital subjects of human life. Everything is at high pressure, indeed, but the students are prepared and mature. The delegates return to their respective societies and the general uplift in Catholic information and Catholic energy simply defies calculation. There is no Catholic society of any kind or any race that should not cooperate with this movement.

Flippant Criticism

The New York Evening Sun is ordinarily careful not to offend the religious sentiments of its readers; one is the more surprised, then, to note the coarse gibe which closes an editorial comment in its issue of August 22. Referring to a report lately published by the Surgeons General of the United States Army and Navy, in which the question of venereal diseases is dealt with at considerable length, a writer in AMERICA had suggested a modification of the "public discussion and education" proposed in the report as a cure of the evil which has come to be our nation's shame.

No indiscriminate public discussion, he contended, should be favored, since that would rather attract the prurient and evil-minded than save the innocent and pure. There should be instruction, of course, but instruction by prudent, pure-minded and competent men and women; not an education that reveals to mere children the mysteries of life by school manuals, which perhaps have had their share in the national disaster.

To the Evening Sun writer all this suggests "obstinate opposition towards the maintenance and improvement of public hygiene" (!),—"a peculiarly deplorable opposition used upon the plea of morality or in the name of religion." Not naming AMERICA he makes this reference to our reasonable comment on the "public discussion and education" remedy urged in the report of the Surgeons General: "One of our leading religious journals cries out against it and insists that the 'mysteries of life' must be concealed from 'mere children,' intimating that the school manuals of physiology, even such as they are, may 'have had their share in the national disaster.'"

One is tempted to score, as he deserves, a writer who presumes thus to twist the thought he would criticise, but the closing words of his editorial evince a callowness of judgment that mark him one deserving of pity rather than censure. The writer in AMERICA, speaking with a knowledge which years of intimate experience of the motives strong to influence men gave to him, had urged the need of religion's help to cure the evil; and speaking to those who would understand his plea, he had affirmed: "For Catholics, there must be added the sanction and the sacraments of their religion to sustain the instruction; and they must be impressed profoundly with the obligation of heeding God's mandate to be pure both in body and soul. For them fear of God and the use of the sacraments are the only prophylactics."

Whereupon the Sun writer flippantly asks: "Is not this plainly a case of piety run to seed?" Solomon's word is his fitting answer: "My son, be not wise in thy own conceit. . . . For every mocker is an abomination to the Lord, and his communication is with the simple."

A Danger of the Day

Some four hundred new books are announced for this fall by metropolitan publishers. Of what will this deluge of reading matter chiefly consist? Of fiction, unquestionably; and if we may judge by the character of the past summer's output of novels, fiction largely of a dangerous tendency. Pick up, for instance, two of this year's "successful" stories that are not by any means the worst of those the public eagerly devours nowadays. One is called "The Legacy." Its plot reaches a climax when a woman is about to prove unfaithful to her marriage vows and, in intent at least, is an adulteress, a sudden accident being all that saves her. "Fenella," the other book, the author of which is said to be a Catholic, is the story of a London dancing girl, whose reputation, sullied in an early chapter, is lost beyond recovery before the middle of the book. Now, though the plot and situations of both these stories are bad, the style and atmosphere are no better. Nearly all the leading characters are coarse, brutal, sordid or irreligious. Few of the men or women delineated have any purpose in life beyond the gratification of the three concupiscences. Yet the creator of these characters strives to portray them in a way that will excite, not the disgust, but the sympathy and admiration of his readers.

Now it is much to be feared that novels of this kind are becoming the daily absorption even of Catholics. By enterprising manipulation of modern publishers' distribution methods the latest novel may be borrowed for a few cents from the corner drug-store, and this type of story will be circulated more widely than ever. No Catholic, however, should start reading any of these books without first being sure that the story is clean. That a novel "has reached the three hundred thousand mark," be it remembered, is in itself suspicious nowadays, for the public's literary taste is perverted and its conscience blunted. Nor can the book reviews of many secular magazines and journals be trusted either, for novels are being highly praised that no pure-minded person would touch, even with a pair of tongs.

If a man were to walk into an apothecary shop and proceed to taste of all the bottles within his reach he would probably be arrested for attempted suicide. But is not a woman who enters a circulating library to take out half a dozen suggestive novels doing all she can to commit moral suicide? Let Catholics be on their guard then. It is plain that many novels of the day cannot be read without danger of mortal sin, for these stories are reeking with soul poison.

The President in Search of a Pastor

President Taft must have felt something like the New Zealander who is going to sit on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's. He made a pious pilgrimage around the city of Washington last Sunday week and saw what must have looked to him like the ruins of Christianity. Church after church was closed for the summer and the parsons were off on vacation, resting their weary voices on the top of the Alps or up the Nile, or on the sea-coast or elsewhere, and drawing their salary meantime automatically. Our separated brethren are very considerate. The legislators under the dome were hammering out reciprocity and free wool and the cotton schedule, and the President was elaborating his prospective vetoes while the modern apostles of Washington had concluded that the country did not care which way salvation went, so they adjourned and let the souls that might be lingering in the District take care of themselves. And yet they are wondering why men don't go to church. Why should men go to church? If the parson doesn't go, why should they? It is a pity the President didn't betake himself to St. Aloysius', or to Holy Trinity, or to St. Matthew's or to some other of the Catholic churches in the Capital. He would have found plenty of worshippers before the altar, congregation replacing congregation from early morning till mid-day, and then in the afternoon till late in the evening.

Washington, of course, is only typical of the whole country. Our Protestant friends have effaced from their souls the last vestiges of the law of public worship at least on one day of the week, and the inevitable result has followed. The other nine laws of the Decalogue are tossed aside as of no binding force whatever. Hence it is that we self-complacent Americans find ourselves face to face with the grimmest and most gruesome criminal statistics of the whole civilized world. It is almost a pity that the President could not do with the parsons what he does with the legislators: keep them in session while there is any work to be done.

Religious and Personal Liberty

An incident which recently occurred in Arnaudville, La., and which the action of the State authorities has just closed satisfactorily, promises to become a notable and salutary precedent. A negro was duly tried for an alleged crime and condemned to death, but the two priests of the place, believing there was a miscarriage of justice, petitioned the Board of Pardons in his favor. A committee of local Catholics sent a protest to the archbishop against the priests' action, on the ground that the man was a negro and that, if priests did not mind their own business, French history would repeat itself in Louisiana.

Archbishop Blenk replied that his priests were under his authority in ecclesiastical matters only. "They are and remain free citizens, entitled to exercise, independent of me, all civil and political rights." The fact that the man they interceded for was a negro added to their credit. "The lowliness of the claimant should, with generous hearts, strengthen his claim for assistance." The allusion to French anti-clericalism was thus answered: "I beg to remind all concerned that we are living in America, and that in this republic which is truly free, the mass of the people will see to it that the Catholic Church is not here assailed and despoiled of its property and rights."

His Grace's manly defence of the lowliest of his people, of the rights of his priests and of American citizenship, was warmly approved by the press and people of Louisiana. The citizens of Arnaudville passed resolutions repudiating the action of the protestants, endorsing the pronouncement of the archbishop and pledging him their allegiance. The State Board of Pardons at its last meeting, Lieut.-Governor Lambremont presiding, took up the petition of the priests and, finding after careful investigation that their grounds of objection were well taken, decided by unanimous vote to commute the negro's sentence.

The incident shows that the people in the South, as well as elsewhere will, when properly appealed to, respond to courageous and capable leadership, and that the hasty action of a turbulent few does not represent the popular mind. It also shows that Louisiana, originally a French colony and now the most Catholic State in the South, is still attached to the older and better traditions of the mother country. It might be well to transmit the archbishop's letter with an account of its consequences to the present rulers of France. It would give them an object lesson in religious liberty as it exists in a real republic.

An Unorthodox Conceit

Magazine verse seldom calls for serious notice, but when a writer who figures considerably in Catholic periodicals signs her name to a page of rank blasphemy in a secular publication, it was necessary to point it out. Katharine Tynan had a poem in the August McClure's in which, addressing her child, she says:

"Child if I were in heaven and you were in hell . . .
I would leave the fields of God and Queen Mary's feet, Straight to the heart of hell would go seeking my sweet."

Now, if Katharine Tynan knew or cared to remember her catechism she would know that if she were in heaven, and therefore enjoying complete happiness, she would never want to get out of it; also that if she did get to "the heart of hell" there she would stay with her "sweet," and there would be nothing sweet in that. Even her child, if he is a Catholic, would recognize the falsity of her teaching and its direct opposition to elementary Catholic doctrine, but he might not rise, or sink, to an understanding of the blasphemy that follows. The Blessed Mother is made to rise up in Heaven at Katharine's departure and say to her Son:

"It is so that mothers are made: Thou madest them so. Body of mine and Soul of mine, do I not know?"

That is, God made it impossible for mothers, even His own, to accept His truths where their child is concerned. Poets and other verse-writers who have written themselves out are wont to patch their lines with sensations, for lack of legitimate material, or to make a paradox banked in gush do duty for poetic feeling; but that a Catholic writer should seek body for her verse by making the Mother of God sponsor for un-Catholic sentiment, is something difficult to characterize.

Where More is Meant Than Meets The Eye

A dozen years ago "advanced educationists" were gravely discussing the effects produced on the budding minds of children by the tint of the school-room walls. Pure white was not considered very stimulating. Light green was in high favor for its quieting and soothing quality, but gazing always on pink or grey might have a weakening effect on the character of pupils. Strikingly contrasted colors kept children wide-awake; so a flock of little girls who sat in a room treated in crimson and gold would doubtless surpass completely their school-mates of the same age who studied within walls tastelessly calsomined in yellow and brown, though boys in a red room would be harder to manage, no doubt, than those who were gathered under a ceiling of azure hue.

Much of this is quite absurd, to be sure. It is true, nevertheless, that the character of children is influenced by what constantly meets their eyes at school. Boys, for instance, who gaze day after day at a picture of Cæsar or Napoleon are likely to conclude that no one is more worthy of admiration than Cæsar or Napoleon, and girls who sit daily before a stylishly dressed, well-paid schoolma'am are in danger of deciding that the most important thing to aim at in this world is to be well paid and stylishly dressed. But children who always see hanging above the teacher's desk the Crucifix, or a picture of our Lady, and by the daily sight of the religious habit, are unconsciously imbued with the Catholic principles that these things symbolize, are much more likely, it would seem to be good Christians, and therefore good citizens than are their public school play-fellows. However far from the right path the children of the parish school may afterward stray, the early impressions they once received from their surroundings will help to keep the spark of faith living in their hearts. For if that fire is not completely quenched it can be fanned to a flame, even on a death-bed, and a soul find salvation. If early religious training resulted after all only in this, how priceless would be its value?

CATHOLIC PRESS ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA

Supplementing the work of the Convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies at Columbus, Ohio, was the meeting of Catholic editors, whose sessions were held on Thursday and Friday of Convention week. The practical outcome of their deliberations was the formation of a Catholic Press Association, which it is hoped will eventually include in its membership all the editors of Catholic newspapers and periodicals published in the United States and Canada. This is not the first attempt to form an association of this character. Previous efforts, however, failed to arouse general interest or cooperation, and in consequence whatever organizations were heretofore projected or actually established came to a premature end. The advantages to be derived from a united Catholic Press was never a matter of speculation. The need of such union has daily become more apparent. The call for the special meeting at a time when the Federated Societies were in session was sent to the different editors of the Catholic Press by Mr. Edward J. Cooney, of the Providence Visitor, Providence, R. I. Between sixty and seventy Catholic editors were present at the several sessions.

By a regrettable oversight the invitation to the meeting was sent only to the editors of papers and periodicals printed in English, and the numerous like publications in German, Italian, Slavic, French and Polish were overlooked. Perhaps it was thought that the formation of a permanent organization of the press could be best accomplished if a modest beginning were made, and that the membership could be enlarged later when the association had been well established. It was a matter of surprise and gratification for those present to find so many present who had come from distant parts of the United States, some, too, from Canada, all animated with the sole purpose of uniting their efforts in a cause upon which so much affecting the religious life of Catholics depends. The several sessions were marked by great unanimity and great cordiality, auguring well for the future. The concrete result of the deliberations was the formation of a society under the name of the Catholic Press Association, with a permanent board of officers and directors. Within the chief organization three bureaus were established, the work of which will be entrusted to a separate board of managers for each bureau.

The following officers were elected: President, Edward J. Cooney, Providence, R. I.; vice-president, William A. King, Buffalo, N. Y.; secretary, Claude M. Becker, Brooklyn, N. Y.; treasurer, Charles J. Jaegle, Pittsburg; board of directors, Rev. Edward P. Spillane, S.J., and Rev. John J. Burke, C.S.P., New York, and James T. Carroll, Columbus.

Preparation for putting into operation the news bureaus which the organization will perfect was made at the meeting by the naming of committees to take charge.

The news bureaus will be under charge of Nicholas Gonner, of Dubuque, Ia.; Rev. Peter E. Blessing, Providence, R. I.; Charles J. Jaegle, Pittsburg; J. F. Cahill, Montreal; Rev. O. T. Magnell, Hartford, Conn. The advertising bureau will be under charge of Edward J. Cooney, Providence; P. E. Sullivan, Portland, Ore.; Dr. Thomas P. Hart, Cincinnati; William M. Mumm, Columbus, and J. M. O'Rourke, New York.

A literary bureau also is to be established in connection with the work of the organization. The men in charge will be Rev. John J. Burke, New York; John Paul Chew, St. Louis; Dr. Thomas O'Hagan, Chicago; Rev. Dr. William P. Cantwell, Long Branch, N. J., and Miss Alice J. Stevens, of Los Angeles.

LITERATURE

The Dawn of All. By ROBERT HUGH BENSON. St. Louis: B. Herder.

Many readers of Monsignor Benson's "Lord of the World," which appeared a few years ago, informed the author that the effect of that book "was exceedingly depressing and discouraging to optimistic Christians." Consequently, as a sort of antidote to his former volume, he shows in "The Dawn of All" what may happen some sixty years from now if the process opposite to that traced in "The Lord of the World" should take place. Father Masterman, an apostate priest, has been stricken suddenly with a fatal malady, and, after refusing the last Sacraments, becomes unconscious. He finds himself forthwith transported to the year 1973, to discharge the duties of secretary to an English cardinal. From his first experience in this new world, that of listening to a sermon in Hyde Park delivered by a Franciscan friar, till the climax of the book, when the Pope comes as his own envoy to make peace with a city full of rebellious Socialists, Mgr. Masterman meets a series of surprises. For he finds society reconstructed on a basis of complete submission to the Holy See. The Catholic Church, for example, is reestablished in England; all the kings of Europe pay the Pope homage; Italy is St. Peter's patrimony once more, with Austria administering its government; the civil, scientific and industrial world is thoroughly animated by Catholic ideals and principles; Ireland has become a huge monastery of contemplatives, where everybody goes now and then for a retreat, and the Holy Father has become the arbiter of nations.

A visit Mgr. Masterman makes to Paris, Rome, and Lourdes opens his eyes to the pervasiveness of the Church's influence. He assists at a trial for heresy, and, to his horror, sees a priest handed over to the secular arm for execution. In Germany only there is some unrest, owing to the emperor's apathy and to the Socialists making their last stand in Berlin. By the Pope's courage and address, however, war is averted, and all the unreconciled Socialists are permitted to pack up and sail for no less a place than Boston! There they will be permitted to practise Socialism in peace. Almost all our side of the world will belong, of course, to the Mexican empire in 1973; the Eastern States and Canada will be under a separate government, however, as the Far West will have succumbed to Japan. The vision ends with the Holy Father's triumphal progress round the world at the head of a magnificent procession of "volars," in which every nation on the earth is represented.

Mgr. Benson cleverly explains, as the story goes on, all the means by which this wonderful revolution was effected, and Father Jervis, Mgr. Masterman's right-hand man, is made to recall to the astonished secretary the simple Catholic principles that were accepted when all these changes took place. The story ends with the fallen priest's awakening from his strange sleep and asking for a confessor. Mgr. Benson has given us a clever and interesting book. W. D.

The Dominion of Canada. By W. L. GRIFFITH. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.

This is the third volume of the "All Red Series," which is intended to give a sort of bird's-eye view of the commonwealths of the British Empire. It is not a very satisfactory volume, its chief fault being that it attempts too much. The history of Canada from 1497 to 1871, when British Columbia entered the Confederation, cannot be given in sixty-eight pages, and, consequently, very important matters receive insufficient treatment. The remaining sixty-three pages of the first part deal with the development of the country, especially of the West, and a little political history. The second part discusses the people and their social life, with a glance at labor unions. The third runs over the constitution, climate, commerce and scenery, and touches on a few other things, such as conservation. The fourth is statistical, regarding agriculture, mines, fisheries and manufactures.

The author is secretary of the High Commissioner in London, and would, we think, have produced a more practical book, for both immigrants and those who stay at home, had he divided it according to Provinces. The style is extremely commercial, sometimes distressingly so. There are some misprints, as "Nova Scotia," and no British Columbian can tolerate "Simil Kameen" and "Esquimault," the less so as these names are elsewhere printed correctly.

Newspapers and Periodicals of Illinois, 1814-1879. Revised and Enlarged Edition. By FRANKLIN WILLIAM SCOTT, University of Illinois. Springfield, Ill.: Trustees of the Illinois State Historical Library.

On August 15, 1812, a party of Indians on the warpath slew every man of the garrison of Fort Dearborn, Illinois; on the following day they destroyed every building at that remote outpost of American civilization. From those ashes rose Chicago. Two years after the attack on Fort Dearborn a land office was opened at Kaskaskia, the chief town in Illinois territory, and the same year saw the launching of the first newspaper enterprises, The Illinois Herald, published in the same town. Four years passed from this humble but daring venture before the public demand, that capricious autocrat, called for a second paper. Politics, business, religion, and literature brought forth other productions as the years wore on, until, in the course of 1879, one hundred and forty-eight new candidates for the favor of the reading public appeared in the arena. In a historical introduction of eighty pages Professor Scott traces the currents of thought and action which were responsible for the increase in the number and kinds of publications.

Most of those pioneer papers have disappeared beyond hope of recovery, yet some are preserved in the State and elsewhere. A list of such repositories takes forty-five pages.

Photographic reproductions are given of four early papers. The thirtieth issue of The Illinois Herald, December 19, 1812, tells of the capture of the British brig Atalanta, with a cargo of wines, brandy, and silks. The first issue of Chicago's first newspaper, Chicago Democrat, November 26, 1833, expatiates upon the advantage of a projected railway: "The want of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Illinois River must soon be very sensibly felt, as that section of the State is increasing in population to a degree unparalleled in the history of any country." The first issue of the Alton Observer, published by the Rev. Elijah P. Lovejoy, the famous Abolitionist, bears the date of September 8, 1836. Besides a communication raising the question whether impenitent sinners ought to pray, Viscount Melbourne is informed that if Great Britain faithfully refuses "to place popery side by side with Christianity, there may be no bound to her preservation." (!) Fourteen months later the earnest but ill-advised preacher was shot and killed while defending his property against the attacks of an anti-Abolitionist mob.

Full of information as it is, this historical introduction is but a promise of a more exhaustive treatment of the subject which will appear at a later day. We shall welcome it.

In compiling the present work the towns of the State are taken in alphabetical order, from Abingdon to Young America. Three elaborate indexes are given. One is to the newspapers by title, the second is to the names of proprietors, publishers, and editors, and the third is to the counties in which the publications were issued. * * *

A Guide to Great Cities for Young Travelers and Others. Northwestern Europe. By ESTHER SINGLETON. New York: The Baker and Taylor Company.

A Guidé to Great Cities for Young Travelers and Others. Western Europe. By ESTHER SINGLETON. New York: The Baker and Taylor Company.

These are two volumes in "The Guide" series of travel books. The first volume takes us on a sightseeing trip through ten important centers of wealth, commerce and art, such as London, Hamburg and Antwerp, and the much less known cities of Copenhagen, Stockholm and Christiania.

France, Spain and Portugal are drawn upon for the matter of the second volume, which conducts us through sixteen cities. Paris and Lyons, of course, are there, and others less frequently visited, as Blois and Tours.

Besides the lively descriptions and excellent half-tone illustrations, we are treated to many historical side lights in connection with the palaces and monuments to which our clever cicerone leads us. Young travelers who look forward to a European trip and stay-at-home travelers, who can indulge only in a trip on the wings of fancy, will find much to interest them in these pleasant and chatty volumes.

Miss Singleton quotes freely from tourists who have preceded her. We may be permitted one little word of regret at the unfortunate choice which she made when speaking of the great Lisbon earthquake. That people, when worked up to a high pitch of excitement, may indulge in wild extravagances of conduct is familiar to all who have been present at even such a simple, every-day occurrence as a hotly contested baseball game. Is it strange or unreasonable to suppose that, in the awful terror of the earthquake, the religious sensibilities of the smitten people should have been manifested in ways not known in calmer moments? The wild struggles of a drowning man may be of no avail, but we should not like to be safe on shore and mock him. Wouldn't that seem somewhat heartless? * * *

Les Pèlerinages au Mont St. Michel. Par ETIENNE DUPONT. Paris: Vic et Arnat.

This little paper-bound production is one of the delightful kind of brochures that a booklover, browsing in libraries, cannot help putting together. We have all heard stories without end of the famous shrine of St. Michel, its origin, its architecture, its history, etc., but as everything else seems to be preempted, M. Dupont tells us about the roads the pilgrims took in wending their way from the north and the south and the east to pray at its altars. They did not come from the west, for there was nothing but the wild ocean in that direction. Incidentally, we find descriptions of the leproseries and maladreries that were built in the neighborhood for lepers and the general sick, for many of the devout people who journey laboriously to La Merveille, as St. Michel was called, did so for the relief of their own or others' physical as well as spiritual ills. The story of the famous bells which once hung in its now deserted towers will also interest the seeker after odd things in literature, even if he finds the account classified as a contribution to the chalcographie michelienne. They were very useful, those bells, as they boomed out in the skies above when the pilgrims were groping their way through the impenetrable fogs that often settled upon the far-reaching sands, bewildering enough of themselves, for they were often quicksands, and shifted frequently, swept, as they were, by the sudden rush of the incoming tide of the ocean.

There is an illuminating chapter on weights and measures also, that shows us how human they were in those days, for the monks had to have a commission established to prevent the cheating of the pilgrims by the hucksters who erected their stalls around the great enclosure, or the innkeepers who swindled their guests.

St. Michel is almost deserted now; there are no sentinels on its ramparts and towers; no monks in its cloisters; and its once valuable library was tossed to the wind as long ago as the time of the French Revolution. But because of the desolation it is a pleasure, even if a sad one, to turn back again to the glories which crowned it from the seventh to the nineteenth century. * * *

The Animal World. By F. W. GAMBLE, F.R.S., Professor of Zoology in the University of Birmingham. Introduction by Sir Oliver Lodge, F.R.S. New York: Henry Holt & Co. 75 cents net; by mail, 82 cents.

This is one of the volumes of the "Home University Library," in which "subjects of timely importance are treated by men of world-wide reputation." It is not a child's book, filled with pretty pictures and abounding with anecdotes; but it gives "the information which, in a general way, every educated person would wish to possess." Passing over the specious and fanciful theory which underlies the work, one may obtain a vast deal of knowledge of the animal creation by reading the chapters on the structure and classification of animals, their quest of food, their senses, the way they breathe, and their care for their young. About forty engravings and a bibliography and a glossary-index (this might be made more complete) are included in the work.

A Compendium of Catechetical Instruction. Edited by REV. JOHN HOGAN, Vice-Rector, Irish College, Rome. New York: Benziger Bros.

Father Hogan, indeed, calls his work a "compendium," but it consists of two tall volumes of more than two hundred and fifty pages each. Yet even in these big books the editor does not undertake to cover the entire field of Christian catechetics. In the first volume Father Hogan treats only of prayer, with an explanation of the "Our Father" and the "Hail Mary," while the second he devotes to an explanation of the virtues and vices. Many pages from the "Roman Catechism" and from "The Catechism of Pius X" are embodied in the book, and are followed by solid and thorough instructions which will make the work of great practical value to the Sunday School teacher of advanced classes, or to the pulpit expounder of Christian Doctrine.

From the Christian Press Association, New York, a third edition comes of Father Walworth's "Early Ritualism in America," which first appeared in the pages of the Catholic World. That part of the book giving the letters and doings of a group of young Puseyites on this side the water, whom the Oxford Movement eventually cast into the Church, is particularly interesting. Edgar P. Wadhams, one of these men, became the first Bishop of Ogdensburg; James A. McMaster, another, lived to be the famous editor of the Freeman's Journal, and a third is the author of this book. In the preface Bishop Gabriels pays a warm tribute to his predecessor in the see of Ogdensburg and to Father Walworth, and announces that whatever profits the author reaps from the sale of the book are to go to preserving the faith of the Catholic Mohawk Indians in Northern New York and for converting the remnants of other Iroquois tribes that are there.

When the teaching of Christian Doctrine is the theme, the name of Father Howe is one to conjure with. And now a sixth edition of his admirable "Catechist" is out from R. & T. Washbourne's publishing house. The chief changes in this new catechism of catechisms are improvements in presentation and in conciseness. It is a great pity that these two excellent volumes are still sold at so prohibitive a price. It would seem that a sixth edition could be gotten out for less than $3.80 without bringing the wolves about the publishers' door.

Macaulay, in his characteristic manner, says of Father Petre, the Jesuit privy counsellor of James II: "Of all the evil counsellors that had access to the royal ear, he bore perhaps the largest part in the ruin of the house of Stuart." But Father Pollen, writing in the Month for August, has little trouble in proving that this sweeping assertion is a great exaggeration. For Father Petre's contemporaries have remarkably little to say about his influence over the king. His doings are scarcely mentioned in ambassadors' letters, and there is not a single document in the State archives bearing the Jesuit's name. Having no ambition whatever to be a privy councillor, but being constrained to accept the office, he apparently did very little counselling. He had indeed a share in causing James' fall, in as much as "his presence at the council board was intensely irritating to the Protestant party and contributed considerably to the unpopularity, and by consequence to the downfall of the king." But of Father Petre's precipitating the catastrophe by his evil council there is absolutely no evidence. The king indeed, while in exile in France, is reported to have said: "Had I followed Father Petre's advice I never would have lost my throne."

Mr. Joachim M. Cullen is, a zealous Catholic lawyer of Buenos Aires who has compiled in "The Biblical Book" a collection of meditations and prayers entirely made up of the very words of Holy Writ. This neat little book, which is a translation from the second Spanish edition, is dedicated "to all English-speaking Christians, both Catholic and Protestant," and has as a frontispiece the facsimile of a letter of approbation from the Holy Father himself. The book is issued from the Westminster Press, Harrow Road, London.

As its name indicates, "Epitome Theologiæ Moralis per Definitiones et Divisiones" is a handy index of the field of moral Theology. Compiled by the Rev. Charles Telch, a professor of the Pontifical College, Josephinum, Columbus, Ohio, the book is slender enough to slip into the pocket, yet full and clear enough to bring comfort to a perplexed confessor. It sells for fifty cents.

EDUCATION

In October, 1909, an editorial reference was made in AMERICA to a paper published a short time before by the President of Clark University, G. Stanley Hall, in which the attempt was made to establish the possibility of moral education without religion. Every observer sees that, with a growing vagueness in religion, morality is growing more unsettled, and many conclude that when the former vanishes the latter will vanish with it. President Hall sought to reassure these. We held at the time that his argument was not convincing. We had no thought, however, that Clark's President would acknowledge the lack of logic in his own argument and come out as plainly as he has in advocating the need of religion in education. In an extended review of the public school system, which appeared in the New York Times, August 19, little more than two years after the pronouncement criticized in AMERICA, President Hall has this to say: "Protestant though I am, I believe that, with the young, morality needs religious reinforcement, and in this general proposition I believe the Catholics are right, and that schools should not to be so secularized as to become godless."

* * *

Two years ago Dr. Hall went abroad for his proof as far as Japan. Moral education without religion, he then argued, succeeds in Japan; therefore it can succeed in America. It was the inconclusiveness of such reasoning that our editorial attacked. "Supposing for a moment that Japanese education is unreligious and that it results in morality," we said then, "one may not ignore the fact that our children are Christian, living in a civilization established on Christianity, and permeated with moral principles drawn from the Christian religion, while the Japanese are nothing of the sort." But we denied further that education in Japan is unreligious. How wide of the truth is the statement that the Japanese are an unreligious people is strongly emphasized in the series of letters on Japan and its attitude to Christianity which appeared in AMERICA early this year.

* * *

In the Times paper, Dr. Hall is frank enough to abandon his contention and to admit that in Japan, aye, and in France, too, where the experiment of education without religion is being tried with disastrous results, the attempt to train morally without a religious environment is impracticable. "I do not forget," he says, "that France and Japan are experimenting on just this line. But both of these countries have been driven to this step by political and other exigencies, as indeed we were in the day of intense denominational spirit when our schools were divorced from church influences. Moreover, France and Japan realize the gravity of the problem and are doing everything in their power to make civic life and public service and welfare a religion."

* * *

It would, perhaps, be expecting too much from Dr. Hall, in his recent change of heart, to look for some word of condemnation of these "political and other exigencies" that have "driven France" to experiment with a system which is doing so much to destroy every evidence of religious life in that nation. But surely we have a right to something better in the way of the "religious reinforcement" he advocates than that which Clark's President offers us. "All studies show that, in our rapidly increasing urban life, the temptations to which the young are exposed are very grave, and that boys need to be safeguarded by being told a few plain truths about their own bodies, the dangers of disease, and girls about the fatal tendencies of granting liberties." It should be scarcely necessary to remind Dr. Hall that his "few plain truths" will have little effective force in safeguarding the youth of the land from the evils he dreads, unless teachers and pupils alike find the last reason of the lessons suggesting them in the commandments formally imposed upon mankind by God, who, as St. Paul tells us, is the rewarder of men according to their works.

The Times article will prove interesting to a wide circle of readers because of other singularly frank statements made in it. It is not often that a hide-bound defender of the American state system of education permits himself to affirm: "Vast as are the sums of money we expend and excellent as are the buildings, elaborate as is the organization and numerous as is the personnel of the teaching corps, our schools cannot be called up to the standard of efficiency they should attain." Nay, he believes there is a growing consensus of opinion, among those competent to judge, that the public school system "has not kept pace with the progress of the age or of the country, so that it is, relatively, falling behind and does not meet our needs as well as the school system of 100 years ago did."

Dr. Hall is led to make this avowal by the study of what he claims to be "admitted shortcomings of the present system." One does not necessarily accept the contentions of Clark's President, still it will be informing briefly to glance at these admitted shortcomings. As first of these the latest critic of the system counts "the feminization of the teaching corps." This is one reason, says Dr. Hall, why boys drop out in the last grammar grade and especially in the upper high school grades. "Three-fourths," he tells us, "and in some States nine-tenths (and in the grammar grades the vast and overwhelming majority) of all teachers are women." This condition may pass in the kindergarten and perhaps in the primary grades, he continues, "but that so many children finish the schooling that the law requires without ever having come once in contact with a male teacher is a grave defect."

* * *

A lack of professional training and much waste of energy in breaking in fresh teachers are evils coincident with this feminization of the teaching corps, according to Dr. Hall. As a matter of fact, he asserts, perhaps one-fifth of the entire nearly half-million teachers of the country change every year, and go into some other vocation or marry, and their places are filled by raw recruits. "Women teachers," contends Dr. Hall, "who marry usually withdraw, and probably few of their sex who enter the vocation would not feel condemned if they knew when they enter they must spend the best years of their life in the business." One wonders whether the critic recognized the strong argument his contention implies of efficiency of work in Catholic parochial schools, where most of the teaching corps have chosen the profession as a life task, and have vowed perpetual service in a career they accept as admirably suited to their purpose to give their lives to the spread of God's great glory.

* * *

Another serious defect in the present American public school system Dr. Hall finds in the low average of the duration of school attendance by all of the children of the land. Statistics show that the average child drops out of the school course somewhere before the end of the sixth grade, which fact makes the average duration of school attendance not quite six years. Again the number of weeks per year which school keeps in this country averages less than in the best countries of Europe. "The Summer vacation is so long that much time in the Fall is spent in reaching the point where the pupils left off in the Spring." Finally, as a finishing touch to a detail that few will deny to be a serious detriment to school efficiency, Dr. Hall refers to the large number of absences on the part of those enrolled, and the large per cent. of children of school age in many States who are not even enrolled.

There is criticism, too, of the methods and appliances of teaching, in which we are, as a country, in Dr. Hall's opinion, "woefully behind the best that is attained in other lands." Our school rooms are generally almost bare of necessary equipment and school apparatus, which, if it is good, "immensely eases the strain of comprehension, facilitates memory and generates interest." Worse than this, he contends that, instead of really teaching, our American teachers set lessons and hear recitations. "We are the greatest consumers of text-books, and these are the most costly in the world, but the best foreign teachers wish themselves to be the source of knowledge, and impart it to the children by conversational methods." In this connection Clark's President has a word to say regarding the elaborate system of marks and gradings that has developed in public school management. And every teacher worthy of the name will say amen to Dr. Hall's characterization of it as "one of the disheartening and nerve-racking, not to say degrading duties which American superintendents, especially in large cities, require teachers to do."

What Dr. Hall has to say regarding the lack of vocational training in our public schools is interesting, but not all teachers will agree with the contention that "there is no such thing as 'general culture' or the development of power, but that all training must be more or less specific." Nor is this a permissible conclusion from the principle which psychologists are quoted as affirming: "An education that does not make children more effective for their future occupations is dangerous." There is such a thing as "general culture," or the general opening up of a child's faculties in preparation for future effort, and the wise experience of the world's best teachers is against specializing before this will have been done.

* * *

We cannot bring ourselves to agree with Dr. Hall's insistent cry for a wider expansion of what he terms "hygienic" instruction in our schools. As AMERICA said, in a recent editorial: "In this matter there should be instruction, of course, but instruction by prudent, pure-minded and competent men and women, the parents and teachers who are responsible to God for the care of youth; devoted guardians who will be ever watchful over their charges, who will wisely choose their time and shape their language so that in the effort to preserve they may not poison."

MUSIC

OFFICIAL CATHOLIC HYMNALS.

In the issue of AMERICA for August 12, Mr. James P. Dunn, organist of St. Patrick's Church, Jersey City, pleads for an official Catholic Hymnal as an efficient means by which to advance vocal instruction in our schools and, especially, congregational singing in our churches. In the course of this article Mr. Dunn says: "It is true that there are in existence several hymnals which have done yeoman's service, notably the Christian Brothers' and St. Basil's Hymnals; but most of these hymnals are out of date, oft-times unmusical in arrangement, and their sins of omission many. For instance, the Christian Brothers' Hymnal does not contain the tune to which Tantum Ergo is usually sung, and the harmony is in most cases three part and therefore ineffective."

From this we are led to infer that the writer is not acquainted with the Roman Hymnal, compiled by Rev. J. B. Young, S.J., and published in 1884, nor with "Psallite," by Fathers Roesler and Bonvin, S.J., recently revised and enlarged and issued under the title of "Hosanna"; nor yet with the "Laudate Pueri," of which the Sisters of Notre Dame, of Cleveland, hold the copyright, not to mention several smaller collections prepared by order of individual bishops and official in their respective dioceses. All these books follow the liturgical year, and fulfill every devotional and artistic requirement. If there be a few melodies in any of these collections lacking in virility and dignity, or a verse and stanza here and there wanting in smoothness, there are so many hymns for any given occasion that sufficient variety is furnished to satisfy any legitimate taste.

One or other of these collections is doing "yeoman's service" in schools and churches throughout the land, inculcating sound taste, aiding devotion and preparing the soil for liturgical music wherever the texts and melodies are properly performed. With some additions or modifications any of these books could be made available as an official hymn-book, the creation of which is admittedly a desideratum. As for "St. Basil's Hymnal," the "Christian Brothers' Hymnal," and many other collections of the same calibre, it is a misfortune that they were ever published and permitted to circulate.

If we except a few hymns which are unobjectionable, these books have done "yeoman's service" in vitiating, sentimentalizing and generally lowering the taste of those who have been so unfortunate as to come under their influence. It is these hymnals which, perhaps more than any other agency, are responsible for the existence of musical conditions such as are reported by "Gregorian" in the same number of AMERICA. That such books, whose utter musical worthlessness have been held up to the scorn of European musicians by Rev. Father Habets, O.M.I. (Fliegende Blätter für Kirchen-musik, No. 5, 1908, Ratisbon), and Dom Lucien David, secretary to Dom Pothier (Revue du Chant Grégorien, Nov.-Dec., 1910, Grenoble), should continue in use in so many places is incredible.

But what is still more astonishing is the fact that in the face of the injunction of Pius X that sacred music "must be true art, for otherwise it will be impossible for it to exercise on the minds of those listening to it that efficacy which the Church aims at attaining in admitting into her liturgy the art of musical sounds" ("Motu proprio," Art. I, paragraph 2), collections at least as bad as those mentioned above continue to come into existence, and that from sources whence we have every right to expect a better example.

If we may not hope for "a more general and thorough musical education and a more serious attitude towards music as an art" (J. B. W., in AMERICA for Aug. 19), which would help those in authority and those who, by their calling, are in a position to influence the faithful for good or ill to understand the nature of the matter in hand and act accordingly, is it too much to expect that they heed the Vicar of Christ, who, "with the fullness of Apostolic authority," and with unmistakable clearness, gives us in his "Motu proprio" of Nov. 22, 1903, "a juridical code of sacred music"?

ECONOMICS

A fortnight ago we pointed out some of the economic absurdities involved in the gambling on future sunshine, or rain, or frost, which go by the name of operations of the produce exchange. Nevertheless the produce exchanges are, we believe, still open, and we have not heard of a single gambler having dismissed his clerk, stenographer and office-boy, or renounced his share in one or more of the three, and closed his office, or his desk, and sold his seat in the exchange, or vacated his place on the curb, to go west to help to gather in what is left of a harvest that has been destroyed and resuscitated half a dozen times by crop inspectors. "No, sir. I'm making money; and I don't propose to quit."

There lives in Germany a certain Count Von Hoensbroech. He was once a Jesuit. What he is now we do not know. He bobs up every now and then to attack the Society to which he owes the "scholarly training" the London Times finds so evident in him. Some years ago he tried to fasten on it the old calumny that "the end justifies the means" is one of its fundamental moral principles; and, in spite of his peculiar advantages, failed ignominiously. He went into hiding for a time; but he now appears again with a history of his life as a Jesuit, in which he tells of the dissimulation characteristic of the Order. He will probably find himself in logical difficulties again.

In the meantime we would point out that the characteristic of modern society is not so much dissimulation, as falsehood. Bad things are given good names; so that men tell fibs without knowing it, as is the case with our wheat gambler. He sees his balance in his bank-book growing day by day and does not dream he is saying anything but the truth. Yet he is making nothing. He is gaining money, and of this the correlative is that somebody is losing it. But the transfer of money from pocket to pocket, or of figures from bank-book to bank-book are as profitless economically as the operations of the race-track and the gaming table.

No less false are the expressions, familiar from our school days: "Pennsylvania produces coal"; "California produces oil."

Pennsylvania no more produces coal than it produces the cannon balls that are dug up on the field of Gettysburg; nor does California produce oil, any more than it produced the Table Mountain skull. The former produces corn and the latter oranges. But as for coal and oil, Pennsylvania contains the former, and California contains the latter. Their inhabitants extract the coal and the oil; but, take what thought they will, they cannot add a pound or a pint to the store of either.

"Production" is most properly used in reference to the fruits the earth gives in response to human toil, and to the useful modifications of those fruits, the result of man's ingenuity and skill. When such toil, ingenuity and skill are employed as fully as possible to produce the largest results for all, the economic conditions of society may be considered satisfactory. Virgil, who was wiser in these matters than they think in these days when the classics are despised, tells us:

"Laudato ingentia rura;

Exiguum colito."

Which means: "Sing, if you will, with Rudyard Kipling the praises of 'the league-long furrow,' but for farming profitable to yourself and to the world at large, be content with a quarter section." You will find more useful employment for yourself and your stalwart sons in its comparatively narrow fields, and for your wife and comely daughters in its milking shed and dairy, than if you had a thousand acres farmed with machinery until the land is worn out, while your sons are gambling in the produce exchange and your daughters gadding from matinees to golf-links.

SCIENCE

The Ceylon Catholic Messenger reports that the Rev. A. L. Cortie, S.J., who was sent to the Tonga Islands by the British Government to take observations on the total eclipse of the sun, left Colombo, Ceylon, the last week of June, on board the Orontes, on his way back to England.

"The eclipse was a total one and visible in the remote group of Western Pacific islands known formerly as the Friendly Islands and now as the Tonga Group, all clustering within the 20th and 23d degrees of south latitude. The Tongas are a regular kingdom, under British protection, and the king—His Majesty George Tubou II—is a very big and mighty potentate. So much so that when war broke out between Russia and Japan, he restored tranquillity in the various Chancelleries of the world by volunteering the spontaneous announcement that, after careful consideration, he had decided to preserve strict neutrality!

"The people are as sunny in their dispositions as their islands are in position, and Father Cortie, who is taking many interesting photographs of the inhabitants to Europe, was greatly captivated by their cheery good humor and their bright, pleasant ways. The eclipse was observed in Vavau, one of the Tongas, and lasted just 3½ minutes—of which 2 minutes were lost in a cloud and the remaining 1½ minutes were alone utilized in taking observations. Father Cortie and Brother McKeon went out from Sydney by H. M. S. Encounter, which was placed at their disposal, the sailors assisting in putting up the various instruments, while the officers helped in the observations. The island climate is moist and humid, and the atmosphere is so charged with moisture that directly the moon approached the sun's disc the cool aqueous vapor under the shadow soon cohered into cloud and rendered observations difficult just over the obscured area.

"Father Cortie had two instruments for direct photographs of the corona. One of them had a 20 feet focal length and 4 inches aperture, while the other has 33 feet focal length and the same aperture. The long focal length was useful in taking the inner corona, in order to give details, while the smaller focal length gave bright pictures of the extension of the whole corona. Father Cortie also had several spectroscopes, one of them fitted with an ordinary face, while the other was fitted with quartz, which alone captured the ultraviolet rays. Father Cortie had specially prepared plates to enable him to take the red end of the spectrum, which has never yet been photographed, while, of course, he also took photos of the ordinary spectrum.

"The corona seen on the 29th of April was of the ordinary minimum type, with a long extension in the equatorial regions and a very bright inner corona. The view was unfortunately impeded during two minutes of the eclipse by the clouds, and even afterwards fleecy clouds intervened in the line of vision. One or two other parties—for there were several at work—were more fortunate and some of them had a much longer spell of clear vision. The observations will be duly reported by Father Cortie, and those interested in them will doubtless study the results. The general reader will be interested in the announcement that Father Cortie was very successful in capturing good photos of the end of the spectrum, showing the hydrogen rays, which had never before been photographed. There was no particularly remarkable display of 'streamers.' The photographs which Father Cortie showed disclose two large streamers, one of which extended two diameters, which would mean nearly two million miles, while the other was observed through the clouds and can only be described as a long streamer towards the east. They were of the same type as those seen in 1878, 1889 and 1900."

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The Laymen's League for Retreats and Social Studies announces the opening of the new house of retreats, "Mount Manresa," at Fort Wadsworth, Staten Island, on Friday, September 8, when the organizers of the retreat movement and the officers and directors of the Laymen's League will commence the first retreat for men ever made in the United States in a house exclusively devoted to that purpose.

The Very Rev. Provincial of the Society of Jesus, Father Joseph Hanselman, S.J., will be present at the opening exercises of the retreat, which will be given by the League's spiritual director, the Rev. T. J. Shealy, S.J. "Mount Manresa" will accommodate over forty men at a time, and many applications for retreats in September and October have been received already.

Under date of July 10, the Holy Father has sent an apostolic letter to the hierarchy of Canada, in which he congratulates them on the recent demonstrations of Catholic Faith in the decrees of their First Plenary Council, which he approves, and in the Montreal Eucharistic Congress. He counsels harmony of thought and action between the races, and adds:

"Then, again, unceasingly admonish all Catholics to show themselves such, not privately alone, but publicly as well. For that to which We are devoting Our labors, to restore, as far as possible, all things in Christ, may not be realized, unless the spirit of Christ pervade public life in all its phases, as well as the conduct of individuals and the family circle.

"Since to this end it is absolutely necessary that the precepts of Christian wisdom be generally known, it will be incumbent upon you, Venerable Brothers, and upon all who are entrusted with the cure of souls, to watch with care that the teaching of religion be never wanting in elementary schools, but that it be given daily at fixed hours and in such manner that the children may drink in not only genuine knowledge but sincere love of the Church, their Mother, and of the heavenly doctrines which she teaches. And in Catholic high schools and colleges the youth should receive still higher training in the study of religion, so that they may in after life associate with their non-Catholic fellow-citizens without spiritual danger, and by reasoning with them be able to dispel from their minds prejudiced opinions which keep out the light of evangelical wisdom."

Right Rev. John E. Gunn, S.M., D.D., was consecrated Bishop of Natchez, by Archbishop Blenk, in the Church of the Sacred Heart, Atlanta, Ga., on August 29. Bishop Gunn was born in County Tyrone, Ireland, in 1863, and entered the Marist Congregation at Dundalk. He made his studies in Rome, where he received his D.D. For a term he taught in Ireland and France, and in 1892 was appointed Professor of Moral Theology at the Marist Seminary in Washington. Six years later he founded a new parish in Atlanta, Georgia, and built a church, also a collegiate school for boys and a high school for girls. His brother, the Rev. Edward Gunn, S.M., was present at the consecration as the delegate from Ireland representing the Irish chapter of the Marist Congregation.

Owing to ill-health, Bishop James Trobec of the Diocese of St. Cloud has resigned that see. He was born in Austria, July 10, 1838, ordained priest in St. Paul, Minn., September 8, 1865, and consecrated Bishop of St. Cloud, September 21, 1897.

Nearly two hundred deaf mutes and a few who could neither hear nor see attended Mass, received Holy Communion and heard a sermon by the Rev. Michael R. McCarthy, S.J., on August 20, in the College chapel of St. Francis Xavier, New York City on Ephpheta Sunday, the patronal feast for the deaf, to which privileges and indulgences were attached by Pope Pius X.

Father McCarthy is the pastor of the New York deaf mission. After the Mass he preached a sermon on the gospel of the day, which told of the cure by Our Lord of the man that was deaf and dumb. As he spoke he used the sign language, which is taught along with the "oral system" to the deaf in St. Joseph's School for Deaf Mutes at Fordham. Many of those in the front pews interpreted the message by reading the lips of the priest. The sign language, however, is the most practical for use in speaking to large assemblies.

Somewhere in the centre of the chapel sat Miss Katherine Megur, twenty-four years old, who has never been able to hear or to see. When she was ten years old she was taken to St. Joseph's. To-day she uses a typewriter, makes dresses and helps her mother to do the cooking. Sitting by her side was Miss Mary Kennedy, principal of St. Joseph's. The girl's right hand rested in Miss Kennedy's right, and as the priest spoke the teacher's fingers passed in rhythmic motion over the blind mute's hand. The girl's lips moved slightly as she caught the message, and her face seemed to radiate a happy intelligence that could not find expression through her sightless eyes.

The Most Rev. Henry Moeller, Archbishop of Cincinnati, in his petition to the Pope for indulgences and privileges for Ephpheta Sunday said there were 89,287 deaf mutes in the United States, and of this number about 17,000 were of Catholic origin. Many of these have lost the Faith because they are so scattered throughout the country and there are so few priests capable of giving them catechistic instruction in the sign language. Ephpheta Sunday is the eleventh Sunday after Pentecost, and has been observed for six years in the United States in connection with special services for the deaf and dumb.

In the congregation of deaf mutes at St. Francis Xavier's on Ephpheta Sunday were men and women from many walks of life, including a banker, an editor, and prosperous farmers from the adjacent districts. After the service a breakfast was served, and the congregation then went to St. Joseph's School, at Fordham, where the remainder of the day was spent on the playgrounds of the asylum in Bathgate avenue. The Fordham institution takes care of girls only. The boys are taught at Westchester. Most of the married deaf mutes brought their children with them, and without exception the children could both hear and talk. At five o'clock supper was served, after which Father McCarthy, in the sign language, told his flock that he had performed thirty-five marriages since becoming pastor to the deaf in New York, and of the children born to these couples not one was deficient in hearing. He invited everyone to attend Mass at St. Xavier's whenever it was possible.

Father McCarthy devotes himself exclusively to the work among deaf mutes, and is endeavoring to make more general the observation of Ephpheta Sunday.

"We should have a church here," he says, "where the afflicted can go and participate in every part of the service. In Manhattan and Brooklyn alone there are twelve hundred deaf mutes, and they would be wonderfully benefitted by such an institution. Progress in such a project is necessarily slow, but I believe that during the last year it has been sure. I expect cooperation in this plan from my ecclesiastical superiors."

Father McCarthy is endeavoring to establish a bureau of employment for the afflicted in New York.

At St. Joseph's and at Westchester the girls and boys receive a common school education, along with their training in the sign language and in "lip reading." They are also taught carpentry, tailoring, art work, shoemaking and printing.

A similar service was held the same day in Holy Family Church, Chicago, where during the Mass a sermon in sign and oral language was preached by Rev. F. A. Moeller, S.J., chaplain of the Ephpheta Mission for the Deaf. After Mass breakfast was served in the Sodality Hall by members of the Young Ladies' Sodality. The rest of the day was spent on the grounds of the Ephpheta School for the Deaf, corner of 40th and Belmont avenues. There are over 700 Catholic deaf in Chicago.

The Action Populaire, which has done good work in France and elsewhere, is about to publish an international Catholic guide-book for the purpose of enabling Catholics to co-operate more effectively.

OBITUARY

Old-timers in Chicago, who recall the "prairie" days of that city, mourn the death of Rev. Hugh McGuire, in the early 70's a courageous and generous worker in the building up of the Church's influence in the growing West Side district, and later, for twenty-eight years, irremovable rector at the great St. James' Church on the South Side.

Father McGuire was born in the County Sligo, Ireland, sixty-six years ago. He there made his classical studies at the diocesan college of Ballina, and when yet a young man emigrated to America. He took up his ecclesiastical studies in the now little remembered Chicago Seminary of St. Mary's-of-the-Lake, and, when that institution was closed, he continued and completed them at the Grand Seminary in Montreal, Canada.

Ordained in Montreal forty years ago, Father McGuire's first appointment was to St. John's Church in Chicago, in which city his priestly career ran on to the end. Two short years of service as curate with Father John Waldron proved his worth and capacity, and Bishop Foley selected him to organize the parish of St. Pius on the West Side. The projected parish, now the heart of the most congested part of the Western metropolis, was then a straggling prairie district, served by the Jesuit Fathers of the Holy Family, in those days reckoned the most extensive regular parish in the world. In this field the intense earnestness and seriousness of mind, the inflexible and indomitable will and the unflagging and unwearying industry of the young priest speedily wrought wonders.

Twelve years later he became irremovable rector of St. James', which parish during his administration, came to be recognized as the leading Catholic community of the wealthy South Side district in Chicago. Here Father McGuire won his reputation as an earnest friend of Catholic Education. The excellently equipped St. James' High School, which he founded and largely maintained, will be his best monument in the city in which he lived and labored during so many years.

Father McGuire suffered a stroke of paralysis a little over a year ago, from which he never fully recovered. Since that attack he had not been able to say Mass, but his physicians and friends, believing that with care his strong constitution would favor a recovery, persuaded him to undertake a trip to Carlsbad, in Germany, for the recuperation of his shattered strength. God ordained otherwise. He died Sunday morning, August 13, at Hamburg, where he was forced to stop on account of a severe attack of illness which he suffered on shipboard while crossing the ocean.

The Rev. Joseph M. Horning, S.J., well known in the Middle West as the President of Sacred Heart College, Prairie du Chien, Wis., passed away on August 4. His unexpected and premature demise, at the early age of thirty-nine, came as a severe shock to the members of his religious community and will be mourned by a host of friends at home and abroad. Father Horning was born in Randolph, Ohio, November 28, 1871. After graduation at St. Ignatius College, Cleveland, Ohio, he was admitted to St. Mary's Seminary in that city. On completing the third year of his seminary course, he entered the Jesuit novitiate at Prairie du Chien, in 1895. Later he taught at Canisius College, Buffalo, and studied theology at Valkenburg, Holland, where he was ordained in 1906. Father Horning passed the remaining years of his active life at Prairie du Chien, first as vice-president, and from 1909 as president of Sacred Heart College. It was largely through his efforts that the college over which he presided witnessed a remarkable growth in numbers and become more widely known as an efficient institution of learning. Scholarship, executive ability and prudent conservatism were quickened and supported in him by unaffected humility, kindness and an all-embracing charity.

CHRONICLE

President Taft Opens Campaign.—In an address delivered in Hamilton, Mass., August 26, the President unexpectedly opened the fight over the tariff issue for the approaching campaign. He spoke before a comparatively small gathering of Republicans at the meeting of the Essex County Republican Club, but the importance of his utterance made the occasion a notable one. Mr. Taft made known his gratification that he had been able to show how Democrats govern; he declared that public interest had never been treated so lightheartedly or with such ignorance of legislative effect as in the last Congress, and he expressed his hope that the country will have had enough of the Democratic party by 1912. The President urged that the national issue of the tariff be made a prominent question in the discussions preceding the approaching election in the State and developed before his audience his entire plea for support upon this topic. "Reprehensible" politics, said Mr. Taft, had been played in the preparation of the three bills which had received his veto during the last session, and in the scoring which he gave to the framers of these bills he linked the names of the Democrats and the Senate insurgents. Explaining that Mr. Underwood and Mr. La Follette had in the past been one with himself in urging scientific information upon which to base future tariff legislation, he rebuked their present opposition to the Tariff Board as a bit of political strategy, which he claimed would be properly resented by the voters at the next election. The Tariff Board which Mr. Underwood, speaking a few nights before in New York, had referred to as "Clerks," Mr. Taft said was the same in personnel as would have been the statutory tariff commission which he, the President, had requested Congress to establish to study the tariff, and was just as independent.

South, Negro's Hope.—On August 29 President Taft presided at a meeting called in the interest of Hampton Institute. In the course of an address he took occasion to affirm his opinion that "the negro ought to come, and is coming more and more, under the guardianship of the South." He declared he did not wish to curb or criticise "Northern generosity" toward the negro, and negro education, but added, "those of us who study the question know that the hope of the negro is in his white neighbor in the South." The President's speech was made in introducing Governor Mann of Virginia, who attended the meeting as the representative of the Commonwealth under whose law the Hampton Institute has prospered and done that good work which Mr. Taft viewed as pointing the way, perhaps, to the solution of the negro problem.

Speaker Clark Replies to President's Attack.—On the day following these utterances of Mr. Taft, Speaker Clark of the House of Representatives, speaking in Quincy, Ill., replied emphatically to the President's Hamilton address. In a signed interview Mr. Clark accused the President of not stating facts; he declared, too, that that if the existing Tariff Board is to be used as a pretext for delaying tariff revision downward, the Democrats will cut off its supplies. "The President and I are personal friends," continued the Speaker; "he has done me many kindnesses, and I have tried to repay them as far as opportunity has served. He is, as a rule, a most amiable gentleman, but at the time he seems to have been in a bad temper, because he sees defeat staring him in the face. I would say nothing unkind about him, but I cannot and will not permit his personal strictures and bad misstatements of historical facts to go unchallenged. The President's criticism of Mr. Underwood and myself, which is essentially a criticism of all Democrats in the House and Senate, because all Democrats stood together, is absolutely uncalled for and is as ungrateful a performance as I can remember; for, if it had not been for the action of the Democrats in the House in both the Sixty-first and Sixty-second Congresses in lining up almost unanimously for reciprocity with Canada, he would have been the most thoroughly discredited and humiliated President since the days of Andrew Johnson."

Great Storm in Charleston.—A hurricane that swept over Charleston, S. C., left seven dead in its track and destroyed $1,500,000 of property. The lower parts of the city were inundated for eighteen hours. At the height of the storm the wind blew at the rate of ninety-four miles an hour. The Carolina coast was strewn with wreckage and six torpedo boats were swept ashore. The Island cotton crop has been destroyed, which means that a disastrous blow has been given to South Carolina industry. Savannah also suffered by the storm. It was cut off from the outer world for two days. A property loss of $300,000 has resulted, but, fortunately, no lives were lost.

Liquor Consumption in the United States.—For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, according to the official figures issued by United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue, R. E. Cabell, the consumption of distilled spirits was 134,600,193 gallons; the consumption of beer during the same period was 1,952,722,381 gallons. These totals represent an increase of over 8,000,000 gallons of whiskey and of over 113,000,000 gallons of beer over the figures of 1910, and break all existing records for liquor sales in this country. The combined increase is 121,049,823 gallons, which represents an increase of 1.3 gallons per capita, making the total per capita consumption of liquors to-day 22.29 gallons. The highest previous consumption of distilled spirits was for the year 1907.

Mexico.—On account of the general feverishness in the country the Government has decided to postpone all festivities connected with Independence Day, September 16.—Some foolish Catholics are protesting in the Liberal press against voting for Madero simply because he is a Freemason. The means that they take to reach the eye of the public shows how important they are.—The breach between Madero and Reyes has become wider, the former promising to publish his grounds for accusing the latter of aiming at another civil war. Reyes protests that he will remain a candidate and will hold his party together, so that it may influence legislation in the Congress, even if he should fail of election.—Spanish residents have appealed to their minister for protection against depredations committed by men under arms.—Mucio Martinez, for many years the despotic Governor of Puebla, has been incarcerated in the capital of his State on a charge of sedition. He appealed, without success, to the Federal Supreme Court for its interference on the ground that his constitutional rights had been violated.—Some of the friends of General Diaz have requested him to return and be a candidate at the presidential election in October, but he has not committed himself in any way to the scheme.—General Reyes is in favor of postponing the election because all the Maderist troops have not been mustered out of service, but the administration insists on the date already appointed.

Canada.—The fight for reciprocity is at fever heat. On August 30 Mr. Borden, the Opposition leader, began his tour of the Eastern townships which is the partially English section of Quebec. Being on the frontiers the inhabitants of these townships, who were formerly loyalists from the American colonies, are deeply interested in the question of reciprocity. On the other hand, Laurier and Felding invaded the home of the Opposition, and on Wednesday, Aug. 30, addressed audiences of 10,000 in Halifax, which Mr. Borden represents. The Governor of Nova Scotia predicts a sweeping victory for the Government. The report just issued by the Canadian Pacific seems to intimate that no fear is to be apprehended if the reciprocity bill is passed, as vast improvements are planned for next year for the purpose of transportation, not north and south, as was predicted by the opponents of reciprocity, but east and west, so the Canadian interests would not be affected.

Great Britain.—It is reported that all military and naval leaves of absence have been cancelled and that activity is unabated in all the royal arsenals. Some alarm has also been taken at the sharp advances in rates for war insurance at Lloyds, but this, it is said, does not necessarily indicate that the Morocco question is causing deeper anxiety now than it did last week. The press is optimistic, but the feeling is not shared by politicians and government officials. It is said that the Foreign Office is very busy with negotiations, and that the Russian Ambassador has been frequently consulted. Nine vessels have been seized on suspicion of being intended for illicit military operations. The belief is widespread that these ships are connected with a royalist Portuguese plot, and that London is the chief centre of activity of Dom Manoel's partisans. The plot is thought to be lavishly financed and that many young Englishmen have been enlisted. Large insurances against losses by a revolution have been taken out by many of the Portuguese aristocracy resident in England.—A feeling of unrest is noted among the coal miners, and a national coal strike is threatened for November or December.—The London Standard accuses Lloyd George of causing havoc to the country by his love of popularity and his ill-advised, chaotic and expensive scheme for settling labor disputes, for old age pensions and insurance. He is denounced as a demagogue on the platform and an empiric in the cabinet.—Father Bernard Vaughan, S.J., has been condemning syndicalism as trades union tyranny, and has having for its object the triumph of the revolutionary spirit of anarchy.

Ireland.—The English railway strikes had but a slight influence on the Irish employees who, with few exceptions, declined to go out, and the interruptions in railway traffic were chiefly due to the cutting off of British connections. Mr. Kelly, Secretary of the Irish Railway Workers said, speaking of the British organization's action: "I don't call it a strike. I call it a Socialistic revolution. Our men refuse to take dictation from any English society. We are opposed to strikes, believing them detrimental to the best interests of the workers; we have no sympathy with the men who have gone out, and decline to leave our posts, as we prefer to have, and find by experience that we can have our grievances settled by constitutional agencies." Mr. Kelly further stated that, as the mouth-piece of the workers, he had been treated fairly by the directorates of the Irish Railway companies. He has at present petitions on behalf of the men before four of them, and has reason to believe that favorable action will be taken. There were some riots in Dublin on the nights of August 21 and 22, but these were started mainly by rowdies who had no connection with the railway workers, and were quickly suppressed by the police, who used only their batons. The disturbances did not hinder the success of the Annual Horse Show in Dublin, which was up to its usual standard. Representatives were present from several foreign governments, and there was a brisk trade in Irish hunters.—The new Liberal organization, which has been launched to further the cause of Irish self-government, is called the Home Rule League, and has been placed under the presidency of Mr. Winston Churchill. There is an uncontradicted report that Mr. Churchill will soon replace Mr. Birrell as Chief Secretary for Ireland. Mr. Birrell is popular in Ireland, but Mr. Churchill is regarded as a stronger man and better equipped to put through a full and satisfactory measure, in view of the success of the South African Bill, of which he had charge.—Sir Newton Moore, Agent-General of Western Australia, said in Cork, that the growth of that colony of 700 per cent. since 1890, when it obtained self-government, illustrated the advantages of Home Rule. Similar pronouncements by the premiers of British colonies have been made a part of the propaganda of the British Home Rule League.—Numerous Irish public bodies passed resolutions of condolence at the death of Cardinal Moran. Mr. Redmond, in cabling the sorrow of the Irish Party, paid a fine tribute to the services of the great Cardinal to the Church and to Ireland, closing with, "A cedar has fallen on Lebanon."

France.—Two processions of women were organized in Brest on August 28 to protest against the high price of food. The women threatened the market men with violence when the police interfered and sent the amazons home. However, the prices came down. Similar disturbances occurred in Lille, Cambrai, Douai, Valenciennes, Bethune, Lens, and even in the village and country places. In the latter farm crops, dairies and vegetable gardens were damaged. Conflicts, of course, ensued between the marauders and the farmers. Each day brings new sensations. On August 30, 1,500 weavers from a suburb of St. Quentin wrecked eighty stores where provisions were kept. The police are unable to cope with the situation.—Paris also is having its bread riots, and the movement is spreading throughout France.—M. Cambon left Paris for Berlin. What terms he proposes to offer Germany for settlement of the Morocco difficulty cannot, of course, be ascertained.

Belgium.—The bishops of Belgium have written a joint letter of congratulation to the bishops of Portugal for their stand against the enemies of the Church, who have despoiled the sacred edifices, expelled the religious and banished some of the illustrious members of the hierarchy.—On August 30 it was announced that the country was in a ferment of preparation all along the frontiers of France and Germany against possible war among the Great Powers, and to prevent any invasion of Belgium territory by the contending parties.

Portugal.—A monarchist who had been detained in a Lisbon prison was visited by a Republican journalist, Senhor Cabedo, and warned against eating the prison fare for fear of poison. The police officer in charge of the establishment gave him the same advice and charitably provided him with food prepared elsewhere.—At Covilha and Penamacor two regiments of reserves laid down their arms and deserted in a body because the colonels had refused them permission to visit their relatives.—The Minister of Justice has announced that two hundred and seventeen priests have accepted Government pensions. There are five thousand priests in Portugal.—The process of making an inventory of Church property in the smaller towns and villages goes on monotonously. When the officials approach the church bell is rung, and the women and children gather in front of edifice and sing the litany; the men hurl stones at the officials; a squad of soldiers appears to disperse the stone-throwers; the officials then continue their work.—The increase in expenditures and the falling off in revenue have caused the public debt to go forward with leaps and bounds. Deputy Abreu, of the Assembly, calculated its increase at the rate of $82 an hour.

Spain.—The general census shows an increase in population of only five per cent. during the last ten years, and this increase is in the large cities. With its nineteen and one-half million inhabitants, Spain is the most sparsely populated country in Europe, being surpassed even by Russia and Greece. A little more than half the country is under cultivation, but this area could be extended immensely if irrigation works were to be undertaken.—During the past year over one hundred and thirty thousand Spaniards emigrated to Argentina. As these were largely from the rural districts their departure means a loss to the farming and stock interests of Spain.—The financial committee of the Eucharistic Congress has turned over to the chief of police of Madrid, for the benefit of the force, the sum of four thousand pesetas, which remained in their hands after meeting all expenses.

Germany.—In answer to the offers made by France in the Moroccan controversy, meetings have been held by the National Liberals throughout the entire German empire. Enthusiastic speeches were delivered and signed petitions drawn up asking the Government to proceed boldly and resolutely, to remain in Morocco at all hazards and to defend its established rights. Especially strong were the resolutions passed at Pomerania and Dresden. There is, nevertheless, a large body which seems satisfied with a compensation in the Congo, insisting, however, upon the need of safeguarding the German interests in Morocco.—Considerable press comment was created by two speeches lately delivered by the Kaiser, which are thought to echo the sentiments of the more warlike factions of the empire. There is, however, no need of reading into them any other meaning than an ardent expression of loyalty and patriotism. One of these was given at a banquet at Schleswig-Holstein, the home of the empress, where he lauded her as a model of German mothers, because she had trained up to a noble manhood six sons, serious-minded and energetic men, who disdained to use the luxuries and pleasures which their rank had placed within their reach, but who devote their entire strength to their duty and their country, all prepared to lay down their lives upon the altar of their Fatherland. The second address was called forth at a banquet of the Hamburg Senate. If he had not mistaken the enthusiasm of the citizens, he said, it seemed to him that they were convinced that the German navy must be increased. "Only thus shall we be certain that no one can dare to call into question our place by right beneath the sun."—The outgoing American Ambassador at Berlin, Dr. David J. Hill, performed his last official function at the dedication of the Washington Steuben memorial, presented by the Congress of the United States to the German Emperor and the German Nation.

Austria-Hungary.—Strong indignation is everywhere expressed against the British Ambassador at the court of Vienna, Sir F. L. Cartwright, who has been accused of certain anonymous articles which appeared in the Vienna Neue Freie Presse, and contained attacks upon Germany, said to be slanderous and incendiary in their nature. Although his friends have represented him as a victim of journalistic indiscretion, his explanations have not been considered entirely satisfactory. The Post desires that if the responsibility for the articles can be traced to him, his recall should be demanded, and that, in case this demand is not acceded to, diplomatic relations with England should be broken off. The Neue Freie Presse is criticized on all sides for publishing the articles.—The Jewish Liberals and the Socialists are busy striving to introduce the Kulturkampf into Austria, but so far with little success. The Social-Democratic party is split into various antagonistic sections: the German, the Czech, and the Polish-Italian factions. Thus the German Socialist supporters of the Jewish leader Adler will not in anywise subscribe to the demands of the Bohemian Socialists under Nemec.—The unveiling of the Franz Joseph memorial was celebrated with great solemnities on August 28. The monument is more than thirty feet high and represents the Emperor in military uniform. The masterpiece was executed by Eugen Boermel at Berlin, and is the gift of German subjects of the Austrian empire.

Italy.—In the town of Verbicaro, in Calabria, the inhabitants rose in revolt against the physicians and Red Cross nurses who were trying to stop the cholera epidemic. The people thought they came to spread the disease. Telegraph and telephone wires were cut, barricades were built, and two members of the Red Cross Society were killed. The Mayor and all his household were murdered, and the City Hall, the Prefecture, the Praetorial Court, the telegraph office, and the Mayor's house were set on fire. There had been 82 cases of cholera in Verbicaro, most of which had resulted fatally. The latest official figures in regard to the cholera in Italy show that there have been 351 cases and 153 deaths in Sicily, 201 cases and 81 deaths in the city and province of Naples, 292 cases and 98 deaths in the province of Caserta, 25 cases and 14 deaths in Rome, 150 cases and 65 deaths in Leghorn city and province, 134 cases and 68 deaths in Genoa city and province, and 534 cases and 180 deaths elsewhere. This is a total of 1,687 cases and 659 deaths.

Switzerland.—The first business session of the Permanent Bureau of Peace was held at Berne on August 3. The ex-Minister of Italy, Luzzatti, was present, as was the ex-Minister of Japan, Yoshiro Sakatani.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Portuguese Archbishop's Dignified Protest

We honor the pages of AMERICA with a translation of the letter which the Most Reverend Manuel Coutinho, Archbishop-Bishop of Guarda, Portugal, addressed on August 8 last to the President of Portugal.

Mr. President:

I read in to-day's newspapers an item, which as is clear from its wording, is official, that "the Government intends to proceed energetically against the Bishop of Guarda for his hostility to the republic." As the item speaks of the whole Government and not of any particular minister, I crave permission to address a few words to your Excellency as President, and through you to the cabinet, not by way of complaint or protest, but simply for the sake of removing possible misunderstanding; and this I deem necessary for the avoiding of confusion later on.

The news contained in the papers did not surprise me, because for a long time back the air has been full of menacing rumors about me, and these were a sign of perverse wills which, sooner or later, would endeavor to gratify their animosity. I have let those threats pass, I have striven to do my duty and I have relied upon justice, which must needs rise above passion and ill-will. And I was not deceived, for ten months have passed by since the establishment of the republic and I have not been called upon to suffer any persecution that was not shared by others.

Is there thought now of pursuing some other plan and of giving color to the rumors which have been so long in circulation about me? I would not be surprised at this new turn, and I would face it with indifference, with that indifference which springs from the consciousness of duty fulfilled and the impossibility of avoiding a disagreeable situation, were it not for one circumstance that is in open conflict with the reality of things.

If the official note had confined itself to saying that "the Government was going to proceed energetically against the Bishop of Guarda," I would remain silent and would not come to molest either your Excellency or the cabinet with these considerations of mine; I would await in peace the unfolding of events and would calmly look forward to that "energetic proceeding," whether it was to be a condemnation pronounced by a decree of the executive power, as befell my venerable colleague of Oporto, or by judicial process in which evidence would be submitted and my defence would be heard, as is done in countries which glory in being free and which enjoy constitutional guarantees. But the official note emphasizes the point that the "energetic proceeding" on the part of the Government is prompted by my "hostility to the republic," and it is this assertion that makes me enter the lists and protest against the charge that is urged against me.

I know, your Excellency, for history is rich in examples of it, that when the mighty wished to rid themselves of a troublesome opponent, the charge of high treason, together with "reasons of State," stood them in good stead, for it exposed him to public execration and warranted them in proceeding against him with all severity; but I am not a troublesome opponent (I am too insignificant for that) nor would the Government over which you so worthily preside think of defiling itself with such proceedings. Rejecting this supposition, therefore, and going back to the charge of hostility to the republic, a charge which is wholly destitute of foundation, it is proper for me to protest against it and not to give any color to it by my silence, for in this case silence would be an indirect confirmation of the suspicion.

My hostility to the republic? Whence does your Excellency or the cabinet draw proofs of it? I have a notion of my mission sufficiently clear to understand that it is far away from the changes of political systems; the excellence of these always hinges upon comparing them with one another, while the nature of the religion of which I am a minister is unchangeable. Thus, as religion does not cleave to political systems, so it is not hostile to them; and I should be a traitor to my religion if I should wish to fasten it to political systems that die or to others that spring up.

Yesterday the monarchical system was in force, and the Church lived with it as she lives in so many other countries. To-day do the people want a republic? That the Church may continue to subsist, she has no need to change her dogmas or her moral law. I would be insane to contend against that form of government which the nation considers most suitable; it is my duty to defer to it and, as far as possible, to cooperate with it for the common good. Can he who thinks thus and conforms his actions to this principle be justly accused of "hostility to the republic?" My conscience tells me no.

But I know perfectly well the source of the charge made against me in the official note that I have mentioned. It is that the stand that I have taken with regard to certain laws promulgated by the republic has been not one of complete submissiveness but rather of open opposition; and this, which seems to me to be one of the most natural manifestations of liberty of opinion, is styled a crime and an attack on the republic. Now, I have already had the honor to say in a document addressed to the Minister of Justice, that "we must needs distinguish between men and laws, and between laws and principles," and I believe that no one can call in question this doctrine which is in itself most evident. I refrain from reproducing here the arguments that I then brought forward. Meanwhile, if for the Government and courts of my country to dissent from an oppressive law and to protest against it is a crime, I am then a criminal, and I do not deny my criminality, nor do I shrink from the consequences that might arise from the avowal. It will be an honor for me to suffer in the cause of persecuted right, and to be chastised for having believed myself free enough to enjoy the pitiful privilege of protesting.

I was and am opposed to laws which wound my Catholic conscience; when I took upon myself the heavy burden of the episcopal office, I solemnly swore to defend, even at the cost of the greatest sacrifices, the interests of religion and the purity of the Faith, and no one can exact from me that I should be false to my oath and trail in the mire my dignity as a man and a bishop.

I was opposed to the Law of Separation. I believe that it was chiefly my attitude towards the Law of Separation which prompted the official note, for I am aware that a wholly unnecessary search was instituted in one of the towns of my diocese for documents bearing on that subject, whereas I was most ready to furnish to the Government copies of all documents and instructions that I had issued in that connection.

But it cannot be unknown to anybody that I protested against the Law of Separation, because there is in the hands of the public a document in which the formal protest against the law is signed with my name. And how could your Excellency wish that I should not protest if the very author of the law declared publicly that its result would be to wipe out Catholicism in Portugal within three generations? Would your Excellency find it honorable for our country if it could be said in the world there was in Portugal even one Bishop vile enough to assist with folded arms at the destruction of his religion? For my part, I did not want that stain, nor did my colleagues. We could be deprived of our liberty by means of handcuffs; but nevertheless we have not to kiss slavishly the fetters that bind us.

Moreover, your Excellency knows full well that within the ranks of the Republican party, among those who fought and risked their lives for the republic, some have publicly censured the Law of Separation and have thought that it cannot be enforced. Nobody can accuse them of being anti-Republican; and a bishop, who shares their opinion, though perhaps for different reasons, is to be condemned to the beasts and declared an enemy of the republic? No, your Excellency; that equality which must be one of the most solid elements of the Democratic régime is radically opposed to such a proceeding. To protest is a crime? But what other recourse have the lowly, the persecuted, who, moreover, have no thought of violent means to retard the progress of the Government?

The Minister of Justice has said recently that protests are forbidden, but representations may be made. Let us admit for the moment that this is sound Democratic doctrine. What else did I do, what else did we Portuguese bishops do when we met in Lisbon last November, when the civil register was proclaimed and when our collective Pastoral was condemned, but make representations to the Government with a civility and mildness that some considered excessive and deserving of censure? And how did the Government reply to these representations? The deposition of the worthy Bishop of Oporto and the Law of Separation are the eloquent answer. Now, if the Government will not heed representations, why persist in making them? In such extremes, to protest is a necessity and a duty; for thus all will know that the victims did not connive at the work that despoiled them, and that Portuguese Catholics do not renounce their rights.

The landlords protest against the tenant law; the laboring classes protest against the strike law; the Socialist associations protest against certain imprisonments; the Catholics are the only persons to whom is denied the pitiful and wretched right of protesting against laws that crush them. Are they to be thus without the pale of the law and deprived of all its guarantees? It is hard for me to believe that things will reach such extremes, but there are the facts, and it will not be an easy matter to cloak them. Or is it that when others protest it is permissible, but when Catholics protest it is a crime?

Mr. President, I do not pretend to discourse or to dogmatize on political subjects; but my reputation, which has been unjustly besmirched, and my fellow-Catholics who have been so misunderstood, demand that I should vindicate myself from such false charges. We are not enemies of the republic; we pray that it may gloriously realize the happiness of our country; but we also understand that the continuance and prosperity of the republic do not demand that we should be struck down. In America and in Europe your Excellency has bright examples of tolerant republics where Catholics have no complaint, because no one does violence to their consciences, because no one hinders them in their worship or in the exercise of their rights. Let the experiment be made among us and the Government will see that protests and complaints will cease at once.

But I said that I did not come to protest or to complain, and therefore I shall not go on; for what I have said is enough to clear up any misapprehension.

The Government is going to proceed energetically against the Bishop of Guarda? The Government has the power and can do what it intends; and it can be sure that the Bishop of Guarda will make no resistance and will stir up no resistance. But let this be well understood: The Bishop of Guarda will be persecuted for having fulfilled his duty as a bishop, for having counseled Catholics to observe the most holy laws of conscience, but never for having been hostile to the republic. Would that the administration, would that the republic might never encounter greater difficulties than I am disposed to raise in its path! I am weak, I am vanquished, if so it please them, but I am not a coward; my will is to comply openly with my duty unto the end, but always within the limits or order, of the law. Independent? Yes. Rebellious? Never!

I have made known with all clearness what I have done; I have declared my attitude. Now let the Government proceed against me if it considers me guilty. But I appeal to the conscience of the nation, I appeal to the Portuguese people, and the people will not brand as a criminal the bishop who would not abandon his post.

I close by offering to you, Mr. President, and to the whole Government the expression of my deep regard. Health and Fraternity.

✠ MANUEL,
Archbishop of Guarda.

Guarda, August 8, 1911.

Perjury in the Courts

The blundering statesmanship responsible for the irreligious education of the majority of our people is strikingly exposed in the almost universal desecration of the oath in modern proceedings at law. Once the strong searchlight of the courts, the oath has weakened rapidly as reverence for religion and its sanctions has declined, until to-day its power is almost gone and the shadow of its coming end is cast before. "So help me God!" seems echoed back in irony: "God help the Court!" and men are asking in all sincerity: "Why not omit the oath and save the blasphemy?"

So general has the vice of false swearing become that layman and lawyer alike meet it with indifference and indulge in it with impunity. In a recent case before the Court of Appeals of Missouri, one of the judges remarked: "The little importance with which the taking of a solemn oath is now regarded is a matter of deep regret. . . . It is perhaps due to the counsel for the appellant to say that there is nothing disclosed by the record from which it can be inferred that the affiant acted corruptly or with any intentional disregard for the importance of the oath. But the act was simply the outgrowth of the little importance with which the making of an oath has come to be considered in legal proceedings."

The unintentional disregard for the oath shown by this affiant consisted merely in solemnly swearing that he appealed from the judgment of the lower court for stated reasons, although in fact at that time no judgment had been rendered, or even drafted, in the cause. Knowingly false affidavits for changes of venue, attachment, replevin, absent witnesses, etc., etc., are commonplace in the practice of law. Nor is it an exaggeration to state that one cannot spend a day in a court of trial without finding the oath violated in the taking of testimony. If there be no direct intent to bear false witness, there is observable at least an alarming laxity on the part of witnesses in swearing to facts and figures. The oath holds no awe for them: they take it at command and break it at convenience. Only when there is imminent danger of prosecution for perjury—a condition that seldom obtains—does it appear to serve the purpose for which it was instituted.

What is the cause of this deplorable phenomenon, whose reality no one questions? Some make answer with the old adage: familiarity breeds contempt. The oath is required on the most trivial occasions outside the court room, and when men appear at the bar of justice they are not apt to halt at words which they are wont to utter elsewhere as a matter of course. There may be some truth in this diagnosis; yet it does not satisfy. For, young men and maidens, who never before have been sworn, are as careless in the taking of their first oath as are their venerable fathers. Again we are told: the principle of the thing is at fault. It is absurd to suppose that an all-just God regards the form rather than the substance of our deeds, or that He punishes the bearer of false witness less severely if he tells his tale merely on his honor than if he tells it under the pretended sanctity of his oath. The writer is no theologian; yet he would hesitate to add a blasphemy to a lie and find but one offense, or to add a sin against the Second Commandment to a sin against the Eighth Commandment and expect God to punish only the latter. This objection, moreover, is based on a misconception of the nature and purpose of the oath, as will presently appear.

The true reason for the decline in respect for the oath is the loss of the fear of God. Defined as "an outward pledge given by the person taking it that his attestation or promise is made under an immediate sense of his responsibility to God," it appears from the very nature of the oath that it is founded on deep religious convictions. Its purpose, as observed by Judge Ashburn in the leading case of Clinton vs. State, 33 Ohio State Reports 27, "is not to call the attention of God to the witness, but the attention of the witness to God; not to call upon Him to punish the false swearer, but on the witness to remember that He will assuredly do so. By thus laying hold of the conscience of the witness and appealing to his sense of accountability to God the law best insures the utterance of truth." In the strong fear of God lies the power of the oath. Arguing, then, from effect to cause, must we not attribute the prevailing disregard for the sanctity of the oath to a general loss of the sense of accountability to God?

And where lies the blame for this loss if not with the undenominational, neutral, irreligious, public school system of education under which the majority of our people have been bred and whose influence is felt by all? Need we hesitate, even in this day of empiricism, with the experience of years as our proof, with the assent of jurists, statesmen, officers of the law, ministers of the gospel, yes even state supported educators for authority, to assert that a school which treats of God only in the most distant and general way, which speaks of Him in terms of frank uncertainty and compulsory ignorance, is helpless to develop in its pupils a sense of responsibility to God. It is unlawful for the public schools to admit religious training into their curriculum, because such training is necessarily denominational.

Our attention, however, is called to the supplementary Sunday schools, in which the science and practice of religion is taught presumably in definite and authoritative form. Assuming the efficiency of the Sunday schools, the fact remains that, relatively speaking very few pupils resort to them, and these few almost necessarily acquire the habit of associating the idea of religion with the idea of Sunday and of church, and correspondingly overlooking the intimate connection between the worship of God and the morality of every act throughout their lives. Yet the oath is not a matter of Sundays and church affairs. As a rule it is concerned with Mondays more than Sundays, with business dealings more than church affairs.

It has to do with the arithmetic and spelling, reading and writing, history and geography, indeed with all the elementary and secondary branches of the public school curriculum, because it reaches into the very heart of every-day toil and struggle. And unless the witness carries somewhere within him the deep and abiding consciousness of his dependence on the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, God, as to every thought, word and deed of his life, what will it avail to call his attention to God and the justice of God when demanding his testimony? The public schools, by their negative attitude towards religion, have robbed the oath of the sine qua non of its power, the lively sense of accountability to God in the mind of the affiant. Theirs is therefore the blame for the widespread profanation of the oath of which every court in the land is complaining.

But it is urged the public school alumni are not alone in their indifference towards the sacredness of the oath; the graduates of the Catholic and Lutheran schools, thoroughly trained though they are in dogmatic religion, are not irreproachable in this respect. True, they are not. The writer has himself experienced the disheartening spectacle of a witness, wearing exposed a button representation of the Infant Christ in the arms of His Virgin Mother, and swearing falsely as to nearly every item of his testimony. No doubt many sincere Catholics and Lutherans and the faithful of other churches have sinned on the witness stand. But the practising lawyer knows, on the other hand, that many Catholics and Lutherans and other Christians have testified to the truth against their own interest because by the oath their attention had been called to their accountability to God.

And is it unreasonable to suppose that the example of laxity on the part of the vast majority of the population of this land is not without its evil influence on the small minority? Surely it cannot require the wisdom of Solomon to arrive at the conclusion that if nearly all of our people were educated and trained in denominational schools where religion is made a matter of teaching and practice during every hour of the day, a compelling sense of responsibility to God would permeate the minds and hearts of our citizens in general, and secure to the oath that supernatural binding power which it once had in abundance and without which it is an empty formula and a mockery of justice and of God.

A brief consideration of this question forces upon us the astounding truth that for the past seventy-five years the states of this Union, through their public school system, have been toiling with preternatural energy to deprive themselves entirely of the most necessary and efficient means at their command for the enforcement of their laws. To remove the sense of accountability to God is to destroy the value of the oath. And without the oath what means have the states and their courts to wrest the truth from the breasts of unwilling witnesses? How shall they convict the criminal, destroy monopoly, balk usury, defeat unfair competition, prevent the breach of sacred trusts, protect the weak against the strong, the poor against the rich, and the individual against the mob, unless they have some power of inquisition of a higher authority than the laws they seek to enforce? Shall they rely upon the penalties of perjury and the right of cross-examination? The threat of prosecution for perjury is so vain as to appear ridiculous.

Extremely few perjurers are ever prosecuted, and very few prosecutions result in punishment of the guilty. Indeed, the infliction of the penalties of perjury is itself dependent on the disposition of witnesses to tell the truth, and to say that the truth of sworn testimony can be secured by imposing the penalties of perjury on the false swearer is to move in a sort of vicious circle. The great value of cross-examination must be conceded. But it is contingent on the skilfulness of the cross-examiner, the weakness of the witness, the relative complexity or simplicity of the case, and the absence of restraining legal technicalities. The uncertainty of this weapon of justice is well known to the practicing attorney, and only when driven thereto by necessity will he rest his case upon it. No, there is but one effective means of compelling truthful testimony, namely the hold on the conscience of the witness obtained through the oath. Without this even the most skilful lawyer, with the threat of the penalties of perjury and the privilege of cross-examination at his command, can be baffled and defeated in his search for the facts. But let him reach the conscience of the witness by a power which none can evade, and the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth is laid bare at his word.

How jealously, then, ought not the states to guard this heaven-sent searchlight of truth, this indispensable means for enforcing their laws and protecting the rights of their citizens! And yet how foolishly they have busied themselves for three-fourths of a century in sapping its power and rendering it useless forever. For by their system of free neutral education they have robbed de-nominal schools of their pupils, the pupils of their religious training, and our people of the lively sense of accountability to God which alone gives strength and efficiency to the oath.

The evil is patent, the remedy quite evident. The states must either support denominational education or make their own schools religious. The latter is hardly practicable; the former is already done elsewhere with success. Can the bench and bar of this country be brought to join the campaign, now daily gaining force, to put this remedy in application in our own land? If so, we may confidently expect the coming generation to restore the oath in judicial proceedings to its ancient dignity and power.

ALPHONSE E. GANAHL, A.M., LL.B.

Socialists in Office

The first conference of elected Socialist officials was recently held at Milwaukee. It brings to our mind in an impressive manner the fact that Socialism has come to be an important factor in our political life. About thirty Socialist mayors have already come into public notice, and several of these were present at the convention. These beginnings of success, however, are nothing compared with the sublime self-confidence where-with the leaders strive to keep awake enthusiasm in their party. Ten years from now the United States, they tell us, is to be a Socialistic commonwealth, and Victor Berger, with no slight degree of optimism, promises himself and his following that, when the votes of the next elections shall have been counted, there will be found no less than nine Socialist congressmen-elect ready to carry on with him the important work of educating and revolutionizing the country.

The work of Socialist officials, as reviewed in the convention and published in the Socialist journals, was unexceptionally honest, intelligent, virtuous and unselfish. At this we are not surprised, since mutual admiration and the publication of this at large, is one of the main purposes of these meetings and of the party organs. The story, however, of the Milwaukee administration, as told by one not in collusion with it, would be substantially different from the eulogistic statements contained in the reports of the heads or secretaries of the various civil departments under Socialistic control.

Taxes in Milwaukee have risen to such an extent, that workers or small dealers who have come into the possession of a little property, often won by hard labor and the savings of many years, are ready to rise in mutiny. It is upon these that the increased burden naturally falls most heavily. Milwaukee Socialists are not ordinarily tax-payers, and so can be lavish in their expenditure of the public money, whose deficit is not to be supplied by them. Public dances, amusements and especially gifts to the children, whom they would attract, can thus readily be offered on an unprecedented scale.

It was the same policy the Roman emperors followed in keeping the populace upon their side. In fact these days of ancient paganism are often proclaimed by Socialists to have been far preferable to any subsequent Christian economy.

What should, however, militate most against the present administration is the fact that the army of the unemployed is said never to have been greater than under these officials, who promised to provide work for all. The general impression of business men, and no less of the working classes not in sympathy with Socialism, is that the promises of the party have not been redeemed. The sentiment is expressed that it has proved itself to be a lamentable failure.

What is worse, however, many of the officials are accused of being entirely incompetent for their positions. A clean sweep was made, as far as possible, not merely of the politicians of other parties, but likewise of tried and experienced men in the various departments, and Socialists without any previous training or qualifications, except vigorous campaign service, were at once rushed into office. Similar faults are not uncommon elsewhere, but are never carried to the same excess. So of the first Socialist Health Commissioner, the press tells us from Milwaukee: "The Health Department of Milwaukee is in the hands of a physician who has been refused admission to the regular medical societies of the city. . . . The first Socialist Health Commissioner was a tailor by trade." This was printed under date of April 16, when an epidemic of scarlet fever which was sweeping the city was, according to local physicians, ascribed to his inefficiency. On this we do not here desire to pass judgment.

Socialist officials, however, did not add to their prestige by trying to urge incontinently the purchase of a million dollar piece of property, insisting that it was an opportunity such as the city had never enjoyed before of concluding a most memorable bargain. Victor Berger, we believe, was the great advocate of the deal. The project, however, was not carried through at once, as had been insistently urged, and when the public assessors were called upon for their estimate it was found that the real estate was not considered to be worth two-thirds of the sum demanded. Whatever reasons are assigned for such transactions they certainly leave no favorable impression upon the tax-paying public of the city.

On the other hand it is somewhat to be feared that the opposition element is reckoning without its host in confidently forecasting the defeat of the Socialist party in the coming elections. This, indeed, is in nowise improbable, but Socialists in the meanwhile are most intensely active. There is, moreover, a large proportion of the population which is profiting by the lavish expenditure of the public money. Socialist literature is constantly spread broadcast among all classes of the workingmen, and delusive hopes are held out to them.

Every successful measure carried in their interest is attributed to purely Socialistic causes, while all the failures of the existing administration are ascribed to capitalistic conditions. Funds, moreover, are being collected to finance an English Socialistic daily paper. Since such dailies are already in existence in Chicago and New York, Milwaukee does not wish to be outdone.

By constantly accusing their opponents of ignorance and dishonesty, and slandering the Church and priests, and all things Catholic, they gradually produce the conviction that falsehoods, which are so often repeated and with such protestations of sincerity, must have at least some foundation in fact. At the same time, while defaming their opponents, no opportunity is lost of proclaiming their own self-righteousness and infallibility in matters social and economic. Socialists never do wrong when they act in the interests of their party. Virtue is all upon their side, and only hypocrisy, malice or ignorance on the other.

Nothing, finally, is so easy as to arouse discontent, and upon this Socialism feeds and breeds. In dealing, however, with real evils it exercises no discrimination, because this might lead to reform, while Socialism must, as far as possible, always aim at revolution. To venture upon a criticism of their methods is to be in the pay of capitalism and an enemy of the laborer. They alone have the monopoly of all that can promote the welfare of the working classes. Such a system of exaggeration and vilification may be used by other parties, but by none in so unscrupulous a way. These are some of the considerations which must not be overlooked in dealing with a Socialistic campaign. J. H.

With Workers for Boys in Their Teens

Addressing himself to those who gather the young for religious purposes, and especially to priests so occupied, the writer, as the above heading indicates, is of the opinion that such benefactors do well by requiring that the objects of their care shall be more than twelve years of age. "But why not take young people earlier?" some may urge. "Boys can be more easily rallied at eleven than when a couple of years older." Probably the apostolic net could be more readily manipulated in connection with the younger lads; however, if the beneficiaries of the work were to be chosen with merely the view of facilitating things, our energies would be wholly turned to the care of juvenile citizens just enough "little men" to be trusted out of their mother's sight. Rather workers should look, not to the period of youth that demands lesser labor, but to the period that promises greater fruit.

It is towards the close of their boyhood that young people stand most in need of religious and especially of priestly attention. Let us fully realize that the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth years are the crucial ones of early life; for it is within their compass that the boy, experiencing newly awakened passions and a thoroughly aroused spirit of independence, commonly chooses his life course in spiritual matters, be that course devout, lukewarm or vicious. It is obvious, meanwhile, that the most efficacious means towards retaining our charges until the end of their seventeenth year is had by denying enrollment to lads who appear so youthful as to be unwelcome to their elders nearing eighteen. Hence, a definite age norm for the eligibility of candidates is needed. And here, as in every other department of the work, one should adopt, if possible, the rule that boy nature itself has established. This rule, for the present matter, is easily read.

Clearly enough our junior brethren do not, as a rule, enter optionally into any close association with mortals more than five years younger than themselves. Hence, if we would hold boys commonly until the end of their teens we must keep the condition authoritatively placed and spare our older followers the unnatural and unendurable trial of membership with social upstarts having less than thirteen years to their credit. Accordingly the present view calls for disuse of the method now commonly followed in parishes by which little chaps of twelve, eleven or even less, find themselves invited into the regular juvenile society. For the sake of an immense increase in rich results teenless beginners in life, who, of course, can receive other spiritual attentions while waiting, will have to be excluded from the ranks.

The proposed way of doing, efficacious in making willing captives of our young friends until the end of their boyhood, should gain additional favor in the eyes of observers who have noted that many boys will not advance further into the field of church societies than they are taken by a junior organization, and never pass into any young men's union. If all of those quitting the younger society were sure to join the older one, their departure from the junior ranks might be tolerated, say, in the sixteenth year; for then the certain advancement of all of the boys into the senior fraternity (though doing the senior fraternity an injury about to be noted) would at least bring to all of the boys a continuance of special care. But since a large percentage of those retiring from the juvenile organization are deaf to the invitation "ascende superius," it becomes doubly important to hold juniors beyond the sixteenth year and until the full dawn of maturity in the younger branch, which, fortunately, juniors can be induced to join almost en masse.

This conclusion is confirmed when we turn from striplings who will never connect themselves with the young men and consider oppositely disposed striplings ready to ambition that step, even ahead of time. As it is at once seen, the welfare of the older organization demands that the boys, as long as they are boys, be kept in their place; or, in other words, that youngsters be preserved from needing the older organization prematurely. No doubt restless chaps of insufficient age, when done with the junior branch, gain by membership in the senior branch; their gain, however, is at the senior body's sore expense. For the young men's society, once it is invaded by lads of less than eighteen, suffers an ultra youthful shading intolerable to the older beneficiaries, whose welfare the society has paramountly in view. Accordingly a glance at important details argues new worth for the method that seemed necessary from a first and general view of the situation.

By all means let workers for juveniles—and especially priestly workers—accept for consideration the presentment that the boys' organization should be made popular with boys nearing maturity and should be limited, consequently, to lads in their teens.

GEORGE QUIN, S.J.

CORRESPONDENCE

England's Economic Troubles

LONDON, August 16, 1911.

When the London strike began the chiefs of their trades unions opposed it, but the men refused to resume work and the leaders became followers. They had to recognize the strike or abdicate their position. Other classes of dock workers began to follow the example of the coalers. At first the unrest was local and sporadic. But it spread from dock to dock and extended to various branches of the transport trades. Carters, lightermen and tugboat men discovered that they also had grievances, and the strike committee set to work to organize a general stoppage of London's food supplies.

The carters' strike was the most serious element in the situation. But it was only serious because at the outset the police gave no adequate protection to those who were willing to work. I don't know what kind of a "story" has been sent across to you by the cable, but I daresay it reflected the more sensational reports published in the London press. I am giving you the plain facts.

London has the disadvantage of being an aggregate of several great towns, and there is, therefore, a multiplicity of local authorities. As is the case with most European capitals the police is not a municipal service in the ordinary sense of the word. It is controlled by the government. The Home Secretary is responsible for it, and has under him a chief commissioner of police. London crowds are generally very orderly and our police, who carry no arms, are experts in the art of handling them. There has not been a serious riot in London for twenty-five years. I do not count the absurd siege of the house in Sidney street, held by two Russian burglars last winter. The police would have cleared the house in five minutes if they had been allowed, but a Home Office official insisted on the troops being used. Before this farcical affair not a shot had been fired in a London street by a soldier for more than sixty years. Every other European capital has often during this time been the scene of bloodshed.

Even during last week's dock strike and carters' strike there was no serious rioting in London. There would have been none at all only that unhappily the Home Secretary, Mr. Winston Churchill, afraid of losing votes among the workers, appears to have at the outset held the hands of the police. During the first two days of the strike crowds of strikers stopped carts, took out the horses, sometimes overturned the cart, and assaulted the drivers. The police made no arrests, but confined themselves to preventing the carts from being plundered. Drivers who were quite willing to work were afraid to take their carts out when they found that they could not count on police protection.

The result was that by the third day of the strike the streets were almost clear of traffic. As petrol could not be got from the warehouses along the river the motor bus companies reduced their service in order to economize their supplies. The newspapers brought out alarmist "contents bills," "London Threatened with Starvation," "Stoppage of Food Supplies," and the like. As a matter of fact the only serious stoppage was that of the supply of ice, and in London ice is not so freely used as in New York, so it did not much matter. Ice for the hospitals was passed through by the strikers themselves. The shops had a good reserve of food supplies, and in the warehouses there was enough to keep all London fed for weeks to come. Every reasonable man knew perfectly well that, anxious as he might be to deal tenderly with the hundred thousand strikers, Mr. Churchill could not afford to risk the position of the government by allowing them to blockade the food of six millions. On the fourth day of the trouble the Home Secretary announced that the police had orders to deal vigorously with any attempt to stop transport in the streets and that the troops at Aldershot Camp were ready to move to London if necessary to escort carts and protect the handling of goods at the warehouses. That day the movement of food supplies began again. Strings of carts, escorted by a few policemen, passed freely everywhere, and even the crowds of strikers made no attempt to stop them. Partial strikes in the railway goods yards caused some trouble, but the transport strike was broken so far as London was concerned.

Meanwhile, the Government had arranged conferences between masters and men, presided over by Mr. Aswith (not Asquith) a permanent official of the Board of Trade, who is a specialist on Labor disputes. On Friday and Saturday last agreements were signed for dockers, lightermen and carters to resume work, all the fair claims of them being granted. It was a real success for the workers. It had been won so quickly because their demands were moderate enough for the employers to hesitate about forcing a long fight in the face of the heavy losses that even a success would entail.

And the remarkable point about the strike was that it was carried through without one of the Labor Members having anything to do with it, and the boldest of the strike leaders was a man who for three years has been denouncing the Labor party as a political sham and urging the workingmen to inaugurate a class war on the lines of the French Socialist Syndicates. This is the really serious aspect of the business.

Meanwhile, the strike mania has spread through England, but there is now no disposition on the part of the authorities to let things drift. At Liverpool there has been bloodshed, but there the back of the strike is broken and the workers have refused to respond to the call for a general strike. The Glasgow strike has collapsed. The hopes of the agitators are now pinned on a proposed general strike of the railways, synchronizing with a tramway strike in London. The result will be known before this reaches you. But the railway companies are prepared for a fight and have the sympathy of the general public, because the men have broken the agreement arrived at through the mediation of Mr. Lloyd George in 1907, when a general railway strike was threatened and was averted by the establishment of a Conciliation Board, to which all future grievances were to be referred, the men agreeing to keep at work while the arbitration of the Board was in progress. The companies declare their readiness to observe the agreement and submit all questions to arbitration. The men threaten to stop work at three days' notice. This puts them hopelessly in the wrong.

Mr. Churchill has announced that all the forces of the crown will be used to repress rioting and to secure the free supply of food to the people. He has instructed magistrates and chiefs of the police that, although the law allows the "peaceful persuasion" of pickets during a trade dispute, they must not be escorted by menacing crowds. Most significant of all is the fact that Mr. William Crooks, a Labor member of the House of Commons and a genuine workman with a most honorable record of public service, proposes that a law should be passed limiting the existing right to strike. His suggestion is that it should be enacted that the reference of trade disputes to arbitration should be made obligatory; that the right to strike if the dispute is not settled by the arbitrators should remain, but that to promote a strike, or incite men to stop work without reference to arbitration or pending the arbitration, should be a criminal offence. Some such measure is certainly necessary to enable the Government to deal with self-appointed "leaders" of the workers, who take it on themselves to declare industrial war at a moment's notice, and some of whom are less interested in the welfare of the toilers than in the dream of a Socialist revolution.

Revolution Crops Out in Spain

MADRID, Aug. 14, 1911.

Although at the outset Premier Canalejas busied himself in belittling the significance of the recent mutiny aboard the man-of-war Numancia while in African waters, the bitter truth now appears that the event was of vast importance, for it has shown the fatal consequences of the truckling attitude which the cabinet has long assumed towards the revolutionary elements of the country.

The unqualified license and impunity with which Republicans, Socialists and Anarchists carried on their dangerous propaganda against the country, the army, and society in general by inciting the people to revolution, crime and lawlessness must necessarily have brought matters to a pass that the affair of the Numancia might well have been the first act of another "bloody week," like that of Barcelona in July, 1909.

The plan of the conspirators was to get possession of the ship and sail for Málaga or Barcelona, where they would proclaim a republic and call on the rabble to arm in the cause, their intention being to reproduce the Portuguese revolution of October 5, 1910. They looked for the cooperation of other ships of the Spanish navy, among the crews of which compromising documents had been distributed.

The outbreak on the Numancia, therefore, was distinctively revolutionary. But, who had framed the scheme? Where was it formed? Those who can answer these questions, if they can be answered just now, maintain a noncommittal silence, but there is more than a mere impression abroad to the effect that the author or authors of the work have taken all pains to remain in the background after urging a few misguided men along the road that led to their utter undoing.

What seems to be certain is that in certain Parisian centres of political activity, it was known some days in advance that the mutiny was to take place, and the approach of grave public events in Spain was a topic of conversation. Moreover, it was whispered that a large sum of money had been advanced by French bankers to a Spanish revolutionist, whose identity it is not difficult to discover in a well-known politician who has been at the forefront in all Spanish revolutionary efforts for some years back.

Here we must remind our American readers that, although the mutiny aboard the Numancia was in reality a Republican outbreak, he would be simple indeed who would think that only certain Republicans had a hand in it. Our chief reason for our assertion is the state of disintegration in which the Republican party in Spain now finds itself; for its leaders are in a condition of chronic discord and contention. They detest one another, insult one another, and their personal organs in the newspaper world keep up the strife with copious quantities of coarse invective. The honorable and sincere members of the party do not attempt to hide the disgust they feel at the meanness, cunning and political mud-slinging of the leaders, while the common people have lost faith in them and turn a deaf ear to all talk about the speedy coming of a republic.

Lest this view of ours seem narrow and one-sided, we shall jot down some recent utterances of prominent Republicans as read in the Madrid press. Eugenio Noel, for example, is one of the most "advanced" Republicans in the country. It is hardly a week since he finished a term in jail for his share in a revolutionary attempt against the public peace. "Republicanism," he writes, "is mixed up and mildewed; it is glutted with offal from the streets; it is rotting by inches; it is going to pieces in a terrible way. Republicans now jabber and scold and shake one another; they claw and pull hair like women of the streets; they have missed the trail and lost their way; they are eaten up with envy, and cupidity is gnawing at their vitals. They have brought ridicule upon themselves and disaster upon the party."

To this rather forcible arraignment of the party and its tactics, Barriovero y Herrán, another prominent Republican, adds in the party organ, La Palabra Libre: "If when the republic is established, we are to be as we are now, it is better not to have one; for in this case the great political revolution would amount to no more than a display of fireworks."

The conclusion that we draw is that a party without organization and without able leaders, a party which is the victim of the squabbles of its own members, is not the party to start a grave revolutionary movement in the country. Yet this is the party that Canalejas fears; he flatters and cajoles and wheedles its members, and sacrifices to them the great interests of state.

The official organ of the premier in Madrid is La Mañana. Though devoted to his interests, it could not forbear reading him a lesson on his unmanly course towards the torn and discordant elements of republicanism: "The policy of the cabinet flows unbroken through one ditch, which is fear of revolution. For the sake of pacifying and placating revolutionists and radicals, Señor Canalejas hoisted the banner of anti-clericalism and unfolded a sectarian program which deeply wounded the religious sentiments of the country. For the same purpose he has brought forth his laws of compulsory military service and suppression of the excise; and he proposes to do away with the death penalty and even with life imprisonment. Now, all this amounts to a true and a truly disastrous revolution in Spain's life, economic, juridical and social. For fear of displeasing the radicals he let French agitators come to Madrid and publicly preach lawlessness and sedition, and he showed those disturbers of the peace a hospitality that he would not grant to peaceable Portuguese fugitives, whose only crime was that they were monarchists. And when he thought that with all this mildness and these caresses he was disarming revolution and bringing the radicals within the bounds of legality, lo, a spark from the Numancia comes to prove to him that with all his cringing he has simply succeeded in compromising the highest interests of the nation and in precipitating a difficult and dangerous state of affairs."

Premier Moret was ousted by his partisans, the Liberals, because he played into the hands of the Republicans, and it looks as if the same fate were reserved for Canalejas. Goaded into something akin to alertness by the harsh comments of even his own party organs, Canalejas seems to be startled by the effects of his official action, and has declared that he will not be deaf to the just outcry of public opinion; but we Spaniards have learned to put little trust in his sincerity and firmness. Meanwhile, the radical press furiously assails him, styling him an enemy of liberty, of democracy, of the people. So Satan rewards his servants!

Annecy's Recent Commemoration

PARIS, August, 1911.

The hostility of the Government to Catholic celebrations is well known. At Orléans officials did their best to deprive the patriotic and religious festival of its solemnity, and at Nancy the splendid gathering of the Federation of Catholic Athletes was an unqualified success, in spite of the opposition of the Prefect.

An exception was found at Annecy, where on August 2, the shrines of St. Francis of Sales and St. Jane de Chantal were transferred from the old to the new Monastery of the Visitation in presence of an immense throng, more pilgrims than tourists. The popularity of St. Francis at Annecy is such that his name served as a link to bind hostile powers together, at least for the time being. The Government's attitude was passive, not hostile.

The site of the new convent was selected by the Government, the Municipal Council and the nuns themselves, under a friendly agreement by which their former convent was given up to the town. The fact is so rare that it deserves to be noticed. The building stands above the lake, and the citizens of Annecy contributed generously to its erection; one one occasion two beggars brought each a handful of coppers as their offering.

Prompted by their love for their illustrious fellow-citizen, the inhabitants spared nothing to provide for the pilgrims, whose members sorely taxed the resources of the little town. Despite narrow means, families contrived to lodge and feed, free of cost, the pastors from the Alpine villages. "I have washed and tidied the one room I possess," said a poor woman to the nuns, "here is the key, I wish to give it up to a servant of God during the novena."

In the night between the 1st and 2d of August no one slept much at Annecy; the streets were alive with workers decorating the houses, and the churches were filled with pilgrims who could find accommodation nowhere else. At an early hour the bells gave the signal for the procession. Fifty bishops, among whom were two cardinals, with abbots, prelates, religious men and women of different Orders, escorted the relics to the new convent. The remains of the two saints were borne on cars, magnificently appointed, drawn by four horses led by men in medieval costume, whose quaint appearance gave a picturesqueness to the scene. The great, great nephews of St. Francis and some of St. Jane's descendants followed on foot. Cardinal Maffi, Archbishop of Pisa, said Mass on a platform in front of the new convent; the blue sky, snowy mountains, the still and smiling lake and quaint little city making up a singularly lovely picture. Seldom has the splendor of a religious celebration been displayed in a frame-work so exquisite.

But external conditions, however fascinating, are only a secondary feature. What must strike those who penetrate below the surface is the influence St. Francis of Sales still exercises over the twentieth century French people. Certain traits of his character appeal strongly to our twentieth century sensibilities, thus he loved and understood nature at a time when its grandeur and beauty were a sealed book to most men. An eminent French writer, M. Henry Bordeaux, himself a native of Savoy, justly observes that Jean Jacques Rousseau is wrongly supposed to have discovered nature and its thousand beauties. Long before, St. Francis of Sales had written with enthusiasm of the peaks, the glaciers, the splendid panorama of his native land.

A Savoyard by birth, he was intellectually a Frenchman, and some of his writings entitle him to a high place among its literary celebrities. His language may be old-fashioned, according to our modern ideas, but it is elegant, natural, graceful and clear. Our twentieth century writers appreciate its classical charm and quaint originality, so did the saint's contemporary Henri IV, a keen critic, as well as a good soldier, who was an enthusiastic admirer of "L'introduction à la vie dévote." "This little book surpasses my expectations," observed the King, who might, with advantage, have put into practice some of its precepts.

Strangely enough, the statue of St. Francis of Sales, which a literary academy founded by him is about to erect on the great square of Annecy, is the first to be raised by the town folk. M. Henry Bordeaux tells us that a tiny village called Lullin set Annecy the example of faithfulness. In 1898 the villagers, whose forefathers had been converted by the saint, placed his statue on the high peak of Le Forchet, whence he reigns over the country. The village Curé selected the spot. "There is no road to lead to it," objected his parishioners. "That matters not. You will make one." And the mountaineers, having no gold to spend on "Monsieur François," gave their time and labor to make a road leading up to his shrine.

St. Francis was absolutely staunch where principles were at stake, and the following words of his are especially applicable to French Catholics, whose work for the defence of religion is often hampered by their internal divisions: "I hate from principle and from inclination to see Catholics quarrel among themselves."

The Eames-Gorgoza Marriage

As soon as the affair of the Eames-Gorgoza marriage came before the public, we put ourselves in communication with the ecclesiastical authorities in Paris, asking for a statement of the conditions under which the marriage was performed. Unfortunately, the Archbishop was absent, and our impatience to get at the facts failed to be appreciated. Finally, on the 28th of August, and, consequently, too late for our last issue, which was already in press, the following letter came to hand. We give a verbatim translation of the French text:

Archbishopric of Paris,
Paris, August 12, 1911.

To the Reverend Father Campbell,
Reverend Father:—

In reply to the letter which you addressed to Monseigneur, the Archbishop, during his absence, on the subject of the Gorgoza-Eames marriage, I can tell you that Madame Eames was free according to canon law. She had not been baptized and had been married to an unbaptized person. In becoming a Catholic she availed herself of the Pauline privilege procuring a dispensation from interpellation, granted to her by the Holy Office June 28, 1911. As regards M. de Gorgoza, I was under the impression that he was a single man. Your letter has reawakened my attention. The priest who blessed the marriage informed me that M. de Gorgoza had indeed contracted a previous marriage, but a purely civil one, and that he had regarded it as null. I have ordered a new inquiry in the matter. Accept, Reverend Father, the expression of my religious respect.

E. DESCHAMPS, (Official).

Besides this official explanation we have reliable information that the first Madame de Gorgoza is a Jewess. It will be scarcely necessary to remind our readers that an exact statement of facts on the part of applicants for Church dispensations is always required.

The Responsibility of the Press

Unfortunately, the daily press is fast acquiring the habit of describing violations of the moral law with a crudity that is simply revolting. But when we are presented with whole columns of reports of the erotic slobberings of an avowed and unblushing adulteress, who talks about her emotions, her ambition to solve the "sex problem," her associations with every chance comer, her future prospects of livelihood, etc., we ask in amazement whether the reporters who gathered this vile stuff, and the editors who sent it to the printer, have wives and mothers and sisters and daughters? Will they be gratified when they see them absorbing this deadly poison? The papers that contain this horrible interview are piled up on every breakfast-table in the land and are devoured on the cars by old men and old women and by girls and boys, with an avidity which, for any one who gives it a thought, is full of menace for all the decencies of life.

We try to stop the cholera at Swinburne Island; we spend millions on sweeping and flushing the streets to keep off disease; we have gone stark mad about disinfectants in everything we use, but here we are bringing into the sacred precincts of every home in the land, or, rather, into every heart of the land, the most deadly kind of moral infection. There are crowds of decent, upright young fellows who are earning their living reporting for the press, there are editors in every department of the great journals whose lives are pure and whose first instincts are for what is right and proper. Why can they not come together to protest against and to prevent this criminal misuse of the great powers of the press, whose purpose ought to be to purify and preserve the people, and not to drag them down into a condition of mind and heart which must inevitably bring disaster on the nation?

Some Queries for Catholic Parents

Do we want our children to grow up learned merely, or good as well?

Do we want our boys to become sharp and shrewd men merely, or honest and God-fearing too?

Do we wish our girls to be clever and accomplished merely, or pure and modest also?

Do we want our little ones to learn only about what is here below, or shall we have them taught something about Heaven too?

Do we want the children God gave us to be fitted only for a successful temporal career, or shall we have them trained to enjoy everlasting happiness as well?

Do we believe that what our boys and girls are is at least of as much importance as what they know?

Do we hold that character building is as useful as head training for our sons and daughters?

Are we of the opinion that one hour of Sunday school is sufficient to offset all the influences hostile to their faith that our children will be subject to in non-religious schools?

Do we really believe that our Catholic Faith is indeed the pearl of price for whose preservation and protection any sacrifice must be made and every safeguard adopted?

But if we firmly hold all these truths, how can we in conscience send our children to those schools in which religious instruction forms no part of the curriculum?

Political Politeness

M. de Broqueville, the Prime Minister of Belgium, is a marvel of urbanity. He will smile and smile, no matter what villainy is arrayed against him, and he has the trick, or the grace, of always prevailing. He is like "Foxy Grandpa," with the boys. He does not irritate his opponents. He has often exercised this remarkable power in minor positions, but on August 15 he stood the test as Prime Minister. A monster demonstration of Liberals and Socialists had been planned to take place in Brussels on that day, and two or three hundred thousand people were to gather there from all parts of Belgium to shout in the streets and squares for universal suffrage. It was the war cry that was to upset de Broqueville at the next election.

But the 15th of August is a general holiday, and the cars are always crowded on that occasion with good-natured and happy excursionists. How would the extra two or three hundred thousand angry and disgruntled political shouters find accommodations? Why, de Broqueville himself, their arch enemy, whom they were going to unhorse, would be at their service, with his suavity unruffled, as usual. He was Prime Minister indeed, but he was also Minister of Railways. He could have blocked the game of his enemies if he wanted, but he did not, and hence, when the morning of the 15th dawned, the astonished people saw innumerable and interminable trains standing at every station in Belgium, and all on the track for Brussels. Freight trains had been commandeered and generously fitted up with seats and supplied with lamps, and even cars from Germany and France had been hired to meet the demand. No one could grumble, for every one who had a ticket or the inclination could go to Brussels and denounce the man who was assiduous in helping them to go there. He even gave them rebates.

It was a curious situation. De Broqueville was giving his enemies hand grenades to throw at him. No doubt the whole thing had been planned to "put him in a hole," but he kept out of it. The other people were in it. He must have smiled when it turned out that the two or three hundred thousand who threatened to choke the traffic had, when the last trains pulled out, dwindled down to sixty or seventy thousand. A less clever man might have yielded to the temptation to prevent the demonstration by pleading the impossibility of transporting such a multitude on one day to the same place, but he saw very plainly that such an excuse, which would be perfectly valid on any other occasion, would have been used against him on the 15th of August, and especially on election day. Now they would have to hold their peace. No one could have done more to oblige them. He was like a fighter who gives his adversary every advantage and then beats him. He scored another point that day. The rally in Brussels was to demand universal suffrage and also to protest against the bon scolaire, the ticket which was to give every father of family the right to send his children to any school he chose. Just before the 15th de Broqueville let it out through an interviewer that there was not going to be any bon scolaire in the School Bill that was to be introduced. The result was that the program of the manifestation was cut in two. He also made it clear that his new scheme was going to look, first of all, to the preservation of communal rights, which has been the pet patriotism of every Belgian for centuries. In brief, he kept the demonstration down to the issue of universal suffrage. But as very many of the Liberal party are bitter against granting universal suffrage, the cheering for it must have been half-hearted at best. On the whole, the adroitness of the Prime Minister in this first public test to which he was subjected promises well for the success of his party in the difficult circumstances in which it now finds itself.

Mixed Marriages

Holland has its troubles with mixed marriages, like the rest of the world. The Catholics of that country are about two-fifths of the population, but there is a very considerable leakage due to marriages with those outside the Church. Some one there has been making out statistics, and he finds from the first inquiry that out of 3,426 children who were born of a Protestant mother and a Catholic father 1,747 became Protestants, 1,312 remained Catholics, and 376 had no religion at all. The mother's influence prevails to some extent over that of the father, who probably did not amount to much in determining which way his children should go. Another count was taken of 66 children where the mothers had no religion at all and the fathers were Catholics. There was about an equal division in the matter of religion in the offspring. In the third place the delusion about the influence of a Catholic mother prevailing over that of a Protestant father was upset completely by another inquiry. There were 3,455 children of such unions, and of them 1,242 had embraced Protestantism and 1,851 were brought up Catholics. The remaining 362 had no religion at all. On the other hand, it was found that of 61,101 children whose parents were both Catholics 61,017 remained staunch in the faith, and only 30 had lapsed.

There is no wonder that the Church is so insistent in its protests and its appeals against mixed marriages. She is fighting for her life.

Report on Sane Fourth Legislation

"The result is evident: the smallest number of lock-jaw cases and of deaths reported in any year since the Journal began the collection of these statistics, fewer destroyed eyes, fewer maimed bodies, and an astonishing reduction in the number of injuries."

Thus does the Journal of the American Medical Association summarize its report, published August 26, of the great saving in life and limb due to the nation-wide campaign begun more than a decade ago against the old-time celebrations of the Nation's birthday.

The words quoted refer to the decrease in the number of lives lost and in the number of persons injured in Independence Day celebrations last July. In 1903, when the American Medical Association started its annual reports, 872 persons were killed and 4,449 were maimed or otherwise seriously injured in Fourth of July accidents; this year but 67 lost their lives and 1,603 were injured. The report gives interesting information of the good accomplished since the Sane Fourth movement had its inception. In the nine years since 1903, during the day's celebrations, 1,719 persons have been killed—the great majority of them while Sane Fourth legislation was still considered a dream. In that period, too, 37,410 persons were injured. There is a steady rise in the figures of the killed and maimed until 1906. Then the movement began to take active hold, and the figures began to go down until this year, when, as was said, they reached their minimum.

Naturally the improvement is particularly noticeable in the large cities. New York and Chicago used to be especial sufferers in the lists of sad casualties; both of these cities, however, adopted in 1911 the Sane Fourth idea, with happiest results in the tale of the day's accidents.

The Journal of the Association very properly places the responsibility for further amelioration of the evil upon the city governments. Its report says:

"It is up to the city government to decide whether or not the maiming of thousands, the agonizing deaths from lockjaw, and the burning to death of little children by fire from fireworks are to be continued. . . . Prohibitory ordinances are most effective and permanent, as shown by the results in Baltimore, Washington, Cleveland and in other cities, and even restrictive ordinances, if enforced, are effective, as shown in New York, Chicago, Toledo and elsewhere."

A reason of congratulation, too, is the cheering report coming from every section of the land that, in place of the senseless din of former years, more truly patriotic methods have been employed in keeping Independence Day. The more general adoption of positive methods of reform will speedily work unto the desired end, and "our national Independence Day will cease to be a day of destruction and become a day of joy, of recreation, and of enlightenment."

A Militant Catholic

Those who had the pleasure of meeting the Marquis of Villalobar while he represented Spain in Washington will be glad to read of his action at the railway station of Rocío, in Lisbon, shortly after the overthrow of the monarchy. It is taken from the Noticiero de Vigo, a newspaper published near the border. The marquis, who was at the time Spanish representative in Lisbon, had gone down to the railway station to see off some friends who were starting for Spain. Some fifty or sixty nuns, who had been expelled by the Republican Government, were brought under a heavy guard of soldiers to board the same train. Huddled in a corner while the train was being made up, the poor nuns, who thought that their last hour had come, were saying their prayers. This was too much for the drunken soldiers, who took a fiendish delight in hustling them about, pinching and shoving them, with no attention to their tears and cries. Officers of the army and the great Bernardino Machado himself, who is called the brains of the Portuguese republic, looked idly on, and said not a word, made not a sign to those savages. Furious with indignation, the marquis accosted an army officer. "You are unfit," he said, "to wear a uniform and a sword; an honorable officer would suffer himself to be killed rather than consent to these outrages on defenseless women." The officer replied that he could not control his soldiers. The marquis thereupon took his place by the nuns and stood there brandishing his cane and keeping the tipsy soldiers off until the train was ready. He then expressed his feelings to Bernardino Machado, who had been a dumb and unconcerned spectator of the whole proceeding. "A republic born in this way is born in shame," said the marquis. Machado shrugged his shoulders and went out on the platform to receive the plaudits of the crowd and of the soldiers who had been guilty of the unspeakable rudeness towards the nuns.

There are storms and storms. In these Eastern States we are all familiar with the black cloud which suddenly turns day into night and compels all abroad to rush for shelter. At Sissons, in California, a cloud came over the sky the other day, so thick that it stopped a game of baseball; for in the obscurity the flying ball could not be seen. It was not a rain cloud with thunder and lightning in its bosom. It was not a cloud such as pours down hail upon the ripening wheat in the Northwest. It was a cloud of butterflies! Happy California, where the terrors of the air reveal themselves, not in tornados, but in butterflies! Still, a cloud of butterflies, beautiful as it must be, may mean—how many caterpillars?

A Masonic Congress in Rome is announced for September 20th to 24th. If the milder brethren in England and America will only attend, they will hear a typical discussion on the first subject on the program, "What measures shall Masonry take to prevent the ecclesiastical power from influencing the State and interfering with the free development of social progress?" An effort is expected on the part of the "Grand Orient" to dominate the Congress and to extend its control over all Masonry. The expulsion of religious from Italy has been promised for 1912: but the precipitancy in Portugal, whose revolution was originally expected to follow, and not precede, the action of Spain against the Church, and particularly against religious, has upset the Masonic program in a measure. We shall see what we shall see.

MORE COMMENTS ON THE "ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA"

Thus far, excepting a criticism of the article on the "Jesuits," in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," by the Month, not a word of condemnation has been heard from the English Catholic press. The London Tablet almost appears as its apologist. Are the English Catholics afraid to speak even when the most sacred doctrines of their faith are assailed?

The first protest that comes to our office from across the seas is taken from the London Universe:

"It is a pity when English literary methods are so open to distrust that they challenge even the criticism of Transatlantic writers. And it is a thousand times more to be deplored when those methods are exerted in fostering anti-Catholic prejudices. We should have thought such an eminently respectable undertaking as the promoters of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' have set their hand to might at least have been free from statements which would discredit the stump orators of the Protestant Alliance, and might have been left to ignorant fanatics to exploit—if, indeed, they had to fall back upon such weapons! But an editorial in a recent number of AMERICA calls attention in such a trenchant indictment to the fashion in which Catholic questions are dealt with in the 'Encyclopædia' that every English Catholic is bound to reinforce the protest. We pass over the claim that work makes to provide the most 'comprehensive, thorough and absolutely precise statements on every subject of human interest,' as a qualification worthy of an age which is nothing if not self-advertising. But what we cannot pass over, in common with the editor of AMERICA, is the deliberately misleading and absurd glosses given to Catholic subjects.

"At least the promoters of such an ambitious undertaking might have respected their readers, who are presumably educated men and women, if they had not respected the truth—which counts for so little with so many of our critics when writing about the Catholic Church."

"The editors of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' were entirely conservative when they entrusted the preparation of the article on 'vestments' to a Catholic writer. It would not do, however, to ask Catholics to write on questions of historic or theological moment, even when they were best informed and most interested. That evidently would be conceding too much. Is it not conceding too much for Catholics to spend their good money in support of such a work?"—Catholic Transcript.

"No competent and impartial critic of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica'—at least no such critic who is a Catholic—will dissent from this summing up of its defects by Father Campbell, S.J., the editor of AMERICA . . .

"Until such a new and very thoroughly revised edition appears, Catholics may well forego the luxury of heaping coals of fire upon the publishers' heads by purchasing the work."—The Ave Maria.

"Some months ago we were taken to task by the publishers of the new edition of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' for an editorial expression to the effect that, in so far as Catholic topics were concerned, the edition was little if any better than the old, which since the beginning had been notoriously bigoted and unfair.

"Lately the Jesuits have entered the lists and a series of articles has appeared in AMERICA, whose purpose it was to show the utter absurdity of the Encyclopædia's article on the Jesuits, in which were palmed off on the public old, shop-worn travesties of historical and religious truth, interweaving in the story, as Father Campbell says, 'malignant insinuations, incomplete and distorted statements, suppressions of truth, gross errors of fact, together with a continual injection of personal venom which makes the argument the plea of a prejudiced prosecuting and persecuting attorney endeavoring by false testimony to secure the conviction before the bar of public opinion of an alleged culprit.'"—Catholic Chronicle.

From Henry Broughton Sullivan, Detroit:

"Permit me to congratulate you on the fine exposition of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica.' Your article should be published in pamphlet form and given wide distribution. A work like this should be formally condemned also by the Federated Catholic Societies."

From J. C. Starr, attorney at law, Vinita, Okla.:

"I thank you very much for your article dealing with the 'Encyclopædia Britannica.' I was about to buy a set of this new edition, but after reading the criticism in AMERICA showing the unfairness of this 'Encyclopædia' to the Catholic Church I have changed my mind and will not make the purchase. Instead I have purchased 'The Catholic Encyclopedia,' and also the 'New International.'"

From Dr. J. J. Rodman, Owensboro, Ky.:

"Please send me AMERICA for another year. The criticisms of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' are more than worth the price of the journal. I have prevented one sale by telling of the criticisms."

From Col. D. A. Lyle, U. S. A., St. David's, Penna.:

"It is unfortunate that a work designed to be monumental and authoritative should show so many evidences of insular bias and intentional misrepresentation and defamation."

From C. J. Thorburn, New York:

"The 'Encyclopædia Britannica' is so thoroughly unreliable on religious and historical subjects that ignorance is the only excuse for consulting it on those subjects."

From a public official of Clinton, Mass.:

"I regret that I had not a chance to obtain this knowledge two months ago. . . . In assisting to place a set in our Public Library I acted without knowledge of the fact that the 'Encyclopædia' was bigoted and prejudiced. I certainly would not have voted to place a set on our shelves, and I believe the Protestant members on the Library Board would have agreed with me. . . . Your work in showing up the errors of this traducer of our Faith is deserving the gratitude of the Catholic and I should say the whole educational world."

It is interesting to note in this connection that, while Catholics are complaining about the treatment they have received from the "Encyclopædia Britannica," its projectors are quarrelling with each other about a division of the profits. A suit has been filed in the Supreme Court for $5,200,000 damages. We quote from the Times of August 31:

"Walter Montgomery Jackson filed an amended complaint in the Supreme Court yesterday in a suit against Horace Everett Hooper. He alleges that, by the failure of Hooper to carry out the terms of a contract to buy the stock of the Hooper & Jackson Company, Limited, of England, and also to buy the stock of the Encyclopædia Britannica Company, he has suffered damages which he places at $5,200,000.

"With the summons and complaint there was filed a notice that the action would be set down for trial in the Supreme Court in May next:

"The complaint states that Hooper and Jackson owned jointly 9,994 shares, worth about $5 each, of the Hooper & Jackson Company, Limited, and 2,498 shares of the Encyclopædia Britannica Company. These shares represented the entire capital shares of both companies, with the exception of small parts which were issued for corporation purposes. There was also a mention made of a note for $500,000 which Hooper and Jackson owned jointly. In 1908, the plaintiff alleges, disagreements arose between them, and this led to a suit in the Court of Chancery in New Jersey. To settle all the trouble, Jackson alleges, Hooper agreed to purchase all the stock of both corporations within three months from the date of the instrument, and in the case of failure he was to forfeit $25,000. A copy of the agreement shows that the purchaser was to insure his life for $1,000,000 for the benefit of the Hooper & Jackson Company and was to make a payment of $750,000 in installments. There were provisions, too, that no employee was to receive more than $10,000 yearly.

"The complaint alleged that employees were paid excessive salaries and that the litigation in the New Jersey court had caused excessive damages to the eleventh edition of the 'Encyclopædia,' the work on which had to be suspended because of disagreements between the principal stockholders."

A DIFFERENT VITERBO

At the present time the name Viterbo conjures up unpleasant pictures in men's minds. It is the town where the shrieking Camorristi in the iron cage, which is planted in the very sanctuary of an old dismantled church, are being tried in the most unusual fashion for a long series of crimes which seem to run through the life of every one of them. It is like a scene of the Inferno. But at the beginning of this month quite another spectacle was to be witnessed in the same little town, and it may not be inopportune to recall it, as a relief from the horrors of the court-room in the ruined church.

In medieval days, when everyone was more or less engaged in violent and prolonged quarrels with his neighbor, it is possible, indeed highly probable, that Viterbo, the "city of fountains and beautiful women," was a lively spot in which to reside.

It still in this twentieth century remains decidedly medieval in character, but the excitements of its stormy past are now entirely omitted from its program. It is picturesque, eminently so, and artistically beautiful, but it is in addition one of the most melancholy-looking towns in Italy, and not only the superfluities of modern existence, but also a certain number of its necessities are conspicuously absent from within its gates.

Once a year, however, on the third and fourth of September, it awakes from slumber after the fashion of the sleeping beauty at the prince's kiss, and assumes a temporary rôle of animation very unlike its usual condition of dreamy languor. The hotels, such as they are, are filled to overflowing, pilgrims and visitors arrive from far and near, everyone who possesses a spare room promptly lets it, and the gloomy, narrow streets are crowded with strangers.

It was in 1664, when the plague was devastating Italy, that the Viterbese made a solemn vow to their youthful patron, St. Rose, that they would annually carry her statue in procession around the town if she would obtain their deliverance from the scourge. Their prayers were answered, and every year the procession of the Macchina—one of the most quaintly picturesque sights to be seen in Italy—takes place on the eve of the festa. After Vespers have been sung in the Church of Santa Rosa, where the saint's body lies in a gorgeous silver sarcophagus, the streets are lined with soldiers and Carabinieri, and a burst of martial music heralds the approach of the famous Macchina. This imposing looking structure measures sixteen metres in height, and is composed of carved wood and painted cardboard, and each tier is illuminated with hundreds of candles.

The statue of St. Rose in her Tertiary habit, a wreath of her namesake blossoms on her head, crowns the summit, carved figures of the twelve Apostles stand below, and pictures representing various episodes in the saint's brief but eventful career are painted in each one of the revolving sides. It is borne on the shoulders of sixty-four men, dressed in medieval costumes of white and crimson, such as one sees in the frescoes of Pinturicchio, and it gleams through the dusk of the September night like a tower of living flame. Windows and balconies are draped with gaudily tinted tapestries and vivid crimson hangings, and twinkle with gaily colored lanterns, and the southern moon shines down upon a somewhat motley crowd of spectators.

There are English and American sight-seers, and German tourists, dignified monsignori from Rome, smartly gowned Italian women from Florence or Milan, Bersaglieri in their heavily plumed hats, seminarists in sable-hued cassocks, Viterbese peasants in bright hued dresses, and here and there are to be seen the brown habit of the Carmelite and the black and white of the Dominican Friar. Slowly and in a stately manner the Macchina proceeds through the principal streets and squares of Viterbo, until it arrives at the little Piazza di Santa Rosa, and there, after a momentary pause for rest, its bearers rapidly ascend the steep incline leading to the Poor Clare Convent.

Here, just outside the church, they relinquish their heavy burden, which remains on view during the next two days. The evening of the feast itself is devoted to a brilliant display of fireworks, when the Macchina gleams out resplendently amongst the set pieces and is greeted with roars of applause, and by the fifth or sixth of September the influx of visitors has departed and the residents of Viterbo resume the even tenor of their way in a spot where it may appropriately be said that it is "always afternoon."

GRACE V. CHRISTMAS.

LITERATURE

The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vols. X (Mass-Newman) and XI (New Mexico-Philip). New York: Robert Appleton Company.

Should a conscientious reviewer give these two volumes all the space their importance deserves many pages of AMERICA would be needed to hold all his words of appreciation. Though books of little permanent interest or usefulness are often too fully noticed in our Catholic journals, the successive volumes of an epoch-marking work like this encyclopedia sometimes receive a rather scanty review. This, however, is due not so much to any lack of good will on the reviewer's part, as to the embarrassment he experiences in choosing out of so many riches those that would give his readers an adequate idea of the Encyclopedia's value. For to pass judgment on all the important subjects in one of these volumes is of course out of the question. Nor should he make his review a mere catalogue of the topics treated. So the course he finally adopts is to enlarge upon those articles he himself considers most important and interesting.

Though many of Macaulay's finest essays were written originally for an encyclopedia, readers nowadays hardly expect to find in a book which is essentially one of facts and information much literary embellishment. Mgr. Barry's sympathetic sketch of Newman, however, is most attractively written, as is the account of the Oxford Movement by the same author. But his long article on the parables some may find too diffuse for an encyclopedia, while others may miss in the appended bibliography the name of Father Fonck, S.J., who has written a good book on the parables.

M. Georges Goyau, assistant editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes has been a generous contributor to both these volumes. He has packed into twelve pages an admirable sketch of Napoleon I which throws a flood of light on the emperor's dealings with the Church and the Pope. Goyau, with the aid of lately discovered documents, tells us, for instance, just what was done at Napoleon's Gallican council. Napoleon III, Mazarin and Montalembert are also justly dealt with by this author, while the history and description of many French dioceses, including that of Paris, are likewise from his pen.

Catholics whom the assertions of writers on Comparative Religions have caused disquiet should read carefully Father Martindale's paper on Paganism. To those who point in triumph to the striking resemblances between Catholic ritual and that of many pagan rites the author concedes that "many forms of self-expression must needs be identical, in varying times, places, cults, as long as human nature is the same. Water, oil, light, incense, singing, procession, prostration, decoration of altars, vestments of priests, are naturally at the service of universal religious instinct." But the fact with its consequences that this learned Jesuit emphasizes is that "Christianity first and alone of religions has preached as one of its central doctrines the value of the individual soul."

Many subscribers to "The Catholic Encyclopedia" on receiving the tenth volume probably turned at once to "Modernism" to find that subject clearly and thoroughly discussed by Father Vermeesch, S.J., the well-known canonist of Louvain, who also sets right many enquirers into the nature of religious obedience. In these two volumes there are perhaps no dogmatic subjects of more importance than Penance and the Mass. The first was assigned to the Rev. Dr. E. J. Hanna, professor of dogma at the Rochester Seminary, and the second to Father Pohle, of the University of Breslau. The length and completeness of each of these articles give them the character of a full treatise, and as the Holy Sacrifice and Confession are often two big stumbling blocks to groping Protestants, the authors have done well to make a great deal of historical arguments.

Owing to the onslaughts of destructive criticism on the early books of the Old Testament, Father Maas' article on the Pentateuch had to be some fourteen double-column pages in length. The reasoning and conclusions of this eminent Scripture scholar will arm timid Catholics who read them against the sophistries and labored hypotheses of modern rationalists.

The Rev. Hugh I. Henry, the Rector of the Catholic High School in Philadelphia, continues to supply erudite papers to the department of hymnology that he has made peculiarly his own, and quotes from some of his felicitous translations of the Church's liturgy. Father Crivelli, S.J., has contributed a paper on Mexico that will serve as a strong counterblast against the sweeping charges and exaggerations of Prescott and his school with regard to the Spanish conquest and occupation of that country, and in the same volume a long and learned article appears on the history of medicine, written by Dr. Leopold Senfelder, the University of Vienna's authority on the subject.

In volume XI the late Cardinal Moran has left us an appreciation of the life and work of St. Patrick; Father Prat, S.J., an exhaustive study of the life and writings of St. Paul, while Father Van Der Heeren, of the Bruges Seminary, makes his story of St. Peter a good arsenal for Catholic controversialists. A sketch, however, of Pascal, by the Rev. Joseph Lataste, of the Landes Seminary, seems to give the author of "Les Provinciales" credit for good faith and honesty that that genius' methods of composition and style of writing will hardly bear out.

The title "Papal Arbitration" is likely to attract the attention of an age so much given to discussing peace as ours is. Father Jarrett, O.P., gives a list of the historical instances of the success the Popes have had in promoting, by their intervention, peace among nations. Nowadays, however, not Popes but dreadnaughts seem to be considered the strongest factors in keeping the world's peace.

In Volume XI all the famous Catholic "O's," from Daniel O'Connell to Boyle O'Reilly, are gathered, while Mgr. Kirsch, of Fribourg, and Father Ott, the Minnesota Benedictine, are generous contributors to the bibliographical riches of both volumes. Mgr. Benigni, too, continues to tell about Italian bishoprics, Father Hudleston, of Downside, handles well the wide subject, Western Monasticism, and Dom Gasquet is, of course, at home in treating of the suppression of the English monasteries. Many Sisters, it is gratifying to see, have been induced to write the history of their congregations, and Father Elliott tells the story of the Paulists.

By far the longest article in these two volumes is Catholic Periodical Literature, for it fills twenty-five pages. Dr. Herbermann, editor-in-chief of the Encyclopedia, writes the introduction, and then the account of each nation's Catholic press is given by competent contributors, Mr. Thomas F. Meehan speaking for the United States. Those, however, whose inclinations are for the more abstruse questions of theology and philosophy will not be disappointed in these two latest volumes of this monumental work, if they will turn to Father Prat's Originism, to Dr. Pohle's Molinism, to Father Chapman's Monothelitism, to Dr. Driscoll's Miracle, or to Dr. Turner's Metaphysics, while the general reader cannot but be interested in Mgr. Mooney's history of the New York Archdiocese, in Dr. Walsh's account of Pasteur's life and services, or in Father Thurston's valuable contributions to the history of how our liturgy and popular devotions developed.

But were the reviewer to undertake to say a word of commendation about all the leading articles that merit it, before his task is done, "Diem clauso componet vesper Olympo." Even the mere perusal of the eight hundred pages in each of these volumes of solid scholarship cannot but make Catholics proud of this new Encyclopedia. The same high standard of excellence in the binding, presswork and choice of illustrations that characterized the earlier volumes is still maintained.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

Children's Books.

To give a boy or a girl, a young man or a young woman, something that will be a solace and a stay, a strong shield in the stress of life is assuredly no small gift. Is not the love of books such a gift?

"Books we know,

Are a substantial world both pure and good;
Round these, with tendrils strong as flesh and blood,
Our pastime and our happiness will grow."

Year after year, what are called schemes of literature are being elaborated and imposed upon our high schools, so that many a student comes to look upon literature as a great barrier over which he must pass, a sepulchral sort of thing, full of dead men's bones which in some way or other he must get by on his way to college.

It may be doubted whether a love for books is created by a continual analytic and technical handling of an author, or by the ceaseless tide of matter pertaining to the life and times of the writer whose work is being studied. These have their benefits, but we fear they are being pushed too far nowadays and are becoming an end, instead of a means.

What we should aim at, is to inspire in the young a love for books in themselves, to create in their impressionable minds and hearts an appreciation of the best and noblest that has been done and thought in the world. It is a sad thing to meet persons who have gone through years of schooling and who yet seem impervious to the pleasure, the interest and the ennobling influence of a good book.

The ways are legion in which a love for reading may make itself felt in one's life. How often in a man's career there are moments, nay hours and days when his dollar-hunting thirst is quenched for the time, or his search for pleasure grows wearisome or his honest toil leaves him with hardened heart as well as hardened hands! He would shake the dust from off his feet and rise higher. He looks for something whereby his "pastime and his happiness will grow;" alas—he never learned to love books, he has no power to lift himself from within, and rushes out to the glitter and the glare, the tumbling, tossing torrent of pleasure. Here he finds his rest.

Truly

"The world is too much with us; late and soon, Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers."

How much of hope and love and lasting happiness would enter into men's lives could they but sit by their own firesides under the charm of a good book! To many life would be something more than a "Tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury," signifying nothing, if they could cultivate a love for books. Idleness, being the devil's workshop, would soon vanish, and less sin, less unhappiness, less love of pleasure would be the result of spare hours spent in the company of good books.

Of course it will be answered: Our children by the thousands are cultivating this love for books. See them in the libraries and reading-rooms devouring them! But what are the young people devouring? Is it that world of books which is both "pure and good"? We fear not; fiction is the all-absorbing book-food of most school children, and certainly the greater portion of modern fiction is not "pure and good"—it falls far short of the old masters of nineteenth century story-telling, and leaves no ennobling impression on the soul, so the teacher who educates a class or even a few individual members of a class to a love of something higher than fiction is a power for good in the land.

Ruskin says somewhere that it is not intended that man should live always in the midst of the noblest scenes or earth; that he injures them by his presence, he ceases to feel them if he be always with them. We may add: Nor is it intended that man live in the midst of the meanest scenes of earth; by his very nature he grows tired playing with the trifles of time, the appeal to his lower nature gradually weakens; in literature as in life he grows weary of the flesh-pots of Egypt, and like the faithless queen in the Idylls—after wandering about in "voluptuous pride" for "warmth and color," he finally brings himself to admit:

"Ah, my God,

What might I not have made of thy fair world,
Had I but loved thy highest creature here?
It was my duty to have loved the highest:
It surely was my profit had I known:
It would have been my pleasure had I seen.
We needs must love the highest when we see it."

Manual de Estudios Bíblicos Arreglado para los países de Lengua Castellana. Por el Doctor DON MANUEL LAGO Y GONZALEZ, Obispo de Osma. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.15 net.

This is a Spanish version of Doctor Andrew Brüll's learned and popular work, "Bibelkunde für höhere Lehranstalten," for teachers and self-improvement. "Solidity, precision, clearness and order are the gifts which shine on every page of the book." Nearly half the work is devoted to the Bible, to the nature of inspiration, and to the canonicity of the books of the Bible. Biblical geography, with special reference to the political institutions of Palestine and adjacent countries, claims forty pages; but the chapters on the sacred persons and places and the religious rites of the Jews will prove particularly informing to the young teacher and not to the young teacher exclusively. Three maps, many photo-engravings, and an alphabetical index are features of the book.

A wag of a correspondent writes to the Catholic Herald of India: "I should like to hear some particulars about Chicago's Vice Commission. It is very interesting. A Commission of 30 men (as many as there are days in the month) investigated 52 cities (as many as there are weeks in the year). In many (may be in 12, since there are 12 months in the year) of those cities conditions were found to be worse than they are in Chicago. In some (I reckon in seven; there are seven days in a week) they were found to be better.—Queer things in America, really!"

Teachers of the classics who have had difficulty in impressing upon their pupils what great moral strength is born of knowing perfectly all the tense changes of Greek mute verbs or of being able to "run across the page with didomi," will be interested in "Practical Notes on the Regular Verbs," a pamphlet prepared for his boys by the Rev. J. I. Ziegler, S.J., of Loyola College, Baltimore, Md.

Henry Holt & Co. are sending out a second edition of J. W. and A. M. Cruickshank's "Christian Rome," an excellent guide-book for tourists visiting the City of the Popes. Catholics will find scarcely anything in the book to offend them, and those who make none but fireside pilgrimages to Rome may read the book with pleasure and profit.

EDUCATION

This is the season when the "great dailies" throughout the country publish, what they term, "our Education number." The initiated will not need to be told that the "Education number" depends, for its size and greatness, on the number of school advertisements collected by zealous canvassers and which balance an offering of essays on education by learned experts in the school world. To be sure, the business managers of the metropolitan dailies, while fully aware of the cash value of successful "special numbers," are entirely too shrewd to allow the commercial phase of their enterprise to obtrude itself upon the readers of such issues. Some such alluring notice as the following, copied verbatim from a leading New York journal, usually introduces the "Education number":

* * *

"By no means the least interesting feature for summer readers is the annual series of Talks by Educators, conducted by men foremost in college and preparatory school work, who discuss vital phases of the teaching problem. Now is the time of year when parents are choosing preparatory schools, the growing importance of which is recognized. Discussion, therefore, of educational problems is appropriate. The series [to run in the journal quoted] will include the following articles." Then follows a list of titles covering a multitude of educational topics that cannot fail to stir the susceptibility of one interested in the ever living "school question."

* * *

To be sure, again, the keen business man who plans the attraction of the "special number" of his paper, while keeping all thoughts of his expected profits severely in the background, is not entirely unselfish in his project. There is a delicious naïveté in his suggestion, then, that advertising space in his "special numbers" ought to prove profitable to schools and colleges. "While these articles," to quote further the well-known New York daily already referred to, "are published solely for their educational value, yet schools and colleges will find the above issues unusually profitable ones in which to use display advertising, because of their effect in directing the thoughts of parents to the school question, and, as a natural corollary, to the schools themselves that conform to the highest scholastic standards." And another enterprising New York daily clinches this aspect of its announcement of an "education number" with the boast that it "prints more school advertisements and is read by more persons with the means to send their children to private schools and colleges than any other newspaper in the world."

* * *

We do not mean, it is hardly necessary to say, in our allusion to this topic, to criticize a perfectly legitimate enterprise on the part of newspaper publishers. The educational talks by learned experts, which these special numbers contain, are usually informing, often helpful, and never lacking in interest of some kind. But we confess a certain surprise, that grows with each year's output of such educational issues. Why is it that, in the long lists of "experts" quoted in them, there is scarcely ever found a Catholic name? Why is it that, in the outpouring of wisdom touching every conceivable topic of educational work and thought, scarcely a single Catholic opinion is found to be worth printing. This in the face of the fact that advertisements of Catholic schools and colleges are quite as eagerly sought by canvassers and quite as cordially welcomed in counting rooms as are those offered by non-Catholic school heads.

* * *

In a land where fair play is held in high esteem, one must be slow to hint at a conspiracy of silence on the part of the press in reference to the educational work done by and among Catholics. Yet it is not easy to find other explanation of what seems to be a studied omission of Catholic experts from these lists. Surely no one will deny that we have men quite as able, quite as well worth listening to as any of those whose names are thus honored. A report recently presented to the National Council of the Knights of Columbus, meeting in Detroit, gives glowing testimony to the fact that there is no lagging on the part of our Catholic educators in the matter or provision of opportunities for higher education, whilst the success achieved in our parochial system of schools is universally conceded. We have to-day eight strong universities in this country, whose faculty members are making themselves felt and heard on many important subjects. All of these schools are looked up to by the various educational associations throughout the country as maintaining excellent standards, and their work, as proved by results, is singularly successful. Yet rare is the exception that marks their honorable mention by the press, or that gives place to an opinion on some phase of the educational problem by one of their capable experts.

* * *

Meantime we Catholics, mildly grateful for small favors, are serenely content to be thus ignored. Nay more, the heads of our schools and colleges and the responsible leaders among us are painfully slow to make the one protest against this unfair discrimination which would prove effective. In the display advertising which these "unusually profitable" opportunities attract Catholic schools and colleges appear to be no mean investors, and when the returns from the counting room are satisfactory, what cares the publisher for the alleged conspiracy of silence some of us find in his special numbers?

* * *

There is an inconsistency about us Catholics that makes for weakness where we should be strong. We have an excellent school system, ranging from the work of elementary instruction to the most advanced higher training; we have free schools and private schools and colleges and universities; we must, in loyalty to the faith that we profess, acknowledge that there is extreme danger of the loss of that faith on the part of Catholic students who seek educational advantages in non-Catholic schools; we must, if reliable reports are accepted, acknowledge that, in our day, there is no excuse for the sending of Catholic young men and women to secular institutions on the score that they are likely to obtain there a better training. It is possible this may be true in some of the technical branches of university work, but in all that makes for a liberal education Catholic schools for boys and girls and for young men and young women are to-day doing quite as good work as that accomplished in non-Catholic schools. Yet some of us entrust our little ones to schools from which religious instruction is banished; we send our boys and girls to academies and high schools and so-called "preparatory schools" whose teachers do not consider religion of sufficient value to make it worth while to belong to any church or to profess any faith; we find a certain pride in the fact that our young men and young women are matriculates of universities the whole atmosphere of which is agnostic if not atheistic.

* * *

More surprising still, educators among us, who surely ought to know better, ape the ways of unreligious schools, show a fondness for the fads and methods marking the supposedly advanced and progressive system of secular schools, and evince a disposition to discard text-books long in merited honor among us, in order to introduce into their classes substitutes popular among teachers of non-religious schools. One might safely infer from that same popularity the likelihood of a non-Catholic bias, or at least of indifference to religion, if not of a peculiarly dangerous naturalism little apt to be helpful to Catholic minds. And yet, as AMERICA has often reminded its readers, there is now coming to be a very general recognition of the fact that the conservative methods of Catholic institutions have done much better service in the cause of education than the advanced methods and means thus seemingly preferred; while there is a daily growing appreciation of the fact that to be old-fashioned is immeasurably better than to be new-fangled where, as in educational work, experience counts so much more than experiments.

One might add that other detail of what some one has well called our "perplexing inconsistency." Catholic teachers, who insist with their pupils that the atmosphere of non-Catholic schools cannot fail to prove injurious to the purity of Catholic faith, do themselves seek the supposed distinction that hedges round those who follow the courses of non-Catholic advanced schools. Despite warnings given, and despite the sense of danger that bitter experience has too often proved to exist, even this last summer we have had reports of numbers of Catholic teachers registered in universities whose boast it is that they enjoy the freedom from religious influences which absolute separation from religious teaching assures. One is curious to learn what these good people will answer, when their own example is quoted against their arguments touching the dangers bound to meet a Catholic young man or woman matriculating in these same schools. Surely they will not be able to plead their special needs and their purpose to do special work. Our own Catholic University in Washington, to say nothing of other institutions East and West, offered these Catholic teachers this past summer every possible facility in courses usually followed in Summer School sessions anywhere.

* * *

The root of the evil is easily uncovered. There is unfortunately among us in educational matters, as in many other features of our social life, a lack of that solidarity which means strength. In the advertising to which we referred at the beginning of this article, as in the copying of fads and methods and books and systems, we show a lack of appreciation of what we have. There is a too ready tendency to find better things among those who ignore us, largely because we ourselves lack the self-assertiveness to make our influence measure up to its proper standard. "As a rule," to quote again from the report to the Knights of Columbus Supreme Council above referred to, "Catholics are not nearly so familiar with what is being accomplished by our people as they ought to be. This is particularly true with regard to education, art, literature and music. Every Catholic should make it his business to know what Catholics are accomplishing in these lines. We have more than our share of the literary men, of poets and of artists who are doing things worth while in this country, and the like is come to be true of education as well."

* * *

The writer is not minded to arouse any contentious antagonism. There is no call for warring measures in order that the evil complained of find a fitting remedy. But there is need that we be true to ourselves and loyal to the principles we must advocate if we mean to be Catholic. And nowhere is this loyalty more imperatively required than in the difficult up-hill struggle the Catholics of this country must wage to safeguard the educational training of their children.

A PLEA FOR PEACE.

According to the distinguished economist M. Jules Roche the war that may break out at any moment in Europe will be a very expensive indulgence for all concerned. It will be quite unlike the local disturbances which the world has witnessed hitherto. They did not interfere, at least to a very great extent, with the production and transportation of provisions, as for instance the Crimean and Italian wars, and the struggle between Austria and Prussia. Nor did the effect on the finances and markets of the world come as a sudden shock, nor was the blow they dealt fatal. Even the terrible war of 1870-71, which in its extent and intensity had consequences of a kind that the world had never seen before, did not prevent, though it checked to some extent, the continuance of previous economic conditions, nor did it call for daily outlays of an overwhelming and disastrous character. The war was only between two nations, and involved altogether only sixty-six millions of people, namely, the population of both countries.

But to-day, if a general war breaks out there will be another condition of affairs. It will mean that there will be from ten to twelve million soldiers in the field and 2,000 war vessels on the seas. It will affect every detail of the daily life of two hundred millions of human beings.

We may approximate the amount involved by a glance at the cost of the war of 1870. That, in round figures, called for an outlay of 8,330,000 francs a day, without including ulterior expenses. These 8,330,000 francs a day would suppose a force of 600,000 men in the field, without counting the reserves in the camps or the various departments, and would mean 13 francs 88 centimes a day per man.

But in a general war there would no longer be question of 14 francs a day for 600,000 men, for there would be a universal mobilization of troops, and it could be shown, documents in hand, that an expense of five milliards (without counting the five other milliards that would be needed to reimburse the various savings banks—thus running up to ten milliards) would be needed for the first two months of the war, with a further expense of 30,000,000 a day at the minimum. A milliard is a thousand millions.

An eminent economist, M. Schaffle, the former Austrian Minister of Commerce, arrived at similar figures in 1896, when he set about computing the expenses of a general war. He reckoned it would mean 27 millions for France, 27 for Germany, 13 for Austria, 28 for Russia; then adding Italy, England, Bulgaria and Turkey, it would run up to 150,000,000 per day for the necessary war expenses, not counting the initial expense, which would be much greater, of putting the fighting machines in motion.

But that calculation was made in 1896. To-day the estimate would have to be much higher. The contending parties would have to spend four milliards and a half every month without counting the other demands on the budget. Moreover, what would be the internal condition of the countries themselves?

When obliged to furnish such an enormous increase in their expenses, the question arises how could they produce a corresponding necessary increase in their resources? Instead of being able to do more work, so as to increase their available funds, the nations at war would see their very means of subsistence vanish, for there would be a general paralysis of their productive powers. The universal mobilization of troops would empty the factories and foundries and farms, and the consequent suspension of work would leave little or nothing to do for those remaining at home. Even individual enterprise would be useless, for there would be no one to buy, no money to pay, and no means of transportation, and although some men might be left in the factories, yet as factory work is very complex and dependent on each section, there would be nothing left but to close the shops, if even one section of the hands, or a part of them, were drawn off. It would be pretty much the same thing for farming operations. Thus those who were drafted could not produce anything, and those who remained at home could not gain even their own daily bread, and of course the price of living would rise enormously.

In 1870 the international economic life of Europe did not suffer. The nations that were at peace continued to be producers, and England, Austria-Hungary, Italy and Russia had a foreign commerce of from 17 to 18 milliards. But in the case of a general war there would be no foreign commerce anywhere. Thus the actual losses would be enormous. For England alone it would mean 30 milliards a year, for Germany 20, for France 13, that is to say it would mean a suppression of business to the extent of 83 millions a day for England, 64 millions a day for Germany, and 41 millions a day for France. All this would occur abruptly at the first booming of the cannon. Navigation would no longer be safe, nor railroad travel. There would be no more buying or selling, no more international commerce, and at the same time there would be a suspension of all domestic activity in every civilized nation. The heart of the whole economic organism would cease to beat just at the moment when the greatest muscular effort and the quickest arterial circulation would be required, and even the little nations like Switzerland, Holland and Belgium, that would not be in the melee, would feel the shock. Such is the rigorously exact formula that would be followed in the supposition of a general European war at this stage of our material civilization.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

A CATHOLIC FEDERATION FOR BENGAL.

Writing to approve a suggestion lately strongly urged by the Catholic Herald of India, the Illustrated Catholic Missions has the following to say concerning the importance of Catholic Federation to-day. Its excellent treatment of the topic deserves the widest circulation:

"We read with great pleasure of the proposed formation of a Catholic Association for Bengal, India. The Catholic Herald of India deserves great credit for the way it has championed in its columns the cause of Federation or Association for Catholics in India, and we hope that the Catholic Association for Bengal, which is to be inaugurated after the return of the Archbishop of Calcutta from Rome, and which is apparently the result of the stirring appeals for such a movement in India by the above-mentioned Catholic weekly, will be but the beginning of a series of Associations on similar lines throughout India.

"It is most important, at the present day, that Catholics unite to defend their rights, safeguard their interests, and discuss the ways and means of doing so in the most effective manner possible. In the English-speaking countries where no Catholic dailies exist, where comparatively few Catholics read a Catholic weekly, it is well-nigh impossible to interest Catholic laypeople in the affairs of Church, except by Associations or Federations which, by means of meetings, lectures and debates, draw Catholics together in social intercourse, keep them well informed upon questions which affect their religious and even material interests, inflame them with zeal for the protection, and train them in the defence of, these interests.

"How many are there not who consider themselves perfect models of Catholics, because they attend Mass, receive the Sacraments at regular intervals, take an interest in local Catholic affairs, but who do not trouble themselves in the least about the grave questions agitating the country in which Catholic interests are involved, show no sympathy to their fellow-Catholics in persecuted lands; in a word, are not interested in Catholic matters outside the limits of their own parish? Can we wonder at this when we are told that they do not read a Catholic paper, that they do not associate with any Catholics except those living in their own immediate neighborhood, and that they busy themselves only about the salvation of their own souls? Take such Catholics from their isolated position, band them together in Associations or Federations having for their object the discussion of matters affecting their interests as Catholics, and the protection of these interests, and by degrees, as their range of vision widens, as the example of the zeal of their fellow-associates begins to exercise its influence upon them, these same people will become most earnest champions of the Catholic cause, and the Church will be considerably the gainer.

"We, therefore, wish the Catholic Association for Bengal whose statutes are now being framed, a happy inauguration, a long and successful career afterwards, and at the same time express the hope that it will find many imitators in other parts of India."

PERSONAL.

It is with great pleasure that we announce the appointment by Mayor Gaynor of a distinguished member of the staff of AMERICA, Mr. Thomas F. Meehan, to a place on the Board of Directors of the Brooklyn Public Library. Mr. Meehan is eminently qualified for the post. His life has been spent in literary work, and he is a recognized authority on the ecclesiastical history of the United States. The esteem in which he is held personally will add to the gratification which will be everywhere felt by this very judicious selection.

The St. Paul, Minn., Catholic Bulletin of August 26 says:

"Last week a rumor was circulated to the effect that the Right Rev. James Trobec, D.D., Bishop of St. Cloud, had resigned owing to ill-health which prevented him from attending to his episcopal duties. The Catholic Bulletin is in a position to state authoritatively that there is not a particle of truth in this rumor. It is devoid of any foundation in fact. The Bishop himself knows nothing about it. His health is excellent; in fact, it has not been better for many years. He performs all his episcopal functions himself, and attends to his correspondence without the aid of a secretary."

SCIENCE

During the year 1910, according to the official report just published by the U. S. Department of Forestry, 63,266,271 gallons of creosote and 16,802,502 gallons of zinc chloride were consumed in impregnating woods to prolong their lifetime. The zinc chloride used was exclusively a domestic product, whereas the greater part of the creosote was of European importation. Approximately 100 million feet of timber was treated. The creosote treatment was by far the more popular.

As heat transferences can only be affected by one of three ways, viz., conduction, convection, or radiation, by measuring the temperature of isothermal regions of the atmosphere, in which both convection and conduction are a minimum, it is possible to determine the variation intensity of the earth at as many places as desired. Prof.

Humphreys, of the U. S. Weather Bureau reports, after an extensive exploration of the upper atmosphere with sounding balloons, that, probably because of the unequal distribution of cirri, the intensity of the earth's escaping radiation within the tropics is to that of latitude 35 degrees to 60 degrees, approximately in the ratio of 3 to 4. He further claims that as a radiator the earth has an efficient equatorial zone, efficient zones of middle latitude, and with some certainty, inefficient polar caps.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The congregation of SS. Peter and Paul's Church, Mankato, Minn., recently dedicated a new $45,000 structure, to be known as the Loyola Club House. It is meant to become the social centre not of any particular class or section of the church membership, as is ordinarily the case, but of the entire parish.

"You have begun a unique movement in the United States, nay, in the entire world it is only one of its kind," said the Rev. A. J. Spirig, S.J. "Your clubhouse is built on the broadest social basis. All clubhouses in existence are only for one or another class of people, for one or another society; your clubhouse is a universal parish affair: for young and old, men and women, girls and boys. It is an immense family house for the whole parish, where all classes join and gather as children of God in Christian education and instruction. As true children of Mother Church you have worked for the grandest social principle."

The Right Rev. Patrick R. Heffron and Governor A. O. Eberhart likewise delivered addresses upon the occasion, at which were present numerous priests, city officials and other men of prominence.

In these days of war between the Bishops of France and the heads of the atheistical schools, it is interesting to hear Prof. Jules, of Aix-en-Provence, and author of a school manual prohibited by ecclesiastical authorities, giving his opinion on the pontificate of Pius X. Writing in the "Volume," a publication edited by himself, the free-thinker sharply reproves a certain class of critics for hostile remarks on the tenth Pius. "He is perhaps the greatest Pope which the Church has had for a long period," writes Prof. Jules. "He is Catholic before all things else, and it is that which strikes you. Pius X has restored the Faith in its purity and strength. Each of his decisions provokes renewed astonishment. What does it matter? It is necessary to choose; to be a Catholic or to be nothing. Pius X is right."

A remarkable congress took place at Namur, in Belgium, last week. It was organized by the Agricultural League of Belgium, and its purpose, as announced in the official call, is the restoration of Christian life in the family. The object of the meeting last week was to demonstrate the necessity of associating all social and family questions with religion; to establish that religion is essential in all ages and in all circumstances; that it ought to inspire the education of the child, form the character of the youth, sustain the efforts of the man, and soften the sufferings incident to old age. The published program shows the Congress meant to deal with many and varied topics touching this central thought. The presidents of the new association are the Bishop of Namur, the Governor of the Province and the Abbot of St. Benedict's at Maredsous, in Namur. The organizers hope to develop their organization into a great international association.

The most recent returns about the religious condition of Berlin shows the number of Evangelical Christians to be 1,704,612; Roman, Greek and Old Catholics, 223,948; Jews, 98,893; professing no religion, 1,733. Thus of the total population seven-twentieths are Evangelical, one-ninth Catholic, and one-twentieth Jews. One hundred years ago, namely, in 1811, there were only 4,161 Catholics in Berlin. In the same period the Jews have increased from 3,292 to 98,893. The Evangelicals have dropped from 95.6 per cent. to 83.54 per cent. Since 1900 the Catholics have shown the largest growth. The Evangelicals mostly reside in the northern part of the city, the Catholics in the western part, and the Jews in the King's quarter in old Berlin and in the western portion of the suburbs. Divorces in Germany are heavily on the increase. The official statistics for the year 1909, just published, show that the average of 120,000 divorces a year for the five years preceding rose in 1909 to 141,730. Marriages also continue to increase, however, the total for 1909 having been over 400,000, or at the rate of 80 persons to every 1,000 of the population.

The German Protestant organ, Deutsch-Evangelische Korrespondenz, is in a ferment of excitement because German students are making the spiritual exercises of St. Ignatius in the Jesuit house at Emmerich, Holland. Indignantly it asks: "Can those to whom the youth of our country is entrusted sit quietly by while the future leaders of our people are being drilled in the foreign institutions of the Jesuits, by men whose activities are at the same time legally interdicted in the Fatherland?" The exercises are being given in a German institution by German Jesuits exiled for their loyalty to the Faith. It is pitiful to think that even to-day, in a Protestant country, where irreligion is free to teach whatever doctrine it pleases, and Socialism may announce from the open platform its intention to sweep away government and religion alike, bigotry can not rest satisfied with having driven into exile a body of devoted and self-sacrificing teachers, who would be the true strength of the Fatherland against its enemies, but must follow them with an implacable hatred even into a foreign land. This is truly to cut off one's nose to spite one's face.

It will grieve all lovers of ancient architectural monuments to know that the mosque of Saint Sophia, at Constantinople, is threatened with utter ruin. The present edifice dates from A.D. 537, when it was erected by the Emperor Justinian as a Catholic Church, in atonement for an awful massacre of the people which he had ordered during a public disturbance. The building was used as a church, now Catholic, now schismatic, as the varying political fortunes of Constantinople dictated, until 1453, when the city fell into the hands of the Turks. The great church which Justinian had dedicated to our Blessed Lord, "in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead corporeally," under the title of Holy Wisdom (Agia Sophia), was then transformed into a Mohammedan mosque, and as such it has remained. The building measures 269 feet in length by 243 feet in breadth. In its construction, the whole empire was laid under contribution for precious marbles. Columns from the ruined temple of Diana at Ephesus and from the temple of the Sun at Rome were brought to the Bosphorus, to enhance the splendor of the pile. But time and dampness and earthquake and conflagration and bombardment have combined and conspired to reduce the once proud cathedral to the condition of a crumbling ruin. The eastern wall is out of plumb, and gaping fissures rise on all sides to the very dome, one hundred and seventy-five feet above the ground. Signor Marongoni, the Italian architect, who restored the campanile of St. Mark at Venice, was called in by the Turkish government to give his opinion on the outlay necessary to restore the Constantinople basilica. His estimate was five million dollars, a sum so considerable that no further steps were taken at the time. At present a commission composed of Italians, Frenchmen and Turks is studying the question; but, as business moves in Turkey, the building will probably collapse before the government reaches the point of putting the recommendations of the commission to use.

OBITUARY

The Rt. Rev. Mgr. Anthony Lammel, for many years a revered leader among the German Catholics of the upper East side of Manhattan Borough, died August 19, at St. Francis' Hospital, in the Bronx, his death following an acute attack of heart disease. Twenty-three years ago he was called to preside over St. Joseph's (German) Catholic parish. The charge was no easy one to fill, since he replaced the beloved Jesuit priest, Father Joseph Durthaller, who had done such excellent work in organizing the Catholic Germans in that district of New York and in building the church in East Eighty-seventh street. Mgr. Lammel's long and successful career among his countrymen is the best evidence of the good judgment of his bishop in calling him to the post. The deceased priest was sixty years of age, and he had celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of his ordination just a week before his death. Besides the ability he showed in administering St. Joseph's, Mgr. Lammel had some fame as an accomplished musician and organist. In his younger days as a curate he was for a time in charge of the music of St. Patrick's Cathedral here in New York.

Very Rev. Mgr. William J. White, D.D., Supervisor of Charities for the Diocese of Brooklyn, and rector of the Church of the Visitation, died of kidney disease on August 29, after a brief illness. Mgr. White was born in Brooklyn, September 19, 1870, and, following preparatory studies there, went to the American College, Rome, where he was ordained priest in 1895 and received his degree of Doctor of Divinity. Returning to Brooklyn, he was assigned as an assistant to St. Patrick's parish, where he remained for nine years. He devoted himself with splendid zeal to the care of a rapidly increasing Italian section of the borough and accomplished most fruitful results. His efforts in this direction were broadened when he was appointed rector of the Visitation parish, one of the largest in the poorest part of the borough, in addition to which he became Supervisor of the Diocesan Charities. In the latter office he rapidly attained not only local but national distinction as an authority on the solution of the pressing economic problems of the day. A ready and forceful writer and speaker, he had a most winning personality. The State officials held him in the highest esteem, and constantly sought his advice and cooperation, as did also the leaders of the labor unions. Among the latter he was always at work trying to guard against the taint of Socialism and propagating sound Catholic principles. A model priest, a self-sacrificing, public-spirited citizen, a devoted friend, his untimely death at the very opening of a promising career is really due to the all-absorbing charity with which he spent his energies, without regard for his own comfort or health, in the betterment, spiritual and temporal, of his fellow man.

CHRONICLE

President Taft's Itinerary.—The projected western tour of the President, which began on September 15, puts on the appearance of an invasion of the enemy's country. He is to make speeches in eleven of the twelve States where Progressive Republicanism is most aggressive, the chief of these being Wisconsin, Minnesota, South Dakota, Iowa, Kansas and Washington. Mr. Taft will speak in seven cities of Wisconsin, as La Follette, the Wisconsin Senator, is the insurgent choice for President; in eight cities of Minnesota, the State of Senator Clapp, who has been an outspoken critic of the Administration. Senator Cummins, of Iowa, is the leader of the Republican tariff reformers, and the President will speak in nine Iowa cities. Equal attention will be paid to Senator Bristow's State, for nine speeches are scheduled for Kansas; while Washington is considered to be in still greater need, for twenty speeches are set down for Senator Poindexter's State. The entire project shows the hopeful character of the President. But will he succeed in winning over the discontented or will his speeches merely serve to stir up still greater enmity among the Insurgents and swell the ranks of the disaffected? The President has more than once succeeded where even his friends looked for failure.

Taft Defends Arbitration.—Fifty thousand persons gathered at Charter Oak Park, Hartford, Conn., to hear President Taft speak on arbitration between nations. The view the majority of the Senate took in regard to the arbitration treaties he characterized as "limited and narrow." "The ideal towards which we are all working with these treaties," said the President, "is the ultimate establishment of an arbitral court to which we shall submit our international controversies with the same freedom and the same dependence on the judgment as in case of domestic courts. If the Senate cannot bind itself to submit questions of jurisdiction arising under the treaty, as Norway and Sweden have done, then the prospect of real and substantial progress is most discouraging." . . . "For if the Senate cannot now bind us to abide the judgment of an arbitral court as to whether a question is justiciable it can never bind us, and if the Senate cannot bind us the nation cannot bind us, and this peace-loving people is forever incapable of taking a step along the great path which all the world wishes to tread and along which all the world thinks America best fitted to lead."

Roosevelt in Opposition.—Theodore Roosevelt attacks the arbitration treaty recently presented to the Senate in an editorial article in The Outlook. Admitting the principle of arbitration, he seriously doubts its practicability. In the first place, he declares, the proposed treaty is defective because it is not straightforward, since while setting forth that all "justiciable" matters shall be arbitrable, the language both of its defenders and opponents shows that there is hopeless confusion as to what "justiciable" means. Critics of the Senate, Mr. Roosevelt says, talk as if that body had "usurped" a right, when in reality it has merely performed a duty. The fatally objectionable feature of the proposed treaty, he finds, is the clause providing that the joint high commission may determine that any given question whatever may be arbitrable. Merely to speak of this provision as silly comes far short of saying what should be said. Whether a question, he continues, is of such vital importance to the country that it is or is not arbitrable cannot with propriety be delegated to any outsider by either the President or the Senate. A President unfit to make such a decision himself and willing to have somebody else make it for him would also be unfit to perform any of the really important duties of the Presidency. From these utterances it is clear that the former President and the man he nominated as best fitted to carry out "my policies" are not at the present time in full accord.

Columbus Day.—Mainly through the efforts of the local Chapter of the Knights of Columbus, New York's celebration of Columbus Day, October 12, will take on this year a civic importance far ahead of any recognition heretofore accorded the anniversary. There will be an imposing military and civil parade, public meetings and addresses by eminent speakers, exercises in the schools, banquets, and other details of a notable program, for the carrying out of which the Mayor has named a committee of distinguished citizens.—The Columbus Day pageant in Chicago will also be enacted under the direction of the local Chapter of the Knights of Columbus. John Burns, chairman, and P. J. Halley, of the entertainment committee of the Chicago Chapter, will have charge of the arrangements. Thomas A. O'Shaughnessy, the artist, who twice through his persistent efforts saved the caravels brought to Chicago at the time of the World's Fair, has planned the educational pageant, and will look after the artistic features. The voyage as planned will begin in the harbor at South Chicago and pass along the lake front for twelve miles. The landing will be made at Lincoln Park. When the pageant was staged last year on Columbus Day the spectacle was witnessed by more than one hundred thousand school children.

Mexico.—Señor Juan A. Mateos, member of the Mexican Congress, has claims to distinction not shared by many, even in that famed field of lightning-change political artists. After acting as deputy in the days of Maximilian, Juárez, Lerdo, González and Díaz, with all their varieties of politics, he now complacently offers to serve his countrymen as a Maderist M. C.; for "surprising evolutions," he says, "carry countries onward to their destiny"; and "keep political weathercocks in motion," he might have added.—The State of Querétaro, which is one of the smallest in Mexico, has laid before the permanent committee of Congress a proposed Constitutional change in the shape of a project to redistrict the whole country and equalize the territorial extent of the several States.—Some choice tidbits from the long administration of General Bernardo Reyes in the State of Nuevo Leon are not brought forth against his candidacy for the presidential office. He is charged with having had for his watchword, "Laws are a hindrance to governing"; with having despotically suppressed several newspapers; with having forced his own election as governor for six terms, against the will of the people; and with having served Díaz for thirty-five years "with the fidelity that a dog shows its master."—Reyes and Madero met at Chapultepec, the country residence of the President, whither they had been summoned separately to advise with De la Barra on public affairs. In spite of Madero's published strictures on the conduct and intentions of Reyes, both were very civil and self-contained, and even conversed on the political outlook instead of about the weather.—Minister Alberto García Granados has sent a circular letter to the Governors of the States, urging them to reorganize the local forces connected with the department of public safety. He assures them that they will not be hampered in this work by the interference of the Federal Government, which, however, will be in readiness to assist them in maintaining public tranquillity. During the Díaz régime all such matters were under the thumb of the President.—After serving for forty-five years in the army, Reyes, who held the rank of general of division, has resigned, with the avowed intention of devoting himself exclusively to politics.

Canada.—The western crop has had a narrow escape. Though injured both in quantity and in quality, by frost especially, the estimated return is: wheat, 178 million bushels; oats, 223 million bushels, and barley, 63 million bushels. Warm weather after the first week of August saved it. In Alberta there are crops that will need warm weather up to September 21 if they are to be saved.—From Montreal and Toronto the betting is reported to be three to one in favor of Laurier's return with a majority. Sir William Van Horne and Sir Thomas Shaughnessy are utterly opposed to the Reciprocity agreement. The latter does not say much, though he makes himself understood; the former is vigorous in denouncing it. Hence the position of the Canadian Pacific Railway is clear.—Sir William Whyte has retired from the active management of the western lines of the Canadian Pacific, on account of age. This railway has given a general advance in wages of 8 per cent. It shows increased net earnings during July and August of $1,778,000; nevertheless its shares have fallen considerably through persistent selling, especially from Berlin. Fears for the western crops and of the effect of Reciprocity seem to have been the motive.—Laurier is said to be meditating a blow at the Conservatives by proposing a great extension of Imperial preference, or even the free admission of English goods. This would be most displeasing to the manufacturers, yet the Imperialism they have been professing should prevent them from opposing it.

Great Britain.—The strikes are over for the present and probably will not break out again while the Royal Commission to examine into their causes and remedies lasts. Nevertheless, the temper of the men is not such as to give hope of permanent peace. They have gained a very decided victory, they know the Government to be inclined to favor them and they are not likely to be content with anything employers will grant without a struggle. If they follow their leaders, who proclaim their object to be syndicalism, that is the ownership by organized labor of the means of labor, they will not rest satisfied until the existing commercial relations are destroyed. The Trades Unions Congress at Newcastle-on-Tyne, has rejected almost unanimously Will Thorne's resolution in favor of a purely defensive citizen army, to be called out only in case of invasion. Its action, however, was not the result of any desire to preserve the present system, but rather of a fear lest such an army might end in conscription. Thorne's argument is that, when Parliament has passed the Right to Work Bill, and his party intends to have it passed, there will be no idle men to enlist; hence his proposal is the only alternative for conscription.—The Bishop of London headed a deputation to the Colonial office for the purpose of protesting against the constantly growing importation of gin into Nigeria. The Colonial Secretary was sympathetic and explained the state of the question, which seems to be this: To please the temperance agitators the gin is now diluted. The manufacturers get the same price per gallon that they did for the stronger article, the Government gets the same duty per gallon, and the natives can drink more before becoming intoxicated. Hence everybody ought to be satisfied.

Ireland.—The Chambers of Commerce Association of the United Kingdom, meeting in Dublin, passed a resolution requesting the Government to postpone the Insurance Bill until further inquiry had been made into the relations and conditions of employer and employee. They also demand that the securities approved for the investment of trust moneys under the Land Purchase acts should include those of the United Kingdom and not be exclusively foreign as at present. The Irish papers urge that these securities should be mainly Irish, as it is the Irish purchaser who supplies the funds. The exportation of this capital, which is the effect of the present system, is deemed an economic evil on a par with the abstraction of money from the country by absentee landlords. The nationalization of railways, canals and transit facilities was approved of, according to the plan sanctioned recently by a Government Commission.—This summer has been the hottest and driest for forty years, but the harvest has not been injuriously affected, and the tourist traffic was larger than usual. The Times, writing on the subject, says the social student touring in Ireland gets "an object lesson in the effects of land purchase. Everywhere the new proprietor has realized the advantages of the improved cultivation of a soil which has become his own. The poverty-stricken cabin is giving way to slated cottages covered with creepers, new farm buildings and corrugated iron sheds are being erected on all sides, and the standard of domestic comfort is rising." Lord Brassey declared at the Chambers of Commerce meeting that the Irish farmer was the best and happiest in the world, but the Lord Mayor of Dublin pointed out many barriers to his progress, which only self-government could remove, "and we won't be happy till we get it."—The House of Lords has negatived an appeal from the fishermen of Lough Neagh, who have been estopped from fishing in its waters by Lord Shaftesbury on the strength of a privilege granted by James I, and now used for the first time. This arbitrary act has deprived 800 families of their livelihood. The Irish Party has a Bill ready, which will be accepted by the Government, to remedy the injustice.—The Haulbowline Dockyard at Queens-town has been completed at the expense of $100,000. This is nearly all Ireland has obtained from the $220,000,000 voted to the British Navy.—The Gaelic Summer Schools and training colleges, which are now established in all the Irish-speaking districts on the southern, northern and western coasts, have in most cases doubled their attendance this year. They have a twelve weeks' session, and their diplomas are now accepted by the National Board as certifying the capacity of school teachers to teach Gaelic.—Mr. Redmond Barry, M. P., has been appointed Lord Chancellor for Ireland, the only Catholic. Lord O'Hagan excepted, who has held that office since James II, and the youngest who has ever held it. He was born in Cork, 1866; graduated in the Royal University, was called to the Bar, 1888, appointed Solicitor-General 1905, and Attorney-General 1909. He twice defeated Lord Hamilton in North Tyrone by narrow majorities.

France.—All through the week the bread riots have continued to increase in number, until the whole northern part of France is involved.—Although Germany, as late as September 5, had made no reply to France's proposal with regard to Morocco, French troops, according to La Patrie, have been moved to the frontier; 30,000 of these soldiers have been sent to the fortress of Bel-fort on the east. The Bourse, however, shows no signs of trouble.—On August 25, immediately after the election of Arriaga as President, the French Government officially recognized the Republic of Portugal.—Morocco is not yet tranquillized. A force under General Moinier was attacked on August 18.—France is anxious to recover its lost position as a naval power, and proposes to have in 1920 28 battleships, 10 scout cruisers, 52 ocean-going torpedo boats, and 94 submarines. There will be in addition 10 vessels for oversea purposes; the whole to cost at the minimum $280,000,000.

Belgium.—On August 27, about 80,000 people assembled at Louvain to endorse the Schollaert program, and to make a counter-manifestation to the Liberal-Socialist meeting in Brussels of August 15.—On September 5 sixty field pieces arrived at Namur, along with twelve Hotchkiss guns and five carloads of ammunition. The rearrangement of the frontier is completed so that 40,000 men are available at any moment. When everything is ready to mobilize the army, Belgium will be able to control over 135,000 men. All the political parties are supporting the government.—On September 7 twenty thousand people assembled at Charleroi to protest against the high price of food. They were dispersed by squadrons of cavalry.

Portugal.—The Government has decided to seize the patrimony of the royal family to satisfy advance payments made to them to the amount of $4,938,000. These "payments" were the usual allowances for their support but made ahead of time by the ministry.—Braamcamp-Freire was elected President of the Senate, and Forbes-Bessa of the House of Deputies in the Republican parliament.—Some innocent Spaniards were invited across the border ostensibly to play a game of football. The game did not take place, but the visitors were set upon by a gang of Republican rowdies, who cuffed and knocked them about so violently that they returned home looking as tattered and battered as if the game had been played.—While a military band in Oporto was playing the new national air, a man who refused to uncover was roughly treated by the crowd and then marched off to jail. He proved to be a Frenchman who did not know what the band was playing.

Germany.—Count von Bernstorff, the German Ambassador to Washington, is expected at Berlin during the course of the following month, in order to make preparation for an American-German arbitration treaty, which has long been most favorably considered by Germany. The unveiling of the Steuben memorial has contributed much to further the mutual friendliness of the two nations. The sentiments expressed on the latter occasion, as well as the entire attitude of the Washington administration, show that officially there exist the most cordial relations between Berlin and the United States. The same was manifested again at the departure of the former American Ambassador, David J. Hill, by the many tokens of regard showered upon him. The formidable German Secretary of State, in person, presented the Ambassador's wife with a gorgeous bouquet of roses and delivered a farewell address.—On September 5 a grand review of the German fleet was held in the presence of Emperor William. Taking part in the naval parade were six torpedo boat flotillas and ninety-nine warships, with mine planters, submarine boats, torpedo boat destroyers and other vessels. The three newest battleships, each of twenty thousand tons displacement and with twelve-inch guns on deck, remained at anchor, displaying their colors and firing a salute as the "Hohenzollern" passed with the Emperor and his imperial guest on board, the Archduke Franz Ferdinand, in whose honor the Austrian flag floated together with the German ensign from all the ships. The displacement of the entire fleet was 500,000 tons, and 1,200 officers were in charge. It was an imposing spectacle, intended to make any of the Powers pause and compute the possibilities before declaring war with Germany.—Sedan Day was celebrated with unwonted pomp and circumstance on September 3. It was meant to commemorate the forty-first anniversary of the great battle, and called forth an unprecedented display of patriotism in view of the present crisis. In opposition, the Social Democrats held an enormous mass meeting at Trepower Park, at which it is estimated that 200,000 persons were present. Resolutions were passed condemning "the infamy of war agitation" and demanding a session of the Reichstag that the representatives of the people might be called upon to express their opinion.—The Socialists in their turn have likewise met with a popular opposition. A committee of 1,250,000 members has issued a proclamation against the political universal strike which radical Socialists have proposed to inaugurate in the event that war should be declared between France and Germany. The proposition is stigmatized as "treason to the Fatherland."—It is expected that Germany will soon make known her answer to the conditions presented by France in the Morocco question. In spite of all the military maneuvering by land and sea, the firing of artillery and rattling of sabers, war is not seriously expected.

Austria-Hungary.—A peculiar situation has developed in the Austria-Hungarian Empire. A meat famine is at present existing in Austria. Great transit shipments of the much-needed food supply are in waiting, anxious to bring the desired relief. But this cannot be done without the consent of Hungary, which country, acting within its acknowledged rights, is preventing the importation of all meat from beyond the seas by an uncompromising veto. The object is to exact certain concessions which Austria is not willing to grant, and which it claims cannot be made without causing popular uprisings throughout the country.—There are no fewer than twenty-eight parties in the newly elected Austrian Parliament. To bring about any unanimity among so many heads is a problem which has already taxed all the ingenuity of the ministerial president, von Gautsch. Here, however, is the hope of the Christian Social section if it can in anywise strengthen its own organization. This is realized by the leaders, who, amid their own lamentable divisions, are calling for a united party and a vigorous Catholic press.

Brazil.—A committee of the Senate has reported favorably on a measure to bring back from Europe the bodies of the ex-emperor, Dom Pedro II, and his consort,

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Morocco

A characteristic page of modern statecraft is laid open for us in the Moroccan controversy. It will be of interest to study the question apart from national sentiment and to sift the contradictory reports that come from variously interested quarters. Our own American press has usually presented but one view of the situation.

The intense rivalries of France and England in Northern Africa may be counted as the preliminary episodes of the existing contentions. Their bloody war-arbitraments upon the sea terminated at length in outwardly amicable relations. An agreement was finally entered upon in 1904, known as the Entente Cordial. According to this England conceded to France the right of quietly "assisting" in the affairs of Morocco, while she reserved for herself the exclusive privilege of colonizing Egypt. Terms were still to be made between France and Spain, and then the new ally of England might have free scope for all her colonial ambitions within the limits prescribed. The process by which these were to be realized was politely styled la pénétration pacifique.

Germany in the meantime had been viewing the situation with ever increasing astonishment, and fairly gasped with surprise when by the Entente Cordial, the right of colonial empire over all Northern Africa, was grandly conceded to France by England. Without attempting to disguise her feelings, Germany desired to know who had conferred upon Great Britain the authority to apportion the earth at her pleasure. With what right could she presume to take Egypt for herself and give Morocco to France as a peace-offering, excluding thereby all other countries? If it was better to place Morocco under European protection, why might not Germany as well be one of the fairy godmothers to concern herself with the welfare of their common charge?

Germany realized that once England and France instituted a protectorate the door of their new household would be locked and she, with all her commerce and her colonial interests, might stand without and knock in vain for admission. France already had great interests in Africa, but was this any reason for excluding other countries from open competition for the trade and products of the land?

These were serious difficulties to answer, whatever we may think of the justice of much of the underlying policy. They were so serious in fact that it required a conference of nations to solve them. Thirteen delegates took part in this, and it was known as the Algeiras Conference of 1906.

An agreement among all the great Powers was finally arrived at, according to which they were all to possess common trading rights, Moroccan independence was to be temporarily assured, and fortifications were not to be erected in certain parts. This precarious neutrality of interests was to continue in force only until the close of the present year. During the sessions Great Britain vigorously supported France, while Austria held to Germany as her political ally.

The crisis which now confronts Europe was brought about by a rebellion against the Sultan Mulai Hafid. Besieged at Fez by the rebel troops, he called upon the French Government for assistance, which was gladly given. A native relief force, officered by the French and commanded by Colonel Bullard, was instantly sent. Not daring to enter the Moorish capital, a halt was made until the arrival of General Moinier, who took possession of the city. The French Government, without regarding the remonstrances of Germany or Spain, and without any "by your leave" to the other Powers, held the position she had taken.

Germany acquiesced in the French troops coming to the relief of their countrymen besieged at Fez, although the need of so vast an army to quell so small a rebellion, according to accounts that are given, might not be readily apparent. The danger past, however, she insisted that the troops could no longer be quartered there without an open violation of the Algeiras compact. But France was in nowise disposed to relinquish the position she had taken, whatever might be thought of the agreement. She even went further and made military incursions in various directions, ostensibly to subdue the rebellious natives, but in reality, German writers claim, to bring them under French dominion. Explanations were offered, but Germany did not consider them sufficient.

Spain, by this time, had likewise occupied Larache and Alcázar, and the documents signed at Algeiras seemed to have become only so much waste paper. Germany would not be bound by them any longer. Unannounced, on July 14, the national holiday of France, a German warship suddenly hove in sight off the coast of Agadir. It was now the turn for French sensibility to be touched. Polite as France, Germany assured the Powers that no hostility was meant; but that she was merely relieving her anxiety by personally protecting the interests of her subjects. In vain did France express surprise and regret at the manner in which Germany chose to manifest her concern. There was now to be no retraction.

But at this stage England once more appeared on the scene as the champion of France. It was not a love where blood is thicker than water, but a question of most material consideration. Germany would be too powerful a rival to have so near her interests. Lord Rosebery had not even trusted France when the Anglo-French treaty was made in 1904, the beginning of all the troubles: "I hope and trust," he said, "but I hope and trust rather than believe, that the Power which holds Gibraltar may never have cause to regret having handed Morocco over to a great military Power."

The distant rumblings of war, which had never been seriously threatening, were only momentarily heard as an undertone to the diplomatic negotiations which now ensued. We know of the lengthy conferences, of the interruption that suddenly followed, and of the concessions which France is now willing to make. As the dust clouds are gradually settling the situation is becoming clear. On the one side we behold France and England still associated together. On the other, standing staunchly by Germany, is Austria-Hungary, while Spain, and even Italy, as it now appears, are offering her the assurance of friendship.

The attitude of the United States has been a most interesting one. Although countless attempts have been made to goad on the country to enmity with Germany, yet it has most wisely refrained from entering into the controversy. It has even positively expressed high regard for Germany in a matter not associated with the Morocco question. In presenting and dedicating to the German Emperor and the German nation the Steuben memorial it offers a token of an uninterrupted friendship between the United States and Germany.

The attitude of the English portion of the American press has, however, often been somewhat hostile to German interests, and the news has frequently been presented with a decidedly French coloring. We are proclaiming the purity and honor of the French colonial policies, the love of justice, and above all the Christian meekness of her un-Christian statesmen in bearing so patiently the insults of Germany—and the situation has not as yet appealed to our American sense of humor. The blame is all upon one side, whereas there should at least be some distribution of it. The main reason assigned for this by our critics is what they call the Triple Entente of the West, or the Anglo-French-American alliance. The United States, they say, in the case of a war with Japan, must see that there would be no necessity to face about and defend itself against England's attack from the rear. No wonder then, they conclude, that our press is striving to remain on friendly terms with England and with France.

What, we may finally ask, is the wish of Morocco in the present question. This, of course, is a matter of small consequence to the Powers who hold her in their hands. It is sufficient that Europe is willing to bear the white man's burden and shows her unselfishness even to the extent of quarreling over the privilege. But should Morocco be invited to express her choice there are many indications which show that French domination of whatever kind would be the last desire she could have.

A journal devoted to oriental interests, Der Islam, quotes a letter from a Mohammedan, asking that Germany will not allow herself to be hoodwinked, while France is exterminating a people whose history dates back 1300 years. If they may not be independent, as they wish to be, they prefer, he states, to be served up in sections to the different Powers, rather than be bolted whole and entire by France alone. He begs Germany not to mind the French and English press, which have been bought over by the colonial interests, but to defend Morocco from that pénétration pacifique, which is vigorously being carried on by France with pistol, sword and gun.

Allen Ostler, from the English side, conveys much the same impression in regard to the attitude of the Moroccans towards the French. The only difference is that in his description the natives sigh for British rule. There is a wistful look and a watering at the mouth of the Englishman as he views the land which lies before him like an earthly paradise—not glowing sands and endless deserts and straggling vegetation clinging to the barren rocks; but a land that flows with milk and honey, golden fields of maize and grain, verdant hills rich with the olive, fig and vine, gardens where the citron and pomegranate grow. The very air is redolent with roses and lithe lilies dance upon their stems. From the lips of Mulai Hafid, from his silk-robed ministers, from sheik and villager he has heard ever the same refrain: "Would that England were to come and rule over us."

This description of the wealth of the land, though denied by some, is borne out by the letter to which we have just made reference. But what perhaps most of all appeals to Germany are the vast layers of iron ore which her agents have reported are still to be found here. Germany's mines of this necessary metal, like those of England, are fast being exhausted. The open door in Morocco, for this and similar reasons, is a matter of vital concern for German industry. This is why she must insist upon the independence of the country, or, if there is to be a division, claim her share of the spoils. In case France is given a free hand it will be at the price of a "compensation."

Ultior purposes, however, besides these of a purely economic nature, are ascribed to Germany. By commanding the situation at Morocco she can control three of the greatest trade routes of Great Britain, while the way through the Panama Canal to the Far East would likewise lie beneath her cannons. The key, moreover, to the entire French colonial power would be in her hands, since at a beck from her Algeria could easily be cast into revolt and the entire strength of France in Africa be unnerved at once. Germany, however, professes to insist upon nothing more than the observance of the Algeiras compact. By the Franco-German convention of 1909 she had yielded the right of political predominance in Morocco to France, demanding for herself equal economic advantages with her rival. These she now professes to safeguard by preventing the absorption of Morocco by France. Assurances of this nature, nevertheless, do not dispel the bad dreams which England and France are having because of her. The pénétration pacifique, moreover, would thus come to a sudden end.

If, however, we are asked what right Germany has to the possession of a portion of Morocco, we candidly answer, none that we can see—which seems to be precisely the sum total of all the rights that France can show for a possession of the entire country. As for the French military excursions, it is rumored that the need of them on so vast a scale and with the slaughter, since the first campaign was begun, of so many natives, existed mainly in the imagination of France, or else was due to the animosity aroused by her own high-handed proceedings.

Some provocation was undoubtedly given by the natives; but the story, as far as we can ascertain it, seems to be largely the old fable over again of the wolf and the lamb, which history is ever repeating. The lamb may clearly have the better of the argument, but the wolf has the better of the lamb.

Covadonga

Tarik, the fiery Mohammedan general, crossed from Africa at the head of twenty-five thousand warriors and pitched his tents at Gibraltar. It was April, of the year 711. King Roderick, the last of the Goths, thought at first that Tarik's descent on the coast was only another piratical invasion such as Spain had frequently suffered at the hands of the same marauders. But Tarik, with his army of Arabs, Berbers and Jews, strengthened by a not inconsiderable number of malcontents from among Roderick's subjects, had other views. He had come to conquer, not merely to plunder.

Roderick hastily gathered an immense army, far outnumbering the troops of the invader, but, such was the relaxation and effeminacy that had crept into the very vitals of the kingdom of the Goths, it was no match for the fierce zealots who came fresh from many a hotly contested field. The army of the Goths assembled on the plains of Xerez, and thither repaired the faithless king. As if he were on a royal progress through his domains, he rode in an elaborate chariot, rich with ivory and gleaming with plaques of gold.

On July 31, 711, the hostile armies met in terrific combat. Goaded on by the fear of a forfeited crown, Roderick leapt from his chariot and fought with a courage born of despair, but his soldiers were shamefully routed and the waters of the Guadelete swept away his corpse to an unknown grave. That day is known in Spanish annals as the "wailing of Spain."

Martial valor and statecraft had taken two centuries to build up and consolidate the kingdom of the Goths; two years sufficed for the strangers from Africa to overrun and destroy it. Thus did the crescent prevail over the cross. But, far away in the remote fastnesses of the northern mountains there was a nook into which the Mohammedan hordes had never penetrated. Why should they concern themselves with verdureless cliffs and inaccessible peaks when the smiling valleys were theirs? What booty in beasts or gold or slaves could that despised corner of the earth hold out to their cupidity?

Thither had fled some of the Goths, after Roderick's overthrow and death, and had met with a kindly welcome from the few poor Spanish-Roman mountaineers. Bishops, priests, artificers, soldiers and laborers were among the fugitives. There was Pelayo, too, who had taken part in the ever memorable engagement which overturned the throne of his kinsman, Roderick. The Asturias, as the district was called, could boast no city or considerable town, but there was a hamlet then known as Cánicas, which has survived in the present Cangas de Onís.

Was it valor or was it rashness that prompted that wretched remnant to raise the standard of the cross and declare an offensive war against the Mohammedan invader? The vali El Horr, who was then planning an expedition into Gothic Gaul, viewed it as folly. However, just to give the "infidels" a needed lesson, he commissioned his lieutenant Alkamah to subjugate the Asturias. This was in the year 718. Pelayo made all possible preparations to meet the Moslem foe. Abandoning Cánicas and retiring eastward into the mountain range, he directed the aged and the women and children to conceal themselves in remote and inaccessible gulches while he marshaled his small but warlike band in a narrow canyon at a point where a sheer cliff rose to a height of a hundred and twenty feet. In the face of this cliff there was a natural aperture or cave, known then as now as the Cave of Covadonga, and there he stationed as many of his band as could find place. The others were scattered along the sides of the canyon, through which lay the only approach for the enemy.

The news that Pelayo had retired from Cánicas added fresh spirit to the advance of the proud Alkamah, who, blinded by his former successes and fondly confident of an easy victory, mistook Pelayo's strategy for cowardice; but no sooner had the Moslem troops entered the narrow defile and come within flight-shot than the Christians assailed them with a fury which wrought havoc in their closely formed ranks. While the arrows were flying on both sides as fast as the bows could be bent, some of the Christians began to roll huge boulders and logs down from the heights upon the advancing enemy who, unable to turn aside in the narrow canyon, were crushed and mangled and slain. One of the first to fall was Suleiman, Alkamah's second in command.

With the intention of skirting the mountain and attacking Pelayo's heroic band from the rear, Alkamah ordered his troops to retire, but their number was so great that the move threw them into disorder. Arrows rained upon them and boulders thundered down from the cliffs, while their own weapons were powerless to inflict injury on the hidden foe. To add to their confusion, a terrific storm broke upon the Moslem host. Angry clouds settled down on the mountain and the rain descended in torrents. They were dazed by vivid lightning flashes and deafened by the hoarse thunder which boomed through the darkness. The Deva, wont to go purling on its peaceful way to the sea, now, fed by ten thousand eager streamlets that hastened down the mountain side, became a wall of raging water, which hurled itself upon the invaders. The ribbon of quaggy land between the river and the granite walls of the canyon lent its aid, for, trampled by many hurrying feet, it was transformed into a death-trap, where the struggling soldiers sank from sight. Confusion gave place to panic and panic became headlong flight.

Where was the proud army of Alkamah which, a few brief hours before, had advanced with flying banners and exultant shouts? Fleeing from the wrath of the elements and the wrath of man, the terrified survivors forced their way out of the defile and sped across the meadows of Cánicas with Pelayo in hot pursuit.

What wonder that the feeble grandsires, the women and the little children united with his soldiers in acclaiming Pelayo the savior of the small remnant of his people? There, near the cave of Covadonga, is the field still known as Rey Pelayo (King Pelayo), where the hero was raised on the shields of his valiant comrades as their king. The monarchy which had perished on the banks of the Guadalete was born anew at Covadonga. But this monarchy was not Gothic, as was that of Roderick; for a common misfortune and a common religion had united Goth and Spanish-Roman in the wild mountains of the Asturias, and Pelayo, through whose veins coursed blood from both sources, became the first king of a united Spain.

With the defeat of Alkamah at Covadonga began Spain's reconquest of Spain from the power of the Crescent. Now forward, now backward, but always a little further forward than before, the struggle wore on until, eight centuries after Pelayo's victory, Ferdinand and Isabella completed the task and sent the Moor back to his African home. Spanish folklore has woven many a fanciful wreath for the brow of Pelayo, but the reality of his achievement is enough to command respect and veneration for his memory. Even the Moors remembered him for generations and spoke with bated breath of the prowess of "Belay el Rumi," that is, Pelayo the Roman.

Is it necessary to say that Catholic piety soon raised a shrine where the first blow was struck for Spain's liberation from the detested yoke of the Moor? The cavern where Pelayo and his men withstood the army of Alkamah was fashioned into a chapel and hard by dwelt a number of priests, who attended to the spiritual needs of the faithful who visited the spot. Later on, the chapel became a collegiate church with revenues for its maintenance, and these, though much reduced by the vicissitudes through which the country has passed, are still guaranteed by the Concordat between Spain and the Holy See.

Though Covadonga is at all times an object of pious and patriotic interest to the Spaniard, it is towards the end of summer when the first suggestion of autumn tints appears on the tree-clad mountains of the Asturias that he celebrates with all due pomp and solemnity the glorious anniversary of Pelayo's mighty deed. The festive commemoration is not confined to the Asturias nor to Spain, for wherever Spaniards may find themselves, even in the remote Indies, East or West, there they assemble and repeat the tale of the beginning of Spain's greatness. Covadonga is a national festival. The monarchs observe it; learned societies choose the day for their meetings and honor it by appropriate exercises; army and navy look forward to it. But, perhaps more than elsewhere, it is in the home and in the heart of the sturdy Catholic peasant that Pelayo and his glories are treasured and celebrated.

Antichrist

Optimism flourishes to-day. Politically, socially, religiously, the world is rushing onward, whither—men do not really know. Sitting in their Pullmans they have good reason to suspect that the train despatcher has lost sight of them, that the conductor is without orders, that the locomotive is beyond the engineer's control; yet they are gleeful over the progress they are making. They ignore the elementary truth that progress means necessarily movement in the right direction. A donkey-cart going right is making more progress than a limited train going wrong.

A world going wrong politically and socially is bad enough: a world going wrong in religion is infinitely worse. The former hinders man's salvation, as all will see who will think seriously for a single moment. The latter, so far as it is concerned, tends to make salvation impossible. This evil work the Reformation began for the modern world when it cut men off from the fulness of revelation and grace. Still, as long as Protestants agreed that to be saved one must accept the Apostles' Creed and the Holy Scripture in their obvious and traditional sense, and must believe especially the doctrine of the Fall, the Redemption, the Incarnation, the Resurrection, the Judgment, and the future supernatural life of happiness or woe, so long was enough left those who, through no fault of their own, were outside the pale of the Church, to make, through God's merciful grace, their salvation, if not easy, at least a matter of legitimate hope.

What men now call religious progress is the gradual renunciation of this faith. They who, outside the Church, believe it as their parents and grandparents did, grow fewer every day. Dogma to-day holds in many minds the place once occupied by what the elder Protestant generations dubbed superstition, and Christianity is being reduced to a system of morals. We, on the contrary, holding the true and only Christian religion, know that one who, however he may rule his actions by Christian precepts, refuses to bend his intellect and will to the obedience of faith, is as much an infidel as if, instead of Christian, he had chosen Moslem, Buddhist, or Confucian morals.

This infidelity is growing fearfully among the sects. Young men presenting themselves for ordination to the ministry declare that they do not believe the facts of the Incarnation. Notwithstanding, they are sometimes passed; if not, they are rejected by a bare majority of the ordainers' votes, while in their favor is a strong minority the more orthodox dare not assail. The other day an attempt was made to procure the disciplining of a professor of the Union Theological Seminary, for a notoriously heretical book. It failed, and the professor will continue dechristianizing the candidates for what pretends to be a Christian ministry. Some years ago Episcopalians managed to silence a certain Mr. Cropsey, guilty of odious heresies regarding Our Lord. Yet he had sympathizers to declare him a martyr. In one sense he was such; for his defenders, no less guilty than he, were not molested. The Protestant Episcopal Church glossed over their error, and by retaining them amongst its ministers made itself responsible for their heresy.

A Mr. Thompson, Dean of Divinity in Magdalen College, Oxford, published lately a grossly heretical book on Our Lord's miracles, and the Bishop of Winchester suspended him from the cure of souls. The Bishop could hardly have done less; but the Guardian, the champion, it has always been supposed, of Anglican orthodoxy, is displeased. "We regret the book, and we regret its consequences," are its words. Not so many years ago the Guardian would have seen but one inevitable consequence for Mr. Thompson, much more serious than mere suspension. Now, though it acknowledges that he did wrong in publishing his book, it probably holds him guilty of nothing more than imprudence. However this may be, to put the matter on a satisfactory Anglican basis, it is publishing a series of articles by the Regius Professor of Divinity in Mr. Thompson's university. In these the professor not only avoids speaking of Our Lord as God, but seems even to distinguish Him from God, whose purposes He must work unconfused and undisturbed by self-regard or self-assertion, by hasty exaltation or extravagances of faith, without arbitrariness in the exercise of the Spirit which had fallen upon Him by Jordan, or light and loose reliance upon its aid, controlling it under the strict limits of the moral will. Among such things, more or less suspicious, he lays down frankly that Our Lord received His Mission and was endowed with His unusual powers, only when the Holy Ghost descended on Him in His baptism. You may call this Church of England doctrine anything you please, provided you do not call it orthodox and Catholic. It implies the denial of the Incarnation, and ministers holding it are as free as Mr. Thompson to discuss how far such endowments left Our Lord subject to "ignorance and lack of outlook," and allowed Him to be the victim of "tentative policies and doubtful motives"; in a word, how far they removed a mere man from the frailties of man. Judged by Christian standards, Canon Scott Holland, the orthodox Anglican, is no less a heretic than Mr. Thompson, the Rationalist.

In Germany things are as bad. Indeed, English and American heretics are usually but the echoes of their German masters. The Lutheran pastorate is saturated with Rationalism. Some individuals are disciplined occasionally; but the chastisement comes not from their brethren, who know too well how widespread is unbelief to care to stir up prosecutions which would develop into a continuous series. The Ecclesiastical Council may wield the lash: the lashing is ordered by the Emperor and administered under his eye. William II is, we trust, a sincere believer according to his light. But, however this may be, he understands that, without Christianity, his kingdom of Prussia is doomed; and that without Prussia there can be no Empire. One Sunday, not long since, Pastor Kraatz of the Luisen Kirche, whose infidelity was well known, aired his errors in his pulpit. He had often done so before, and, had he been discreet, he might perhaps have continued to do so. But he was not discreet. Three companies and the machine-gun section of the Elizabeth regiment were among his hearers. The commanding officer did not approve of the Emperor's soldiers listening to doctrines subversive of authority; so, rising in the middle of the sermon, he gave the word, and the soldiers marched out. Pastor Kraatz denounced him for brawling in church: he denounced the pastor for corrupting the soldiers' religion; and the pastor is going to get the worst of it.

But such things as this are not going to save Protestantism in Germany. Kraatz, and others like him will go forth, followed by their congregations, to propagate their infidelity the more freely when separated from the State Church.

"Every spirit that dissolveth Jesus . . . is Antichrist," says St. John. Over and over again Protestantism has convicted itself by its contradictions. Now we look upon the most amazing contradiction of all. In all its sects, from Episcopalianism down, Protestantism asserts its pure Christianity: its teachers in all its sects are moved daily more and more by the spirit of Antichrist.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

True Spiritualism

"How, then; do you account for it," asked a priest, apropos of a pessimistic pronouncement on the materialistic tendencies of the age, "that men are always ready to talk about religion? I, at least, have found them so. But yesterday a man to whom I had been just introduced turned the conversation on religion, started it on the street, continued it on a Brooklyn trolley, kept it up while hanging to a strap in the subway, and was in full swing when I broke away from him at a street corner. He was an intelligent man, too, of university education, and evidently in honest search of light. Thousands like him are hungering for spiritual food. Materialism is only a crust; deep down in the heart of every man who has not made himself a beast—and I am not sure that it is untrue even of him—there is a craving for religion. It cannot be otherwise, for the soul is built that way; and the slightest encouragement draws it out."

"Your thesis," said one of the company, "is in line with an article I read in AMERICA some time ago on Non-Catholics and Religion [Vol. V No. 3]. But let us have the gist of that conversation."

The priest resumed his narrative. His friend, it appeared, had had, like youths generally, a religious bent in early years, but received no direction then and only misdirection later. He had dipped into Christian Science but soon abandoned it for Spiritualism, in which he found considerable satisfaction. Its numerous frauds he admitted, but he was firmly persuaded of the genuineness of superhuman agencies in certain instances. The priest, to his surprise, agreed with him, and somewhat shocked him by declaring he was a Spiritualist himself.

"Why yes," he added, "and I am a Christian Scientist too. I started in life as a Baptist of the broadest variety the day after I was born. I became a Methodist as soon as I was able to think, and a very methodical one, too, for prayers, confession, Mass, and other exercises and duties prescribed and exacted, were all gone through in regular order according to the severely methodical laws and precepts of the Catholic Church. I was all the time a strict Episcopalian, believing in the divine institution of bishops invested with power to ordain and authorize ministers of Grace Divine, and I gave practical proof thereof when I knelt under a bishop's anointing hand at the sacrament of Confirmation. Later I studied philosophy and theology and, under the teachings of Thomas Aquinas and other doctors of the Church, became a Christian Scientist. It is the only way to become proficient in the science of Christianity. Then, though unworthy, I was invested with the dignity of the priesthood, and so, in the only true sense of the word, became a Presbyterian. I was always a Universalist—I believed in all the truths committed by Christ to His apostles when He founded the Church Universal. But, defining my beliefs by their animating and sustaining principle, I am essentially a Spiritualist."

They had got out of the Subway and were more at ease in a street car. The Spiritualist was perplexed. "Of course," he said, "I know all religions are true—" "Yes," said the priest, "to some extent. The mind is so constituted that it cannot renounce truth altogether. No man or church can draw up a formula that appeals to men which does not contain truth. It is the cork of truth that floats the bottle of error. Human organizations, be they called churches or lodges, have, or appear to have, glints and particles of truth. It is this or the presumption of it that obtains or retains them followers. It is only a divine organization, founded, inspired and sustained by the God of Truth, that has all truth. Human institutions pass, for crumbs do not long satisfy the hunger of humanity; the Divine remains. The experience of Augustine is universal: the heart of man finds no rest until it rests in God."

"But about Spiritualism?" They were now at a street-corner where their ways diverged, and the priest was hurrying to Vespers. "Oh," he said, "read Father Benson's 'Necromancers,' or, better still, take up St. John's Gospel—the discourse at the Last Supper—and the Acts of the Apostles, and wherever you find the Holy Ghost mentioned read the passage twice. And"—this from across the street—"if you are interested in the matter come to church next Sunday. There is a new preacher and his subject is the Holy Ghost."

The preacher's exordium was not conciliatory. Taking for text "The Spirit of the Lord has filled the whole world," he asked: Is it true? Has not, rather, the spirit of evil taken possession of the earth? Heresy, schism, revolt, stubborn resistance to the breathings of God's Spirit—are not these the marking places in the history of Christianity? The protest of Protestantism was essentially a protest against the Spirit of the Lord breathing in and through His Church. The protesting hierophants and their progeny would direct the operations of the Holy Ghost; would have Him breathe not as He willeth, but as they willed. The outcome is materialism, skepticism, unitarianism, the denial of the very existence of God's Spirit.

The spirit of darkness, who had his hour on the night of Gethsemane and the day of Calvary, is abroad in the world, bold, virulent, aggressive. He is animating the forces of the world—that world which was hated of Christ—in France and Italy, Portugal and Spain, and pitting his strength defiantly against the Spirit of God. In ponderous tomes and frivolous sheets; in science, philosophy and literature; in pulpit, press and platform, he is inciting a thousand pens and tongues to utter jibes and calumnies on God's Church and God's truth. He has taken hold of the wires on land and sea, whispers into the ear of the transmitter, and guides the hand of the receiver. In favorable circumstances he has instituted diabolism, the worship of himself; but finding this form too crude for general acceptance, he has in our day inaugurated a religion peculiarly his own, intended by its name and nature to banish the Holy Spirit from the earth.

Under his guidance, Modernism, assuming and falsifying the terms of the supernatural, would destroy the Church by plagiarism of her spiritual significance; would steal God from her temples and the Holy Ghost from her heart. Finding that man can not get away from communion of some sort with the spiritual Kingdom for which his higher nature craves, he would feign to satisfy that yearning by robbing the Holy Spirit of His peculiar function and establishing a religion under the very title which is the characteristic expression of His essence and operations. This religion he called Spiritualism, a system which, by its mysteries and mockeries, encourages blasphemous curiosity, awakes a thirst for forbidden marvels, spurns the divinely constituted order and revealed truth lawfully defined, destroys all positive religion by rejecting the visible Church, and by intent and action banishes the Holy Ghost and His worship from the world. In seducing men from the guidance of God's Spirit to the cult of lying spirits, Spiritualism weakens their minds, perverts their senses and corrupts their morals. Whatever be the surface allurements it presents to weakened intellects and morbid affections, it is substantially the worship of the devil.

Some spirit the soul must serve; and it must choose between the Spirit of peace and truth, the Lover and Light-giver of the world, and the spirit of darkness, of lies, of godlessness and despair, "who was a murderer from the beginning." It has chosen; and, despite superficial manifestations, it has chosen right. The night on which Christ said, "This is the hour of the powers of darkness," He also said: "I have conquered the world." To reap the fruits of that conquest He promised to send the Paraclete.

The preacher pictured the natural unfitness of the Galilean fishermen to convince and transform a corrupted world; how in nine days of prayer they prepared their hearts for the coming of the Paraclete, their sole reliance; how Mary sustained their courage, saying: "He came to me as the Angel spoke, and the first fruit thereof was the Saviour of the world." And lo! on them He also came, filled their hearts with love, their minds with truth; and the fruit thereof was the saving of the world!

Transfigured and wondrously gifted by God's spirit, they marched triumphant over the powers of darkness; marched, they and their heirs, through blood and fire and battle, always to seeming defeat, always to ultimate victory. The Church lives again the life of her Founder, ever passing to and fro from Crucifixion to Resurrection. The enemy foregathering in Gethsemane affrights her not. She knows that with her abides the Spirit of all truth, who "will convince the world of sin and of justice and of judgment"; knows that the final chapter will be ever written: "I have conquered the world."

Verily "the spirit of the Lord has filled the whole earth." Eternally proceeding from the Father and the Son, Love Divine is energizing by myriad ways and agencies in every soul. Of Him it is born again—"of water and the Holy Ghost"—and though the reborn soul should thrust Him forth He will not abandon it. By the angels and ministers of grace, by the written and the spoken word, by His Church's appeals and warnings, by His own constant whisperings to heart and mind, this Divine Lover woos back the soul estranged, and saves it from itself. The absolving and consecrating and anointing hands, and all the operations of His ministry, He is everywhere and always empowering with grace. Every ennobling thought, every impulse corrective or prohibitive of wrong, every prayer in home or church or highway, all the spiritual workings of the soul and body Catholic, are initiated, sustained and guided by the Holy Spirit of God. In wondrous ways he has filled and fills the world.

But He forces no man. Freedom of will leaves play for the spirit of darkness. Of the thieves who died with God's Son, one accepted, one rejected the pleadings of His Spirit. There is now before the Sacred Congregation the cause of canonization of Jean Robert de Lammenais. His brother, Félicité Robert de Lammenais, one time a priest of renown, died an apostate. One hearkened to the Spirit of God; the other, hardened by pride, followed the spirit of evil. Between the two spirits every man must choose; and in choosing the Spirit of God, remember Christ said to His Church and to no other: "I will send you the Holy Ghost, the Spirit of Truth, to teach you all things and to abide with you forever."

A thoughtful-looking man, who had remained seated from his entrance into the church, knelt as the preacher ended.

Opium Suppression in Szechuen

SHANGHAI, July 30, 1911.

The suppression of opium growing in the province of Szechuen has been vigorously prosecuted by the Viceroy and other officials during the years 1909 and 1910. Landowners and farmers made at first great opposition, but afterwards gave in and the restrictions were enforced with success. In consequence it may be stated that no opium is grown in the province at present. This is also the conclusion which Sir Alexander Hosie, British Commercial Agent, has arrived at. After inspecting five of the Northwestern provinces, he writes: "Szechuen alone has suppressed opium growing. In Yunnan (the province to the southwest of Szechuen and bordering on Burma)" he adds, "it has been suppressed by 75 per cent., in Shensi by 30, while in Shansi opium smokers are largely dependent on old stocks and smuggled supplies." In Kansu, before reaching Lanchowfu, the Capital, he counted 595 large poppy fields, and in the Wei valley—the Wei river runs south of Shensi and Kansu provinces and flows into the Hoang-ho east of Singanfu—as many as 2,036. These latter results are rather disappointing and obviously bear out that the campaign is but partially successful. They also show that energetic officials, when they bestir themselves, can do much to remedy evils, but there are few of this kind in the Empire.

The suppression of the opium crop has had far reaching effects upon the economic and general commercial conditions of the province. In 1907, the total annual production of marketable opium was about 175,000 piculs (23,333,000 lbs.), of which 120,000 piculs (16,000,000 lbs.) were consumed locally, and the rest exported to other provinces. The average price per picul being 200 Haikuan taels, the total value of the drug produced during a year may be put down at 35,000,000 taels (23,000,000 gold dollars). It is evident that the disappearance of such a large sum is an important item for the provincial exchequer. Besides, a very serious decline in the price of land has set in.

In order to fill the gap caused by this deficit, officials and merchants have combined their efforts to improve agricultural methods and introduce new industries. Large areas, hitherto under poppy cultivation, are now planted chiefly with beans, groundnuts and wheat, and attempts are made to introduce the cultivation of the cotton plant on a large scale. Commercial enterprises are being encouraged and facilitated by advancing moneys from official funds. In many districts industrial schools have been opened, in most of which the various operations connected with sericulture are taught. Already the improvement and output of silk for the past year have been very remarkable.

A great hindrance to real progress and success is the lack of competent engineers, teachers and supervisors in the industrial schools. The spirit and desire for improvement are, however, everywhere apparent, and all well-wishers of the country see in these symptoms the assurance and prospects of better times. When China will have stamped out the opium evil in other provinces, as in Szechuen, her national exchequer may be a little depleted, but she will have shown the world that she is not ruled by selfishness but seeks the moral welfare of her teeming millions.

The anti-cigarette movement which seemed to be originally economic and hygienic has lately become political, and is an ostensible crusade against foreign trade. In Peking, Princess Tsai-hsun and Tsai-tas, General Yin Chang, Minister of War; Duke Tsai-tse, Minister of Finance, support the movement. Wu Ting-fang, former Chinese Minister at Washington, is particularly active in Shanghai. If the students, soldiers and people abstain from the foreign article, it is calculated that a sum of 15,000,000 taels can be annually saved. This, with the proceeds of the students' queues exported to the States, will form a valuable asset for paying off the foreign railway loan.

At Mukden, Soochow, Shanghai, Canton, Chengtu and other large cities throughout the Empire, hundreds of students appear in the streets minus the pigtail.

A Dutchman and a Belgian will be engaged as advisers in reference to the "Four Nation Loan."

Some foreign returned students, having examined the astronomical instruments of the Board in Peking, found them to be all of an obsolete pattern and much behind the needs of the present day. Duke Tsai-tse, Minister of Finance, has proposed to adopt the solar system for the calendar, but Prince King is quite opposed to the new scheme. The Board of Astronomy has been recently ordered to select an auspicious day on which the Emperor could begin his schooling, and has fixed September 10 for the event. How this could have been done with such unfit instruments remains a mystery for science.

The new Viceroy of Manchuria is devoting great attention to the distribution and strengthening of the army in the three Eastern provinces. The aggregate forces will be 30 brigades of infantry, 73 regiments, supply and baggage corps, 70 regiments engineering corps and 750 guns. Russia has recently stationed 70 army corps in the Amur region.

The Commercial treaty between Russia and Japan was signed at Tokio on June 23.

Some thirty of the district missionaries are here for the annual holidays. The losses in our ranks for the past year have been very heavy, 12 priests and 1 lay brother, to which must be added 2 secular priests, who were carried off in the famine district.

The Yangtse valley is seriously flooded for the last week, and if the waters continue to rise disaster and starvation will extend to six or eight provinces.

An American engineer, whose name is Jamieson, has arrived in Shanghai with the purpose of surveying the course of the Hwai river, cause of the recent famine in North Kiangsu. The Government is already obstructing him, and it is feared little benefit will come from his visit.

Arriaga President of Portugal

MADRID, August 25, 1911.

At one time there were five candidates for the presidency. Magalhaes Lima, grand master of the Portuguese Freemasonry, was supported by the Masonic lodges and the Carbonari; Basilio Tellez, a man more given to study than to politics, and one whose honesty and sincerity are recognized, was the favorite of the moderate and conservative Republicans; Braamcamp-Freire, president of the Constituent Assembly, represents the aristocratic element in the party, and until very recently has posed as a Monarchist; Bernardino Machado was Minister of Foreign Affairs in the provisional Government; and finally, there was Manoel Arriaga, attorney general of the republic and the dean of Portuguese republicans.

As the time for voting really approached, there were but two candidates in the field; these were Machado and Arriaga. It was through the activity of Affonso Costa that the members of the provisional Government were declared eligible for the presidency; for his intention was to elect Machado, and secure for himself the coveted portfolio of Foreign Affairs. But Costa's very eagerness, or, rather, violent insistence, blighted the prospects of his favorite and friend. In fact, so extravagant and so fierce was the tyranny of Minister Costa in the cabinet itself, that it caused much displeasure and evoked angry protests; and when these came to the knowledge of the electors, Machado dos Santos, "the hero of the revolution," united with José Almeida and others to block Machado's aspirations and Costa's plans. The result was the election of Arriaga.

Who is this first Constitutional President of the Portuguese republic? Dom Manoel Arriaga e Brum de Silveira belongs to a family that has old monarchistic traditions. Both his father and his paternal grandfather were distinguished in military circles, and were trusted defenders of the interests of the Braganças. His mother, Dona Maria da Piedade Cabral da Cunha, traced her origin to the Kings of Castile and Leon, and claimed to belong to the twenty-third generation in direct descent from Hugh Capet, of France.

Notwithstanding these monarchistic antecedents, Arriaga, even in his early youth, frankly espoused the Republican cause. This cost him the favor and protection of his family, so that he could depend upon only his own efforts for success in life and even for a professional education. It was by his own exertions that he paid his way through the University of Coimbra, of which he afterwards became rector.

Arriaga, it may be said, is the incarnation of Portuguese republicanism. Of a dreamy and romantic temperament, he belonged in his youth to that generation of sentimental Socialists in Latin countries, who revived and reveled in the doctrines of Fourier and Saint-Simon. In union with Antero do Quental, he helped Fontana to found the International in Lisbon. He was the recognized leader when the Republican party was founded in 1875, during the campaign of Lourenço Marquez in 1881, and also during the Pombal celebration in 1882. Thrice he was a Republican member of Parliament, and each time from a different district. As a writer of both prose and verse, he made a name for himself in Portuguese letters, while his eminently correct private life, his honesty and his political consistency made him respected by his countrymen. An eloquent proof of his fidelity to his political principles is seen in the fact that King Carlos, recognizing his talents, wished to entrust to him the education of his son and heir, Luiz, but Arriaga, looking upon such a work as at variance with his opinions, declined the appointment.

It was this faithfulness to his convictions, together with great sincerity and love of work, that won for Arriaga the respect and confidence of the Republicans. To-day he is the most prominent figure in the nation. With his burden of seventy years, with his systematic aloofness from political strife for the past twenty years, with his lack of energetic initiative, with his literary tastes which incline him to love books and the solitude of his library rather than the agitation, the intrigues and the wiles of politics, he does not seem to be the most suitable man to rule and guide the destinies of a people that is the victim of complete disorganization and political and social anarchy.

President Arriaga must choose one of two paths. He must either declare war against the secret societies, which would necessarily mean his fall and his death, at least politically; or he must suffer himself to be guided by them, which would mean that he should walk in the footsteps of the provisional Government and expand its policy of despotism, injustice, persecution and crime. Now, his antecedents preclude all possibility of hope for any betterment of Portugal's religious and social condition. Arriaga is a sectarian, an enemy of religion and the Church, an atheist, at least in practice. Once when he was delivering a speech in Lisbon, as he was an imitator and admirer of the Italian, Carducci, who had sung the praises of Satan, he seriously proposed the erection of a statue in honor of the prince of darkness; and from his professorial chair in the ancient University of Coimbra, he used to vomit out the most atrocious statements against Catholic dogma, and especially against the Immaculate Conception.

What Arriaga was yesterday he is to-day. His anti-clericalism and sectarianism have undergone no modification. Some of his friends, with the object, no doubt, of winning support and votes for their candidate, industriously spread the story that if he were elected he would modify the Separation Law, and make it in some way acceptable to the Church. But now he is President Arriaga. When the query was put to him he couched his answer in the following significant words: "The law will be carried out, whoever may constitute the administration. It may undergo some modification, but this will be so slight that the substance of the law will remain. I am an absolute Radical. I have shown it during my whole life by my words, spoken and written, in which I have always combated the Church. The Church has already fulfilled the social function for which it was instituted; among us it is now useless. Modern society has its own code of morals and wants no mentor."

After this frank and explicit declaration, there is no excuse for treasuring the idle hope that under the new President things may mend in Portugal. On the contrary, there will soon be added to the already innumerable causes of the country's unrest the squabble between the partisans of Machado and Costa, who are the sources of the greatest danger with which the new administration must cope.

The Monarchists, on their side, are on the alert to stave off the utter ruin of the country. The days of the republic are numbered. If unforeseen reverses and misadventures do not intervene, within two months, possibly within a month, the monarchy will have been restored. The country wants it. The army wants it. There are men, there is money, there are arms, there is enthusiasm. What is lacking? A white and blue flag on the border; a shout against the tyranny of the republic.

Anti-Clericalism in Uruguay

BUENOS AIRES, July 26, 1911.

In the small Republic of Uruguay, our near neighbor, the president, Señor Batlle y Ordóñez, is a vigorous Socialist of the "ultra" brand. Coming back to power by virtue of an arrangement with his successor and predecessor, Dr. Williman, Señor Batlle y Ordóñez did not lose a moment in proclaiming, by words and deeds, that he was bent on drastic reform, and meant to put all the wrongs of the Republic right in four short years.

The result of his efforts so far are best seen in the protest his Catholic fellow-citizens published two days ago. The Catholic Party is by no means a negligible quantity in Uruguay. Its Congress, which rather encourages than checks the Executive Power, sanctioned a law refusing military honors on religious festivals. The law went into effect as soon as passed, and the Catholics took the next opportunity to turn out in thousands and without any official uniforms to grace the procession and thus testified in the most solemn and orderly manner their condemnation of the measured insult offered to God by the government.

The protest now issued says in effect, that the intention of the Government being manifestly anti-Catholic, it is well that all Catholics and men of sound judgment should know what the Government wants to do and how it proposes to effect its design. It is preparing to despoil the Church to the prejudice of all Catholics, and with violence to all precepts of equity and justice. The unprecedented malice of the presidential plan is seen in every act. Confiscation of private property, measured insult and violence, are all to be employed, and are being employed to root out the last vestiges of religious life in a really Catholic Republic. The confiscated property becomes, as usual, the spoil of the iconoclasts. A handful of the president's faithful creatures will gain what the Catholic majority are to be deprived of. The protest indicates several cases of open and confessed violation of rights in which the written and unwritten law are outraged with the sanction of the president and Congress. The very men who swore to protect and cause to be respected the Constitution and the laws are the first to break all the laws. Against the attacks made and contemplated upon Constitutional guarantees, the rights of property and liberty of conscience, the Union Católica utters its solemn protest, and invites all lovers of justice and liberty to support it in its crusade in favor of Catholic liberty and universal justice.

Return to Savagery

If you happen to find yourself in New York between five and six of the evening near any of the great centres, where the people are plunging into the subways, or clambering up to the elevated, or swarming into the surface cars, you will see before you a puzzling phase of an actual social condition. Here are thousands upon thousands of women, all of them poor, most of them pale, anemic, haggard and careworn, of all ages from the slip of a girl to the wrinkled and withered old dame, of every race under the sun, as their lineaments and language declare—all hurrying in one direction as fast as their compact phalanxes will permit. They are the shop girls and factory operators, who have suddenly dropped out of the lofts on the west side of Manhattan, and are now scurrying to the crowded tenements on the East Side, or to Brooklyn and the Bronx. A hasty meal of indigestible ill-cooked food, a walk in their cheap finery on the cluttered streets, where dangers of all kind meet them, returning, perhaps, late at night to the fetid unventilated rooms, for which exorbitant rents are exacted, and then after a few hours restless sleep hurrying out again before dawn for the ceaseless grind of shop or factory—such is the daily life of the wage earners of multitudes of women, married and unmarried, who are forever on the ragged edge of penury and want, with all that such conditions imply. They know nothing of household ties or duties and care less. For years they have been exiled from home to earn a pittance that will help to find a shelter for the family and procure covering and food. They have lost all interest in what is normally the happiness and delight of every well constituted woman.

Where are the men? Almost every afternoon you may see ten or fifteen or twenty thousand of them sitting hour after hour on the bleachers, which they pay to occupy, and shrieking like maniacs at the feats or fumbles of high-salaried players, or again at night, fighting in the streets for the privilege of buying, at extravagant prices, a place in an arena, where thousands of men applaud the prowess of two human brutes who are beating each other into insensibility.

Much of this looks like a return to the conditions that prevailed here three hundred years ago, when the squaws did all the work and the men hunted and gambled and drank and murdered, and occasionally tortured a victim at the stake, all of which things, even the last, are now features of our American life. Nevertheless, we are told to believe firmly in the progress of civilization.

Socialists in the Trade Unions

Socialists have scored another victory in the labor unions by the election of William H. Johnston to the presidency of the International Association of Machinists, with a total of 15,300 votes against 13,321 received by James O'Connell, the incumbent of that office for eighteen years. Johnston is an outspoken Socialist, while O'Connell was a member of the Civic Federation, an organization which has ever been most cordially hated by the party of the reds. Its conciliatory policy, intended to secure amicable relations between capital and labor, is looked upon by Socialists as most directly opposed to their own revolutionary principles. Three of their number, moreover, were chosen as delegates to the American Federation of Labor.

President-elect Johnston was twice Socialist candidate for the governorship of Rhode Island, and his election is viewed by the Socialists as the third serious blow they have given to the anti-radical element in the labor unions. The first was dealt by the miners in forcing John Mitchell to sever his connections with the Civic Federation, much against his own will and better judgment. The second was the defeat of Treasurer Lennon, of the American Federation of Labor, as secretary of the Tailors' Union. By joining in the opposition against him there was afforded them an opportunity of manifesting their animosity against the present head of the American Federation and his cabinet. Whatever other reasons existed, this was the one which gave satisfaction to the Socialist party.

The ultimate object of the Socialists, however, is to capture the Federation itself. Of this purpose they never lose sight even for a moment; for it is to secure to them the control of the entire labor movement in the United States. They have achieved similar results in other countries and are determined not to rest until they have accomplished the same here. To bore from within, and to attack from without, are the acknowledged tactics in their conspiracy against the labor Federation. These they are resolved to follow out until the day when, as they hope, they can hoist upon the masthead their own red flag of the revolution, the substitute in the modern signal code for the skull and cross bones used of old. Catholic workingmen have a battle awaiting them and they cannot be prepared for it too soon. Here is a duty not to be overlooked by us.

The Ideal Marriage

President Charles F. Thwing, of Western Reserve University, writing in the Hibbert Journal, on the subject of family life, declares that "the value of the American family as a social unit has suffered a great decline," and that its position is lower than it has been in two hundred and fifty years. "The present situation," he says, "is detrimental to the best interests of the human race."

He attributes this decline to the Protestant Reformation, which he assures us was "the greatest movement for individualism the world has ever known." This individualism was emphasized by Puritanism, helped on its way by the infidel philosophy of the eighteenth century, particularly that of Rousseau, and injected into politics by the American Revolution. The ever increasing individualistic education of the present day is responsible for a share of the havoc, the women's rights movement is sweeping it onward with the velocity of a whirlwind, and finally, says Dr. Thwing, "the decline in the sense of social and conjugal duty"—a euphemism for dissolute living,—enters the field of devastation as one of the most active wreckers of the homes of the American people.

"What we need now," he says, "is a return to old standards, a new and vivid realization of the duty of child bearing, and of the sanctity of the marriage state. The Roman Catholic Church," he notes, "has on the whole accomplished far more for the perpetuity of the marriage rite than has the Protestant."

Let us say in passing that to do a little more for marriage than Protestantism, which is charged with the destruction of marriage, is not crediting Catholicism with a very considerable achievement. The real solution of the difficulty, continues the Doctor, is to be found in John Stuart Mill who, in his book on the "Subjection of Women," tells us how married life can be a source of unbounded felicity, without the slightest danger of its perpetuity being affected.

Evidently Doctor Thwing has read John Stuart Mill only in parts. That ridiculously overestimated writer did not believe in God; his deity was a pagan demi-god. He was, though, possibly he was not aware of it, a Manichæan, and consequently his creed rated all material things evil, including the human body. He was a Utilitarian, which is only another word for a Sensualist, one whose tenets, his friend Carlyle said, were those of the animals that wallow. He was a Malthusian, and therefore did not regard with favor the sanctity of marriage, or esteem as sacred the duty of child-bearing. Leslie Stephen, his biographer, tells us that we see in Mill, "no tender dwelling on early days and associations, no affection for mother or brother or sister, no warm expression of personal feeling. In a word, he is a frigid thinker and a worthy prophet of the dismal science which leaves out of account all that is deepest and truly valuable in human nature." This ideally married man lived for years with a Mrs. Turner, the wife of another. He was denounced by his father, shunned by his brothers and sisters and ostracized by the wives of his scientific associates.

"At the feet of this Egeria," says Stephen, "he sat in absolute seclusion from his fellows during the most feverish period of his intellectual life. Of her he spoke in language so extravagant as almost to challenge antagonism. Her qualities, he said, included Carlyle's and his own and infinitely more; her judgment was next to infallible; the highest poetry, philosophy and art seemed trivial by the side of her, and equal only to expressing some part of her mind, and he prophesied that if mankind continue to improve, their spiritual history for all ages to come will be the progressive working out of her thoughts and the realization of her conceptions."

Such is the man we are told to consult if we would know what is an ideal marriage. Has Dr. Thwing forgotten the teachings of Jesus Christ?

Sturdy Belgians

On the 15th of August, as the readers of AMERICA will remember, the Liberals and Socialists of Belgium made a monster demonstration in Brussels. Estimates vary widely as to the actual number of the participants, some putting it at 300,000, others at 60,000. The meeting was large enough in any case, but one ominous feature of it was that the red flags of the Socialists fluttered everywhere more defiantly than the blue of the Liberals. The parade passed off peacefully, and their Catholic opponents scrupulously kept in the distance.

Long before this political appeal of the "outs," the Catholics of Louvain had planned to hold a meeting at Louvain, on August 27, more as a political wake than a jubilation. Schollaert, the fallen Minister, represented that constituency, and his supporters wanted to assure him of their loyalty, no matter what might happen. Meantime, however, the Brussels affair had excited the country, and the call for the local gathering grew into a demand for a great national demonstration. Louvain is a small place compared with Brussels. It has only one railway station, but on the 27th it is estimated that 80,000 men—there were no women and children as in the Brussels parade—crowded the narrow streets of the old collegiate city.

The Belgians know how to plan a public pageant. Every village and town and city of both the Flemish and Walloon sections came with bands and banners and paraphernalia of all kinds to tramp through the streets and crowd into halls or line up before the grand stands in the public squares to hurrah for Schollaert and to demand the passage of the school bill. The courtesy which they had extended to their enemies in Brussels was not shown to them at Louvain. Some of the paraders were attacked, flags were torn and heads were broken, but on the whole order prevailed. That host of 80,000 men would have been a formidable foe to assail.

It is needless to say there were no red flags in that procession; no singing of the Marseillaise, or International. The demonstration was all for law and order and love of country, and the populace, as well as the men in line, bubbled over with patriotism. It promised well for the municipal elections of next month, which in turn will indicate what way these two political gusts have turned the weather vane. From their success or failure a forecast may be made whether the elections of next year will decide if Belgium's Catholic government is going to continue its glorious career.

Anglicans in Trouble

An interesting and amusing correspondence runs through the issues of the London Times for the latter part of August. It discusses the dangers lurking in the Communion Cup, namely, the many microbes, especially those of phthisis, which each Protestant communicant leaves on its rim; and it proposes various means of avoiding them. Some clergymen suggest the wiping of the vessel's rim with a napkin after each communicant has taken his or her sip; but this is open to two objections. The ardent Anti-microbist sees no protection in so crude a method, but rather the reverse, since the wiping would spread the microbes round the whole rim, which, after half a dozen had been communicated, might be covered with an assortment of consumption, diphtheria and typhoid germs, to say nothing of cholera and plague. The zealous Ritualist makes the second. According to him the napkin would have to be burned after each administration, which would be contrary to ordinary Catholic practice, and would be, moreover, quite expensive. One clergyman defends the practice as primitive, with a show of extraordinary learning. He tells the readers of the Times that the maniple, which took its present shape when the Church of Rome denied the Cup to the laity, was in purer days a linen cloth, used for this very purpose of wiping the rim of the chalice; and he urges each of his brethren who wears vestments to discard the Roman corruption and instead of it to fasten a napkin to his left arm. He does not say whether the subsequent holocaust of the napkin was also the primitive practice. No doubt the maniple was originally cloth, but if its use was to protect communicants from microbes, how does the clergyman explain its use by subdeacons, and the fact that deacons carry it in functions implying exertion, but far removed from the administration of Holy Communion, e. g., in the singing of the Passion in Holy Week, and in the blessing of the Paschal Candle. Another clergyman gets over the difficulty of expense by using Japanese paper handkerchiefs, which can be prepared with disinfectants. Being very cheap, the burning of them is no serious charge to the church accounts.

Again, another would put all suspects by themselves and communicate them only after the others who have passed quarantine. But as Dogberry affirms "Comparisons are odorous." A doctor would provide a little cup for each of that unhappy class, and tells how he induced his own clergyman to do so. Another medical man advises the use of capsules, recommending a firm of chemists, apparently Jewish, who will provide sacramental wine in such receptacles. These should be put into the communion cup, from which one could be handed to each communicant. Lastly, a lady with several academic degrees explains her practice. It is to take the cup into her hands when the minister offers it, to hold it while he exhorts her to drink, and then to hand it back untasted. A clergyman acknowledges that he has met such cases, but confesses naïvely that he always took them for Romanists availing themselves of his ministry, but scrupulous to observe the discipline of their own Church. We must not forget to add that a few clergymen recommended a trust in Providence; but as, in the eyes of scientific people, they are only old fogies, their suggestion was not criticised but simply ignored.

Among so many absurdities one sensible observation was made more than once. After all, it was said, the Roman practice of Communion under one kind suffices for the full reception of the Sacrament, and it is the most practical way out of the difficulty.

Federation and the Knights of Columbus

The growth and influence of the Federation of Catholic Societies was particularly noticeable at its Tenth Annual Convention in Columbus; an incident of that occasion indicates that by next year's meeting it will have received an immense accession to its ranks. His Excellency, the Apostolic Delegate, having declared that from its establishment the Federation had given strength and sustenance to the Church in America, and consolation to the Holy Father, and "is working distinctly under the protection and guidance of the American Hierarchy and with the full sanction and blessing of the Pope," made this important statement:

"I have just been informed that Council 400 of the Knights of Columbus, of Columbus, Ohio, has joined the Federation. I congratulate Council 400 on the stand it has taken, being the first Council of the Knights of Columbus in the United States to affiliate with the Federation of Catholic Societies. It is time for the Knights of Columbus to join the Federation. In being the first Council to affiliate with this great organization, which has the encouragement and support of the American Hierarchy and the blessing of the Holy Father, Pope Pius X, Council 400 has set an example to the rest of the country which I hope to see followed by every Council of the Knights of Columbus through the length and the breadth of the land.

"I had occasion to thank the Knights of Columbus in the past for many courtesies shown me on auspicious occasions. I had the pleasure of being present at the founding of the first Council of the order in Canada, and I have ever since been gratified and edified at observing the spread of the organization and its increasing scope of usefulness in the cause of religion. In uniting in the great work of Federation the Councils will add their importance as an aid and auxiliary of the Church."

There was immediate response to His Excellency's appeal. Mr. Denechaud, President of the Louisiana Federation, said at the final meeting, that the Louisiana Councils of the Knights of Columbus had telegraphed to him their assent to the Apostolic Delegate's wishes, and authorized him to announce that they were unanimous in "uniting heart and soul with Catholic Federation."

There is good reason to believe that this action will become universal. The Archbishop of New Orleans had some months ago instructed his pastors that all Catholic societies in his diocese should add their strength to the federated body; the Archbishop of Boston and other prelates had expressed the same desire, and the Knights in every instance, manifested, as became their record, loyal compliance with the wishes of their bishops. The political and other difficulties that at first appeared to lie in the way of federation have now proved to be imaginary. The numerous bodies that belong to it have preserved their own identity, and many of its most influential leaders and workers are prominent members of the Knights of Columbus. The moral, social and educational problems that confront us, menacing the stability not only of the Church, but of the nation, can only be solved by the organized cooperation of all our people. The Knights of Columbus have done much in their own sphere for the defence and advancement of Catholic interests; by uniting with all other Catholic societies in common action they will have added immeasurably to the Federation's influence for good and to their own. The Federation Convention of 1912 promises to be memorable in the Catholic History of the United States.

Reasonable Politics

Next year's struggle for the honors and responsibility of the highest place in our country will, from present indications, centre about the ever old and ever new question of our tariff laws. It is a happy coincidence, then, that the leaders of the cohorts who will face each other in that struggle appear to be men of character, men who will strive to settle the question in a way to satisfy the sober judgment of the people. Both President Taft, and Chairman Underwood, of the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives, have recently made speeches singularly devoid of the partisan passion that has hitherto characterized the consideration of the tariff question. "We do not propose unduly to agitate the business interests of this country," said Mr. Underwood; while the President put himself squarely on record as resolved to solve the intricate problem "by the earnest effort of the level-headed, the practical and the courageous among us, and by reducing the influence of the demagogue and theoretical extremists on the one hand and the reactionary influence of combinations of wealth on politics and progress on the other."

May the good omen endure until the work will have been accomplished! How little the economic theories which are supposed to underlie party principles have influenced party action heretofore is notoriously evident. Since the days of Grover Cleveland and before, tariff revision has held a prominent place in the platform of one of our great political parties. They who stood on that platform, it is true, have allowed many a fad to come into play in their program, but they have never wavered in their profession of faith in the need of a cut in tariff rates.

But selfish interest has made a mockery of ethical principle in other struggles marking partisan politics in our land; we need not be surprised that it showed its wonted force in the frequent tinkering with laws so vitally affecting the industrial and economic development of the nation as does tariff legislation. In the most recent attempt, early in Mr. Taft's administration, to mitigate the burdens high tariff schedules imposed, many a professedly devoted follower of the Democratic creed in the National legislature was found to have decided leanings toward protection, and to be disposed to urge a tariff for revenue or for free trade, only when the schedule under discussion did not affect him or his constituents.

Happily bigger and broader ideas are beginning to prevail, and the people have made it plainly clear that they will not have the question solved by men whose views can be made to suit any taste. Even the politicians realize this. The country must be allowed to work out its own prosperity unhampered by the pettiness of selfish interests that have heretofore ruled its activities. Both Republicans and Democrats are keenly alert to the change, and the policy, enunciated by Mr. Taft and Mr. Underwood alike, indicates a set purpose to eschew mere enthusiasm and the clap-trap of partisan passion. Their words will happily reassure men's minds when the country particularly needs reassurance.

MORE OPINIONS OF THE "ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA."

The following letter has been received by the editor of "The Catholic Encyclopedia" from his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons:

Your favor is just received. The unfriendly attitude of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" towards the Catholic Church, as set forth in AMERICA, was a startling revelation to me. Assurances had been given to me of its spirit of impartiality and justice. I had not critically examined it, and only occasionally referred to it for information on secular or biographical subjects.

I tried this A. M. but could not succeed in finding a set of the last edition of the "Encyclopædia."

If I am not mistaken, the conception of "The Catholic Encyclopedia" arose from some articles in "Appleton's" unfriendly to the Church. It was felix culpa. I hope also that good will come from the recent searching criticisms in AMERICA. I congratulate you on the continued success of "The Catholic Encyclopedia." It is a monumental work.

Faithfully yours in Xt,

J. CARD. GIBBONS.

August 14, 1911.

From one of the leading American authorities on Political and Social Economy:

"In the article on Socialism in the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' we read: 'In the Protestant parts of Germany the Socialists as a rule were Social-Democrats; in the Catholic as a rule they were Christian Socialists.' This is most astonishing information, but accords well with the treatment of Catholic subjects throughout the 'Encyclopædia.' It is a mistake the veriest tyro should not be guilty of, since it concerns a political party which has played a most important rôle before the eyes of the entire world. A similarity of titles has betrayed the author into identifying two interests which are as different as night and day. The Christian Social party, which is composed of Catholics, is opposed in every fundamental tenet to the Christian Socialists, with whom its members are confounded. We might excuse a mistranslation in the name, but cannot excuse a total misconception which would stultify the Church herself.

"We likewise, to our great surprise, discover that the most eminent student of the social question in the German episcopate, Bishop Ketteler, was himself a Socialist, although 'the Pope's encyclical of the 28th of December, 1878, bore no trace of his influence, mixing up as it did Socialists, Nihilists and Communists in one common condemnation.' Such treatment of social questions is a complete falsification of the position of the Catholic Church."

From a well-known literary woman in London, England:

"Many are enjoying your exposition of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica.' That work is scoffed at by educated people in England."

Catholic subjects have in great part been allotted to writers without the special knowledge necessary for the purpose, and—what is worse—with a reputation for hostility to the Church. . . . We shall have occasion to refer to this matter again, and content ourselves for the present in putting Catholics upon their guard in the event of their being approached by the publishers' agents. That so great a work should be turned into an agency for calumny and diatribe may well be designated a crime against civilization.—Catholic Record, London, Canada.

Thanks to AMERICA, the whole world now realizes that the new edition is false, mendacious and misleading. When the agent calls on you, show him the door. When you get a letter from the company asking you to order the new "Encyclopædia," tell them to send the foul and pestilential thing down the bay and have it fumigated first. Tell your friends to be careful lest they get fooled and contaminated by this vile work.—Western Catholic.

Don't buy the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and advise all your friends not to buy it. It is untrustworthy as to Catholic matters. It is malicious, bigoted, offensive and false. Do all you can to prevent its sale.—Catholic Columbian.

Catholics who honor the Virgin Mother of God will not admit the new edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" within their doors. They will leave it severely alone in the public libraries and everywhere treat it with the loathing it deserves. It defiles the spirit; it profanes the home; it is fetid with falsehood and putrid with prejudice. It is a menace to faith and morals. It reeks with insult to Catholics and their religion. It perpetuates old lies and rehashes old calumnies. It is bad in history, misleading in science, erratic in philosophy, blasphemous in theology. It is a mine of misinformation. What can a Catholic think of a work that cynically impugns the virginity of Mary Immaculate? Outrage of Catholic feeling could not go further. Yet this monumental liar impudently bids for Catholic patronage. Beware of the "Encyclopædia Britannica"!—The Rosary Magazine.

LITERATURE

Lessons in Logic. By WILLIAM TURNER, S.T.D. Washington: Catholic Education Press. London: R. & T. Washbourne. $1.25.

Catholic treatises on Logic, the foundation of philosophy, have not been as numerous in English as the Church's record in the philosophic field would lead one to expect, for it was Catholic scholars from St. Augustine to St. Thomas who preserved, renovated, amplified, and delivered to modern civilization both the foundation and the edifice. Protestants like Ramus, Francis Bacon, and their schools, would not receive even Aristotle under such auspices, but the premises on which Bacon grounded his much advertised departure are now recognized to have been erroneous. Aristotelean logic is not exclusively deductive; the inductive method is not capable by itself of directing the mind in scientific discovery, and both Aristotle and the Scholastics who developed his system did recognize the importance of induction. The laws of thought which they formulated from an accurate study of mental processes are true and, therefore, equally applicable to either method, the preponderant use of the one or the other depending on the needs, trend and opportunities of the age and the individual. The claim that Protestantism originated induction and, therewith, the practical inventions that largely resulted from its use, is no more true than that Luther invented the Copernican system, the New World and the printing-press.

These and other fallacies similarly biassed have been able until recently to find facile audience in the English-speaking world. A few elementary treatises excepted, Latin, which, among other advantages, has a fixed terminology, remained the philosophic medium till the "Stonyhurst Series" essayed to carry the war into Africa. In that well-planned set of volumes Scholastic philosophy is shown to be alone competent to meet every problem of the day; and it is also made clear that the collections of discursive essays, fanciful opinions, and arbitrary and contradictory theories that are classified as "English Philosophy" have no proper title to the name. With Maher's "Psychology" and Joyce's "Principles of Logic" the student is now equipped to meet the requirements of any university examination in these subjects, and to unravel the fallacies of modern philosophies.

What Father Joyce has done for university students and professors Dr. Turner's "Lessons in Logic" will accomplish for beginners. Though more, perhaps, is packed into its 300 pages than is desirable for the academic students whose needs it aims to meet, it is a clear and orderly exposition of the laws of thought and the methods of applying them to modern conditions. It takes account of divergent theories, disentangles the confusion of terms with which the inexactitudes of modern writers have burdened philosophy, and is as scientific in presentation as it is Scholastic in principle. As is proper to a work on Logic, it is only Catholic in the sense that it is based on fundamental truths and free from the sensism, subjectivism, agnosticism, and other erroneous theories subversive of truth that underlie most secular text-books. On its merits it should force its way into many non-Catholic institutions.

The first of the Catholic University series of philosophic text-books, "Lessons in Logic" is worthy of the author of "History of Philosophy," and bespeaks a favorable hearing for its successors. M. K.

The Queen's Fillet. By CANON SHEEHAN, D.D. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

Canon Sheehan's success as a story-writer has been so identified hitherto with the delineation of Irish character that one is predisposed to doubt his wisdom in venturing into foreign fields. No reader, however, will have turned many pages of this story of the French Revolution without reaching the conclusion that the author of "My New Curate" is as firm of touch and as interesting, if not so charming, in Paris as in Cork. In "The Intellectuals" he had deflected somewhat from the paths best suited to his genius, but here he again shows himself possessed of the great story-writer's art: the power to coin the dead matter into gold or weave it into gossamer, and make one feel the throb and pulse of history. He has chosen a field wherein he is pitted against many doughty antagonists, and, as far as our reading goes, we do not hesitate to declare him victor.

Following the career of Maurice de Brignon—who is forced by the count, his father, into a seminary, flies therefrom to the Revolutionists, abandons them in disgust to join the Vendean army, and finally reenters the cloister—we are shown step by step the insensate pride and pitiless oppression of the nobles as a class, the general subjection of the Church to court and nobility, the weakness of the King, the cowardice of the Girondist theorists, the unspeakable savagery and loathsome butcheries of the mob, and the noble heroism of the Queen and of the countless other brave victims of the Terrorist monsters whom the French Revolution unleashed upon the world. Mirabeau, Talleyrand (to whom the author is evidently partial), Cathelineau, Danton, Marat, Robespierre, and a multitude of lesser characters, all distinctly characterized, pass in review while the terrible, painfully thrilling episodes of the great cataclysm seem to rise before the eye, illumined and vivified by genius. The faults and virtues of nobles, churchmen and people are sketched with an insight that indicates wide and well-sifted reading, and praise and blame are impartially weighed, though the stupidity of the Bourbons in executing Ney provokes the addition of several indignant chapters. In the large gallery of striking portraits, the Queen, de Brignon, Chenier the poet, and Adèle, "the daughter of the Revolution," are drawn with exceptional power.

Substantially the book is a history, and a searching one, of the French Revolution, but essentially it is a story. Through it all de Brignon, noble, cleric, revolutionist, royalist, monk—an evolution of which the period furnishes not a few examples—binds the events and personages into a well-connected and fascinating narrative, one of the best and truest of the numberless romances which have been woven around that wonderful epoch. M. K.

Down Our Street. By J. E. BUCKROSE. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

The Justice of the King. By HAMILTON DRUMMOND. New York: The Macmillan Co.

A Room with a View. By E. M. FOSTER. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

How little quality is found in the quantity of books which flood the market at present is well evidenced by these. The first, "Down Our Street," has something to recommend it in the really delightful character of Mrs. Bean. Indeed she seems, with her unselfishness and somewhat blundering charity, a relic of a tribe that is fast decreasing. But the plot of the story has not much novelty in it, and its setting, a small English town, where one meets little else than dark houses, gloomy streets and foggy days, is, for all the author's efforts to the contrary, a bit depressing.

"The Justice of the King," while not devoid of interest, lacks the special virtue which we look for in a historical novel that would enter the lists with so many others of superior quality. The plot which finally evolves in the marriage of Ursula de Vesc, the youthful Dauphin's guardian, and Stephen La Mothe, who has been sent to Amboise to discover a plot against the life of King Louis, can scarcely be considered more than mediocre. In its favor, however, it must be said that it is quite free from that moral laxity, so common in modern novel-writing. The author is plainly in sympathy with the virtuous and at variance with vice.

This last may be said in general of "A Room with a View." But this is as far as commendation may go. For, from a literary view-point, it is hard to find cause for praise. The very title is almost meaningless, the plot commonplace and the episode obvious. The entire first half of the book is a rather desultory account of tourist life in Italy, connected by one or two slender threads with the subsequent half. A few episodes in the earlier pages give some hope of interest afterwards, but it is not until very near the climax that real interest is aroused—scarcely sufficient reward for plodding through two hundred pages. JOHN DUSTON, S.J.

Mr. David Goldstein has undertaken to begin an anti-Socialistic campaign in Pennsylvania, opening October 1 with a lecture at Tarentum. The point of attack has been well chosen. Pennsylvania is one of the States where the faith of Catholics is most terribly jeopardized, especially in the mining districts. The Appeal to Reason, a most violent Socialistic sheet, has in this State alone over sixty thousand subscribers. It is the duty of all who are entrusted with the spiritual or temporal welfare of our workmen to secure for them every possible opportunity of becoming acquainted with the tactics and the fallacious arguments of Socialism.

What lends to the lectures of Goldstein special significance and authority is the fact that he himself, before his conversion to Catholicism, had been one of the leaders in the Socialistic camp, and was the choice of his party as candidate for Mayor of Boston (1897). As a state executive committeeman at the Massachusetts Socialist Convention of 1902, he strongly advocated a constitutional provision which was meant to repudiate all members who promote religious hatred, free love and violence, and to disavow all literature which advocated such principles. Finding his efforts unavailing, he published, in joint authorship with Mrs. Avery, the book, "Socialism: The Nation of Fatherless Children," which has created considerable comment and has been largely quoted.

Mr. Goldstein's lectures are valuable likewise because of his standing in trades union circles. As a member of the Executive Board of the Cigar Makers' Union, No. 97, he possesses the confidence of the workmen and is master of his subject, besides being skilled in the art of quick-witted, rough-and-ready repartee such as the attacks of Socialists at these meetings of necessity demand. In the circular distributed for the Pennsylvania campaign it is stated that "Mr. Goldstein's lectures may be had according to ordinary financial arrangements, or by a plan whereby the cost for railroad fare, hotel bill and a personal fee may be saved, and at the same time the effectiveness of the lecture greatly enhanced by the dissemination of anti-Socialist literature." This last is a most important consideration. Socialists would never deliver a lecture without striving to distribute their literature. Mr. Goldstein is located at the Boston School of Political Economy, 468 Massachusetts avenue, Boston, Mass. J. H.

We are in receipt of "Irish Songs in English and Gaelic" and "Irish-American Patriotic Songs," by O'Sullivan and Seabrook, Chicago, and "Popular Selections from O'Neill's Dance Music of Ireland," all published by the "Gaelic Association of Chicago for the Preservation of Irish Ideals." The numerous publications of Irish dance and folk music by Captain O'Neill of Chicago are pronounced excellent by such a competent authority as Dr. Grattan Flood, and "a perfect quarry for future delvers in Folk Airs." The Irish Archeological Journal wonders how the Superintendent of Police of so populous a city found time to compile and arrange a complete and accurate collection of Gaelic airs, and asks when will an Irish Constabulary Inspector emulate his example. The song collection of Messrs. O'Sullivan and Seabrook, arranged mostly in two part harmony with piano accompaniment for junior classes, can be easily adapted to mature voices. The Chicago Society has been eminently successful in popularizing these songs and airs among the schools and Catholic associations of that city, and Rev. M. J. McNulty, S.J., the spiritual director, informs us that the Gaelic dances have proven as salutary morally as physically. That was to be expected. A moral race developed and preserved them. It was St. Francis de Sales, we believe, who said that dancing, like mushrooms, is harmless in itself but not nutritious. He had not witnessed Gaelic dances. Single, double, reel and hornpipe, hop and skip and swing and shuffle, with foot and ear alert to beat on the floor every note of the subtle music, give grace and suppleness and athletic training to the body while providing healthful recreation to the mind. The Chicago publications should greatly stimulate the growing interest in the folk and dance music of Ireland.

Father Tatlock, S.J., of the English Province, has issued a "Manual of Latin Phonography," an adaptation of Pitman's Shorthand to the Latin language. The Universe and Catholic Weekly of London says that the new logograms invented by Father Tatlock show much ingenuity, and congratulates him on a work that will appeal especially to ecclesiastical students.

"Gemma Galgani, a Child of the Passion," was an ecstasica and mystic who died in Italy only eight years ago. Well-attested marvels somewhat similar to those we read of in the life of the Poor Man of Assisi, and power with God like that the saints enjoy were of frequent occurrence in this young girl's life. On Friday blood would flow from her hands, and in her raptures she read the secrets of hearts. Philip Coghlan, C.P., tells Gemma's story, and Benziger Bros. publish the book.

It would perhaps have a sobering effect on magazine writers who have lately been singing loudly the praises of the King James Bible if they would read a little book of popular lectures published by Sands & Co., London, called "Where We Got the Bible." The author is Father Graham, a Scotch priest who was once a Presbyterian minister. He proves conclusively that unless the "Bible-hating Church" had preserved the Holy Scriptures, unless the "lazy monks" had made copies of them, and unless some benighted Catholics had been the first to English them, it is hard to see how the King James Version could ever have appeared at all.

The "Children of the Gael," by Charlotte Dease (St. Louis: Benziger Brothers), consisting of seven short but remarkable stories of survivals in the present day of older Gaelic types, is told with easy art in 196 pages. The "Travelling Piper," the "Old-time Woman" and "The Scholar" are particularly pleasing, being typical of the past and, apparently, prophetic of the future. The hope of the island Scholar, as he saw "the growing stream of students coming to learn, like their ancestors, the ancient Gaelic lore, that the Gael like the eagle might renew his youth," is evidently shared by the writer, who has contributed not a little towards the attainment of her desire that "glory shall sit on the sign of the Gael."

Republished controversies are generally difficult reading, especially to those far away from the scene of the discussion, and "God or No God in the Schools?" a pamphlet coming from distant New Zealand, is no exception to the rule. But the Right Rev. Henry W. Cleary, D.D., Bishop of Auckland, has provided his readers with such a well-stocked arsenal of arguments on the Catholic school question that pastors, editors and educators will be glad to have the booklet near at hand, especially as it is well indexed.

At the earnest request of Father Hudson, editor of the Ave Maria, J. Godfrey Raupert, the convert, whose able books on spiritism are so well known, has out a second edition of "Back to Rome!" As this work is "off the beaten track of controversy, and is of especial usefulness on account of the references to books unknown to the average reader," seekers after light may find in it the gleam that will guide them home. Benziger Bros. are the publishers.

"Louise Augusta Lechmere," a new biography published by Benziger Bros., is a French Jesuit's memoir of his mother. The Oxford Movement brought her, after many trials, into the Church, and the story she tells of her conversion is the best chapter in the book. Madame D'Arras gave three of her children to God, used her wealth to adorn His temples and to clothe His poor, gladly received into her Italian home religious exiled from France, and died happily a tertiary of St. Francis. The book might have been put together better.

EDUCATION

A topic, touched upon quite informally during the convention of the Catholic Education Association in Chicago early in July, is coming to be recognized as one well worth serious attention on the part of Catholic educators in this country. The European idea of the Social Week, as is well known, has, since 1900, been a prominent feature of organized effort against the growth of Socialism in many sections of that continent. Catholic leaders abroad have not been slow in seizing upon the helpfulness of popular instruction in fundamental principles as an aid in their campaign against the fallacies advocated by the Socialistic propaganda. To make right instruction of the people easy meetings are held, usually in industrial centres, where such problems as labor conditions, temperance, factory laws, child and woman welfare, health, housing and similar sociological questions may be studied in the concrete. In some countries one Social Week a year only is held, but in others the practice obtains of arranging for Weeks in several cities, one after another, the same instructors teaching the people's classes in all successively.

* * *

The plan now followed covers mornings, afternoons and evenings of all week-days, and calls for studies in Church history, rural problems, workingmen's homes and the entire round of religious and social affairs. When held in industrial centres the classes inspect factories, settlements, courts of justice, and make other studies at first hand. When local conditions permit, as in the case of school buildings occupied during vacation time, instructors and students live in common. The Weeks, as inaugurated in Europe among Catholics, are in charge, sometimes of priests, sometimes of laymen, and since their beginning they have, especially in France, enlarged their scope beyond social studies, to include religious studies, missions, and work for young people. Leading educators give the instruction, and the students are people in all walks of life.

* * *

The Social Weeks of Europe had their origin in Germany in 1900, when the Volksverein, that excellent pioneer force in Catholic social activities, organized them in several cities of Germany. They were introduced into France in 1904, with a Social Week in Lyons, and they have since been successively held in many of the large industrial and manufacturing cities in that much-tried land. Belgians started the work in 1908, and since that year Holland, Spain, Poland, Italy and Switzerland have followed the example set them by Catholics in those countries. Almost the entire Continent now has Social Weeks, and from their success they have come to bear the popular name of Travelling Social Universities. A feature of the work especially commendable is the help given by young Catholic laymen to the development of the plan in most of these countries.

It is this work which has attracted the attention of Catholic educators in our own country, and much thought is now being given to the problem of its adaptability to conditions in America. Tentative efforts were made last July to introduce the Week among Catholics here, and if one may measure the possibilities by the good results attained in classes held at Fordham University, New York City, and by the Western Catholic Chautauqua in Spring Bank, Wisconsin, the movement is an entirely feasible one. We are informed that several distinguished members of the hierarchy have been consulted in the matter, and that they have expressed the view that the movement, if followed up as planned along strictly social service lines, with competent laymen as instructors, should prove of great service to the Church in America. There will be no difficulty in securing competent instructors. Catholic colleges can furnish a sufficient number of them to make a beginning, and there are several industrial cities, notably Pittsburgh and St. Louis, in which existing strong Catholic organizations will welcome an initiation of this European idea.

Rev. Thomas F. Coakley, D.D., of Pittsburgh, has been making a study of the recently published report of the United States Commissioner of Education for the year ending June 30, 1910. From a note he communicates to the Pittsburgh Catholic we cull the following details. They will prove of interest to those of us who are watching the trend of popular education in this country.

1. One-fifth of the entire population of the United States is enrolled in the public schools.
2. The average length of the school year is steadily increasing; in the last twenty years it has gained an entire month.
3. Systematic transportation of children to public schools at the public expense is becoming very common in this country.
4. One State has over 2,000 schools in which the pupils number less than ten.
5. The teaching corps in our American schools is rapidly becoming feminized. In 1870 nearly 40 per cent. of the public school teachers were men; to-day a little over 20 per cent. are men, and nearly 80 per cent. are women.
6. The cost to educate a child in the public schools has more than doubled in the last forty years.
7. The expenditure per capita of population for the public schools last year was $4.45. Hence the 15,000,000 Catholics in the United States were taxed $66,000,000 to support the public schools.
8. The cost to educate one child per year in the public schools of the United States last year reached the total of $31.65. Hence the 1,300,000 Catholic children in the parochial schools of the country saved the nation $41,000,000.
9. The Catholic contribution to the elementary education fund of the country amounted last year, then, to the very considerable sum of $107,000,000.

These last are startling figures. Quite apart from every consideration of conscience, we have in them an argument that should appeal to every lover of fair play among us. There is something radically wrong in a system that obliges Catholics to contribute over a hundred millions a year to the cause of education, sixty-six millions of which sum goes for the support of a system whose benefits we may not enjoy.

Mr. McCutcheon, the well-known cartoonist, recently has been serving up to his admirers among the readers of the Chicago Tribune a series of pictures illustrating the trials and troubles of a college graduate. The untoward fortune attending the efforts of Charlie Dawson, A.B., his "hard luck" friend, in seeking a position, are humorously yet sympathetically depicted by Mr. McCutcheon. An impulsive reader of the Tribune rushes into print with the claim that Dawson is representative of a class, in that he had been the victim of a useless education. "Dawson had gone through college with no special end in view," says the gentleman, "and had come out of it as unfit to meet the world as the day he entered it, and he wished to enter his protest against the aimlessness of an untechnical college course."

The writer's view is quite common among certain of our countrymen to-day. It is unfortunate for our reputation as an educated people that it is so. Technical schools and technical training have their place in our educational system, and it is no mean one; but wise men among us concede the folly of specialization before one is equipped to specialize with advantage to himself. It is notorious that young men who attempt special work during the high school years or immediately at the close of them, are liable to be narrow, and that they are not only unable to take the place accorded by society to well-rounded men, but they actually cannot attain the highest places in their chosen vocation. M. J. O'C.

Lorenz Kellner, the great Catholic lay educator of Germany, so well realized the importance of religious teaching by religious teachers in the training of a child that his life and work was the constant upholding in vigorous practice of maxims like these:

"The soundest and truest principle of all education, that principle which embodies the truth of all others ever formulated can be nothing else than this: Educate men to follow and imitate Christ."

"Whoever labors in the teaching profession without charity will always be a hireling and fail of his reward."

"Therefore there can be no greater benefit than to strengthen our teachers in Faith and Charity, and every idea conducive to this end stands higher than the most methodical training and most perfect scientific system."

"The Gospels will ever remain as the best and truest 'breviary' for teachers."

* * *

"Remember that this was a level-headed man of the world," says a writer in the Irish Ecclesiastical Record, commenting on these words, "an official of that Prussian Government which was little likely to rest satisfied with a pious dreamer or a misty idealist of the ages of faith. He yet lays down for lay teachers, working for the State, the same ground principles as those great church educators who had, of course as first and primary end the training of citizens for that great 'Civitas Dei' which is to be peopled from all states, but is identical with none. Yet we often hear that men and women imbued with such ideas were quite unfit to educate youth for the stern realities of life."

"No doubt," the comment continues, "it is quite possible to train up children in a hot-house air of external piety resulting in a short-lived outward show of goodness. But the chief objection to such a system is just this, that it does not produce piety. That a really pious education, by which I mean one which will teach a youth to reverence God and man and respect his own soul, to penetrate his life by Christian faith, and shape his conduct by Christian morality, is likely to unfit him for any honest and honorable calling is a gratuitous absurdity—unless indeed we have reached the advanced standpoint of the late lamented Ferrer. If we could trace the inner history of those who have rolled down the slopes of life, or plunged over its precipices, we should find that in ninety cases out of every hundred some weakness in their moral fibre was the cause, some hidden canker eating at the bud, some want, in short, of Christian piety."

SOCIOLOGY

We have heard the praises of Leo XIII over and over again; yet we have never felt that he was over-praised. He was a great Pope, and his great encyclicals are a treasury of sound doctrine and of its practical application. Catholic sociologists are never weary of praising the Rerum Novarum on the condition of the working classes, and they are right. It is, indeed, a great document, so complete in its wonderful variety that one may draw from it matter apt to almost every social question.

But here comes a difficulty. Is not that completeness, that variety, a drawback? Do not many praise it, just because it is such a storehouse of wisdom that everyone can take a sentence here, a passage there, to confirm his own ideas and to enable him to say: "See, I have the Pope on my side! I am giving you the very words of Leo XIII!"?

We fear that this is sometimes the case. We have seen, occasionally sociological articles, bolstered up with quotations from the Rerum Novarum, which would not, we think, have commended themselves to Leo XIII. There is an old saying about the devil quoting scripture, and even Henry George allowed that he found many wholesome truths in that great encyclical. The fact that the Rerum Novarum is a perfect document designed to guide us in the consideration of all questions arising between capital and labor, requires that one who would use it, must study it as a whole, and thus master the entire Christian system propounded by its wise author; for unless one has grasped the whole system, he cannot say that his treatment of the questions it touches is according to the mind of Leo XIII. On the other hand, to use it merely as a source of quotations, whence we may draw what suits our own preconceived notions, while we ignore what goes contrary to them, is not to use, but to abuse the treasure Leo XIII has left us.

A point too often overlooked, we think, is that, according to the Holy Father, it is not enough that associations established, not only for the social improvement of the working classes, but even for the vindication of their rights, should be founded on Catholic principles. They must be founded in Catholic practice; in the practice of religion, of mortification and self restraint; in the seeking first the Kingdom of God; in the manly contempt of passing sensual gratification, which enables one to practice thrift and thus lay by something for sickness and old age; in the proper observance of Sunday, keeping it holy and not making it the occasion of useless spending and vicious indulgence, and in the patient endurance of what can not be changed at all, and even of what can be changed, but only by means either wrong in themselves or out of all proportion with the end to be obtained.

Another point very much neglected, upon which, nevertheless, the Pope insists most strenuously, is, the great part that almsgiving and alms-receiving must have, not only in the practice of religion, but also in every scheme for the social betterment of the working classes. The world looks upon the receiving of alms as shameful: the Christian religion views it as most honorable; for those who receive alms are in the place of Christ Himself. The world would do away with the shame of charity as destructive of self-respect: God tells us that it is part of His plan for men, and any attempt to ignore it will bring to nought any scheme however well devised.

"The Militia of Christ for Social Service" is a society that has been organized to defend Christian society according to the teachings of Leo XIII and Pius X. We welcome it as such. What we have said regarding the treatment of the Rerum Novarum is true, though perhaps not to the same degree, of all the encyclicals of these pontiffs touching social questions; and therefore an association of Christian men who will study them under competent direction, in order to reduce the Catholic theory to practice, is a sort of guarantee that the day of the infiltration of alien ideas and principles into our Catholic works has passed.

The Apostolic Delegate and the Archbishop of St. Louis have given the society words of encouragement. Among its general officers and directors are men of influence in labor organizations, who will be expected to take the doctrine of Leo XIII all in all, to practice it, and propagate it. The executive secretary is the Rev. Peter E. Dietz, of Oberlin, Ohio.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Speaking editorially of the supposedly permanent administration launched in Portugal by the election of Arriaga to the Presidency, the New Orleans Picayune compares the Portuguese concept of republicanism with the American view, not much to the credit of the former:

"With the formal election of Mr. Arriaga as the first constitutional President the Portuguese Republic begins its career as a full-fledged commonwealth under republican forms. Mr. Arriaga is a university professor, without much experience in public affairs, but he no doubt represents the dominant forces at present in power—namely, the so-called intellectuals—who construe republicanism to mean free thinking. In a word, Portugal is now organized as an atheistic republic, not merely in the sense that it recognizes no relation between Church and State, but it actually antagonizes all forms of religion.

"That such a republic can endure in its present form it is difficult to believe. There is no evidence that it has genuine popular support. The great masses of the people, who resent the persecution of religion by those in power, are either indifferent or hostile, and about the only actual support which the leaders have is the Socialistic and radical backing of the large cities.

"There is not the least prospect that there will be any outside attempt to interfere with the new republic. Practically all the Powers have already recognized it, and, although there may be no particular respect for the Lisbon government, there is no disposition anywhere to place obstacles in its way. Even such monarchical countries as Germany and Austria display no active hostility, nor even aloofness.

"The republic in Portugal is, however, a vastly different thing from what we of America understand by a free and representative government. Separation of Church and State as decreed by Portugal is by no means the sort of separation we know in this country. With us it is a free Church in a free State; in Portugal the Church has no freedom at all, but is severely persecuted, its ministers expelled and its revenues confiscated. Even its ceremonials are subject to government regulation, and that, too, by officials who openly boast of their purpose to make Portugal a godless nation.

"The so-called 'intellectuals,' who for the moment dominate Portugal, are in the main Socialists and dreamers. That they will be able to bring prosperity and contentment to the country is extremely unlikely. Instead of conciliating the property owning class and business interests, they have persecuted them and driven many of them into withdrawing their money from Portugal and investing it elsewhere. A commonwealth which lacks the loyal support of the religious people and openly antagonizes the commercial interests has hardly the elements of stability."

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The love of the late Archbishop Ryan for the Indians was so well known, and his interest in their welfare of such a practical nature, that it seems but fitting that his first monument should be erected among them. Several of his friends recently sent the Marquette League $1,000, with which to erect a mission chapel, to be called St. Patrick's after his patron and as a memorial to Archbishop Ryan. The mission of Medicine Lake, Montana, in the diocese of Great Falls, has been chosen for this gift. Work has been begun, and it is hoped that the chapel will be opened on St. Patrick's Day, 1912. It will seat at least two hundred and will be in the midst of people who are wretchedly poor, even for Indians. The Marquette League is greatly interested in this its eighth chapel among the Indians, and hopes to be also able to supply it with the necessary vestments and altar linens, as gifts from others of the Archbishop's friends.

That the movement of laymen's retreats has taken hold on the Catholic layman in America was never more fully evidenced than in the retreat recently given at St. Charles' College, Grand Coteau, La., by Rev. Wm. Power, S.J. Last year the first retreat was given, and it was a very modest beginning. This year saw all the retreatants of last year who could possibly come, redeeming their pledge to return and bring with them at least one friend. The result was that the retreats opened with almost double the number of last year. The social status of the exercitants was even more democratic in its character than that of the previous retreat. Almost every stratum of society had its representative. An eminent jurist and author could be seen side by side with an humble mechanic following the exercises with the docility of children. A notable feature of the retreat was the pilgrimage to the scene of the apparition of St. John Berchmans at the Sacred Heart Convent. The cure effected by that Saint on that occasion was one of the miracles accepted for his canonization. This pilgrimage took place on the feast of the Saint. It was a sight inspiring in the extreme to see the long procession of Catholic laymen wending its way to the shrine, to the cadence of hymns, litanies and rosary. At the close of the retreat all present renewed the pledge of coming back next year and bringing with them as many as they could influence.

In the Middle West at St. Marys, Kansas, also, the retreat movement is past the experimental stage. The increase in point of numbers was most gratifying at nearly all the centres. St. Marys had three courses with 250 in attendance, Prairie du Chien two courses with 73, Brooklyn (near Cleveland) two courses with 59, Techny, Ill., two courses with 34, and St. Louis one course with 5 retreatants. Two years ago but 34 laymen attended the exercises, last year 93, and this year 250, the percentage of increase exceeding by far the 100 mark. In 1910 229 laymen made the retreat, while in 1911 there were 421. With an increase of nearly 100 per cent. as a criterion, who could predict aught but success for 1912?

In the presence of five thousand persons the cornerstone of St. Ambrose's new parish school in New York City was laid on September 4, by Archbishop Farley. The new building will cost about $150,000. The Very Rev. John P. Chidwick, President of St. Joseph's Seminary, Dunwoodie, N. Y., and former pastor of St. Ambrose's parish, preached the sermon, in which he referred to the sacrifices made in years gone by "for the establishment of a school system where God would be mentioned, the faith would be perpetuated, and the welfare of the State best conserved and continued." He added:

"Years have rolled by and one-half of the victory has been scored. The lips of the defamers have been closed and the voice of denunciation has been hushed. Men in high places of state, men in the highest walks of life, irrespective of their religious beliefs, now openly commend the establishment of this school system. It seems to me that it is impossible to rid this country of crime unless we adopt a system of education whereby the youth is trained and improved spiritually as well as intellectually.

"Here in New York City there are being erected four or five parish schools each year. At the present time in the diocese presided over by his Grace the Most Rev. Archbishop Farley there are 156 parish schools wherein 77,000 children are educated for God and for country. There have been constructed and paid for school buildings costing $13,186,000. We acknowledge that the universities of the land perform a grand mission, but more important still is the parish school, that exercises its influence over the little children, who need not only a sound education but a spiritual training as well. The money for this system of education does not come from men of abundant wealth, but from men and women of a meagre store of wealth, from the poor."

The Most Rev. John J. Glennon, D.D., Archbishop of St. Louis, has been notified by the Most Rev. Diomed Falconio, Apostolic Delegate, that a decree has been issued from Rome, by the terms of which twelve counties are taken from his archdiocese and attached to the diocese of St. Joseph, Mo., under the jurisdiction of the Right Rev. M. F. Burke, D.D.

PERSONAL

On Sunday, August 27th, the Mothers Vicar of the Society of the Sacred Heart assembled at Ixelles, Brussels, from all parts of the world, elected a successor to the late Superior General, Very Reverend Mother Digby, in the person of Reverend Mother Janet Stuart, who had been acting as Vicar General since Mother Digby's death. For many years Mother Stuart, who had been received by Mother Digby into the Society of the Sacred Heart, had lived in close daily intercourse with her predecessor, had worked under her guidance, and succeeded her as Superior Vicar at Roehampton, near London, when Mother Digby became General of the Order. Like Mother Digby, she is a convert to the Catholic faith. She is well known in America, having visited all the houses of the Society in North America with Mother Digby, in 1898-99. She went as the latter's representative to all the South American convents in 1901, and later to Rome, to testify in the cause of Venerable Mother Duchesne.

Letters of administration for the estate of Rev. John J. Quinn, of the Hartford diocese, were granted by the Hartford Probate Court, on September 8. Father Quinn, who disappeared seven years ago, was thus declared legally dead. He went to visit a brother priest in Norfolk, Va., in February, 1904. He spent some time there, and then bought tickets and booked passage back to Hartford. Nothing more was ever heard of him. The mysterious fate that overtook him recalls the wise provision of the Church in praying for her departed children not only by name but in general as she does for the souls of all the faithful departed.

OBITUARY

The Rt. Rev. Dr. Conmy, Bishop of Killala, County Mayo, Ireland, died August 27, and was buried with solemn requiem in the Ballina Cathedral, Cardinal Logue presiding, September 1. Born at Castleconner, in the Killala diocese, 1843, he was educated at St. Muredach's Seminary and at Maynooth, where he was ordained, 1866. Appointed successively professor of the diocesan seminary, administrator, and pastor, he was consecrated, 1892, Coadjutor to Bishop Conway, whom he succeeded in 1893. Killala is one of the most famous dioceses in the history of the Irish Church, having been founded in 443 by St. Patrick, who placed it in charge of his relative, St. Muredach, whose church, Cell Alaid, gave its name to the See. It embraces the historic baronies of Tireragh and Tirawley, and Archbishop Healy, paying tribute to Dr. Conmy, declares that he had increased their fame. "Among his most conspicuous services to the twin cause of religion and education must be reckoned in building and equipping, from funds raised almost exclusively from his own faithful priests and people, of the splendid seminary that now graces the town of Ballina and bids fair to revive the olden name of the School of Killala founded by St. Patrick." The Mayo County Council and other public bodies passed resolutions of condolence, recording Dr. Conmy's services to faith and country.

Sister Loretto Whelan died, on September 2, at Mount Hope Retreat, near Arlington, Md., after more than forty years' service as a nurse of the insane. Her nephew, Rev. John T. Whelan, pastor of St. Mary, Star of the Sea, Baltimore, celebrated the high Mass of requiem. Sister Loretto was one of three sisters who were members of the Order of Sisters of Charity. Sister Aureau, who died several years ago, was for fifty years a teacher in St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum, Washington. A younger sister, Sister Catherine, volunteered to nurse the sufferers from yellow fever who were quarantined in New Orleans at the time of the yellow fever epidemic in 1858. She was herself stricken and died a martyr of charity.

Dr. Thomas Dwight, for four decades Professor of Anatomy at Harvard University, died at Nahant, Mass., September 8. He was born in Boston, 1843, and entered the Catholic Church with his mother in 1855. He was graduated M.D. in Harvard, 1867, and having studied under eminent specialists in Europe, was appointed Instructor of Anatomy, 1872. Later he was a lecturer and professor, and editor of the Medical Journal, and in 1883 he succeeded Oliver Wendell Holmes in the Parkman Professorship of Anatomy, a position he held till his death. His numerous books, papers and lectures on anatomical subjects won him an international reputation; but he also found time to write and labor much in the interests of religion. While he was President of the American Anatomists' Association he was also President of the Boston Catholic Union and of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, and when last year the association of Catholic physicians and surgeons formed the Guild of St. Luke, Dr. Dwight was chosen as its head. His latest book, "Thoughts of a Catholic Anatomist," was issued a few months ago.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY SUMMER SCHOOL.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Summer School of the Catholic University of America, which was established in the interest of our teaching Sisters, has successfully closed its first session. A retrospect reveals many characteristics that contributed to make the history of those five weeks memorable.

There was, first of all, the eagerness of the Sisters to embrace the advantages offered them, although, all being teachers, they were more in need of rest, after a year's hard work, than to apply their minds so steadily. With conscientious zeal they attended as many as six or eight lectures daily, taking notes from all of them.

Notwithstanding the strain upon the nerves and mind, the Sisters kept up all their religious exercises with exactness. Rising at five o'clock, they began the day with meditation and Mass, and between study recited the office and other prayers of obligation. A familiar sight was a black or white robed Sister saying her beads or reading her office walking about the grounds.

Previous to the opening of the School, fear was expressed that vocations would be endangered by contact with the world, after some years of seclusion. To disabuse the mind of such an idea one had but to be an observer at daily Mass in any chapel; to kneel in the group at Benediction; or to see the eager listeners at the evening lectures on the Life of Christ. After a day of mental fatigue, to take an interest in purely religious matters argues well for the spiritual advantages of the Summer School.

The social aspect of the School contributed more than anything else toward success. The faculty were always accessible, and met all inquiries and comments graciously. They accompanied the Sisters on sight-seeing tours, and provided for their comfort and well-being on every occasion.

The Sisters, by their gracious, cordial manner, and modest, dignified bearing, won the esteem and affection of seculars everywhere. On the cars and boats they had a willing servant in every employee.

But among the Sisters themselves, in their daily intercourse with one another, the greatest enjoyment was to be found in the congenial dispositions and kindred tastes and ideas encountered. After perhaps years of seclusion, many bright women were permitted by their superiors to take advantage of the privileges offered; and meeting others under similar circumstances, they could interchange ideas to their mutual helpfulness. Old friendships were renewed, and new ones formed.

As each successive vacation brings renewed success to the Summer School, the Sisters attending the first session may consider themselves fortunate in being permitted to lay the foundation for such a noble work.

Uniform Divorce Laws.—There were twenty-four states represented at the Governors' Conference which was held at Spring Lake, N. J., last week. At the opening session Governor Carey, of Wyoming, criticised sharply the present divorce laws of the different states and urged the enactment of a uniform measure, which would make divorce practically impossible. On this point he said:

"The question of divorce, to my mind, is one of the most important that concerns the people of the United States. In traveling across the Continent you find states where divorces are handed out while you wait. These divorces are undermining the very best that there is in our system of government. Under the Anglo-Saxon system plan we believe that the marriage relation is good for man and good for woman. We believe it should be entered into for life and that only in extreme cases should there be an exception to this rule. These divorces are granted by collusion. They are granted often through the most flagrant perjury, and when one has once entered into the divorce court and has obtained what he or she believes to be relief it is never out of their mind that things can't go just right.

"I am from Wyoming, a woman suffrage state. I want to see woman's suffrage adopted in every state of the union. I want the women to take this question up and make a fight for it. Marry one man and stick to that man. Marry one woman and stick close to her so long as life does last.

"Only, I say, in extreme cases should this rule be departed from. I don't care how much you suffer. Study that question before you enter into that relation. Now, these states should get together. I don't believe in going to Congress to agitate a constitutional amendment to do things that can be done through the states themselves."

Governors Uphold State Rights.—The most important action of the Conference was the decision to unite in a protest to the United States Supreme Court against the invasion of States' rights by Federal Courts. This is not the old question of States' Rights, or the right of a State to dissolve, as far as it is concerned, the Federal compact, but rather the question of States' authority. "The twilight zone between State and Federal authority," Governor Hadley said, "is the zone in which those business enterprises live and dwell which desire to escape regulation and to defeat the authority of both sovereignties." And he added a warning given in a notable speech of Secretary Root, delivered some years ago in Philadelphia, that "unless the people of the several states proceeded to exercise the powers that they enjoyed under our system of government, those powers would be gradually absorbed by the National Government, which would exercise them in their stead." Governor Harmon of Ohio, former Attorney General of the United States, will head the committee which will appear before the United States Supreme Court as the authorized representatives of the individual states to protest against any decision that will curtail the rights of the states to fix railroad rates and otherwise control public utility corporations within their respective boundaries. His colleagues will be Governor Hadley, of Missouri, and Governor Aldrich, of Nebraska. The motion adopted was made by Governor Emmet O'Neal, of Alabama. The action of the conference was declared unanimous, as Governor Kitchin, of North Carolina, who alone opposed it, did so, he said, solely because it would be a departure from precedent. Two of the three members of the committee named by the Governors to represent them are Republicans. This appearance before the Nation's highest tribunal will be made, it is said, when the eight Western railroad rate cases come up for reargument, following the action of the Supreme Court in ordering a rehearing after United States Justice Sanborn held in the Minnesota case that the Railroad Commission of that State had no power to fix rates.

Dr. Wiley Vindicated.—President Taft's decision in the Wiley case completely exonerates the chief of the Bureau of Chemistry. Again the President shows himself the upright and open-minded judge. He says frankly that the Personal Board preferred untenable charges against Dr. Wiley, and that the Attorney-General was misled into sharing the board's views. "An examination of the whole case," the President says, "satisfies me that a different construction ought to be put upon what was done; that the evidence does not show that Dr. Wiley was a party to the correspondence or the letters upon which the chief charge is founded, and that his action in the matter was only in accord with previous precedents in the department, which justified him in doing what he did." The President does not directly censure Secretary Wilson, but he does find that "the questions had not been presented to the persons involved in such a way as to enable them to make a full defense;" that "the whole record" was not put before the Attorney-General when he gave his opinion, and that there are "very much broader questions involved" than those he passed on. These words foreshadow changes in the Department of Agriculture. The vindication of Dr. Wiley, in the opinion of the press of the country, should mean the immediate retirement of Secretary Wilson.

Canada.—Nelson, B. C., is searching for an incendiary who has been working there for some time. After several smaller fires had occurred, the Nelson Brewery was burned to the ground. But the climax was reached when the great Hall smelter was set on fire and totally destroyed. The loss is at least $250,000, besides that arising from the stopping of work, which, after five years, was on the point of being resumed. An attempt to reopen the coal mines in Eastern British Columbia and Alberta, closed on account of strike since last spring, has not succeeded. The authorities in Saskatchewan have warned the public of the danger of coal famine during the winter, and have recommended the laying in of timely supplies.—The Canadian Episcopal Church Synod has been in session in London, Ont. Notwithstanding the advice of some of the wiser and better informed members, several ministers, following the lead of Bishop Farthing, of Montreal, brought up the Ne

Temere decree, and clamored for legislation requiring all to recognize the validity of every marriage legal according to civil law.

Great Britain.—The Royal Commission, arising out of the late strikes, has been hearing the evidence of the Railway unions on the subject of intimidation and discrimination practiced against active members by the Railway Companies and their insincere dealings with agreements. Up to the latest reports nothing very serious has been brought out. Afterwards the Companies and the non-union men will be heard.—All kinds of reports are circulated daily and contradicted concerning the Government's preparations for war.—The dissensions in the Unionist party are not being made up so easily. An invitation to Lord Robert Cecil to contest South Kensington at the next vacancy as an independent Unionist has revealed a new branch of the party, of which the professed object is the protection of middle class interests. Its program is not very clear, though the fact that it turns to Lord Robert Cecil implies that it favors Free Trade. Neither is its strength apparent at present.—Answering an enquirer, Lord Hugh Cecil says, that he has no idea of resigning his seat for Oxford University on account of his conduct in the House of Commons lately, and that he has no reason to believe his constituents wish him to do so.—It is proposed from Australia that the Crystal Palace be acquired by the states within the Empire for perpetual pageants of Empire, etc. The idea is not a bad one. Originally built as the temple of peace through commerce and free trade, it has outlived one dream. It may well outlive another, and become after a few years the temple of Syndicalism, perhaps.—Among the articles lost advertised for in the papers, is a gold pencil case, bearing the imperial cypher and crown of William II. The reward offered for its return is only a pound.—The naval airship Mayfly is still in the hypothetical condition indicated by its name.

Ireland.—The Centenary of the establishment of the Irish Christian Brothers in Cork was marked by extraordinary celebrations in that city during the week commencing September 3. Mayor and Council attended High Mass in the Cathedral, whence a procession, which included all the public bodies of Cork, marched to the City Hall, where due tribute was paid to the Brothers' century of services. Commencing with 17 they have now some 3,000 pupils, who have been leaders in the examinations of the Intermediate Board since its establishment.—On the same day Dublin witnessed a Temperance procession of 20,000 men and youths, all enrolled in the total abstinence societies. They included several of the labor organizations of Dublin. Mr. A. M. Sullivan, K. C., said that, while the Parliament Bill would ultimately enable Irishmen to control the licensing laws, as well as all others, neither self-government nor just laws would benefit workers or people unless they were themselves governed by temperance and self-denial.—Also on September 3 occurred the dual Consecration at Ballaghderreen by Archbishop Healy, of Dr. Morrisroe, Bishop of Achonry, and Dr. O'Doherty, Bishop of Zamboanga, the Philippines, both natives of the diocese and eminently distinguished, the former as professor in Maynooth, the latter as Rector of Salamanca. Addresses were presented by representatives of all civil, educational, social and religious organizations of the Archdiocese.—The Liberals and Unionists have begun their propaganda on the Home Rule issue. The Eighty Club, the central Liberal society in England, have opened their campaign by a tour through Ireland, including Dublin, Belfast, Galway, Limerick and Cork. In Galway they will be the guests of Rt. Rev. Bishop O'Dea. The opening of the Unionist campaign was marred by the defection of a prominent M. P., who won Montgomery Borough from the Liberals. Col. Price Jones, M. P., speaking to his constituents said, that since for generations Ireland returned four-fifths of her members pledged to Home Rule, she ought to have it. It is stated that a considerable number of Conservative members share his views. Professor Oldham, of University College, Dublin, who also hitherto had been a Unionist, addressing the British Association on Irish Finance, said the financial system of the Union had robbed Ireland of $1,750,000,000, and was now extracting annually seventeen millions in excess of its lawful share. Self-government, including Ireland's control of its own taxes, was the only remedy he could see.—The prospects of Galway being accepted by the Government as the transatlantic port connecting the British Isles with Canada have been improved by the strikes at Liverpool, where the big shipping companies are centred. A route from Galway to Nova Scotia or Newfoundland would save from two to three days, and the importance of Galway as a strategic point in case of war with Germany is also said to weigh with the Government.

France.—On September 12 nothing was as yet known about the results of the negotiations with Germany with regard to Morocco, though it was rumored that Germany's proposition had been refused. On the 14th it was reported that France demands a full Protectorate over Morocco just as England has over Egypt. This concession is made by England as payment for the relinquishment by France over all rights in Egypt. The German papers, in consequence, declare that the Kaiser is right in his protest against the contravention of the Treaty of Madrid in 1880, the Algeiras Act, and the separate agreements between France and the other Powers.—Sabotage on the railways continues, and the excitement about "Mona Lisa" is unabated. The Italian artists of Paris made a visit on September 3 to Amboise, where Leonardo da Vinci, the painter of the lost picture, was buried. Was it a pilgrimage of reparation?—The Seine is said to be running dry. At Charenton, where the water is usually thirty feet deep, people are wading across.

Belgium.—After the successful rally in Louvain in support of Schollaert and his policies, another is proposed for the first Sunday in October to hold up the hands of Prime Minister de Broqueville. It will take place at Moll, de Broqueville's birth-place, and will coincide with his twenty-fifth anniversary of public life.

Italy.—Etna is again pouring out rivers of lava, which move at the rate of 1,250 feet an hour. On September 13 the streams had already traveled several miles in a northeasterly direction. The towns of Linguaglossa and Randazzo are being deserted. At one place fifty earthquake shocks were felt within an hour. The entire crest appeared to be in a state of ebullition. As there is a dense population on the slopes of the mountain the results may be most disastrous.—The Peace Congress which was to be held in Rome, September 25, has been postponed on account of the cholera.

Portugal.—President Arriaga's cabinet consists of Joao Chagas, President and Minister of the Interior; Duarte Leite, Treasury; Pimenta Castro, War; Joao Menezes, Navy; Augusto Vasconcellos, Foreign Affairs, Sidonio Paes, Public Works; Celestino Almeida, Colonies; and Senhor Leitte, Justice, the first appointee, Souza Andrade, having declined to serve.—The Spanish consul at Oporto has communicated to his government that there are cases of bubonic plague in that city.—Some Portuguese students who were studying in Paris at Government expense or in the enjoyment of burses administered by the Government, were deprived of their allowance and left penniless. They complained to no purpose to the Portuguese representative.—Arriaga's election is not acceptable to the whole country. In Oporto, it was greeted with a demonstration against "the traitors and false Republicans, Arriaga and Duarte," and with cheers for Machado. "Within two paces of the grave," says Silva Vianna, "Arriaga will never have a will of his own nor an energetic act nor any initiative that he can claim as his own; he will be kicked about like a football by those who put him in office."—The seminary Guimaraes, one of those seized off-hand by the Government, has been turned over to the local civil authorities to be used as a boarding college.—Speaking of the Separation Law, M. Moises Netter, grand rabbi of France, who is known for his broadmindedness and conciliatory spirit, says in l'Univers Israelite: "It is a misshapen work which is offensive to good sense, propriety, reason and custom, and which the Pontiff very justly refused to recognize as acceptable to the Church in Portugal."—In an editorial on the administration of ecclesiastical funds, O Grito do Povo regrets that under the old régime "high reasons of State and the precept of silence laid on the Catholic press prevented a proper and timely regulation. It was an error which, in the present hour of trial, must weigh heavily upon those who were to blame for it. By changing all things, events have also put an end to the humiliating and slavish dependence on the civil power of the old régime, and to the prudence of those who would permit nothing to be done for fear of disturbing the 'equilibrium,' which, in some respects, was worse than the present persecution. Nothing now hinders the bishops and priests from petitioning the Holy See for a renewal of the privileges of the Bull of the Holy Crusade, on entirely new lines, and so that all its revenue may be applied to the needs of the Church."

Spain.—The reassembling of the Cortes has been postponed until November. A recent demonstration in Barcelona against the infliction of the death penalty was such that is called to mind, "No rogue e'er felt the halter draw," etc. It was followed by two cartoons in a paper of the city. One represented the parade, and the other a melancholy procession of those prominent in the world's life who in the past few years have been murdered. President McKinley, King Humbert and the Empress Elizabeth of Austria-Hungary were among them. They were headed by a banner, "Away with the Death Penalty."—Owing to disorders arising from strikes, martial law has been proclaimed in Viscaya. There have been clashes between strikers and strike-breakers and between the civil guard and the populace.—Two Spanish soldiers near the border laid down their arms and crossed over, declaring that they were done with monarchism. While still in their uniforms, they were feasted and regaled by the local Portuguese authorities.

Germany.—Many of the current accounts of the German proposals and counter-proposals in the Moroccan controversy have little foundation except in the imagination of the writers and possibly in the plausibility of their views. The main demand of Germany, according to the semi-official report of the Kölnische Zeitung, is an absolute security that German industries shall be given complete freedom of action, and German commerce shall continue undisturbed in Morocco. On this condition political predominance will be conceded to France at the price of a stipulated compensation. In the meantime the press has maintained in its rumors a perpetual see-saw of war and peace, peace and war, now declaring that it is morally certain that no recourse will be had to arms and now protesting that the final argument must be spoken from the cannon's mouth. On the night of September 13, the latest counter reply to Germany was given by France. It is said to be nothing more than a revised and improved draft of the treaty submitted on September 4, not differing from it in any essential point. The German "optimism" has not failed because of it, in spite of war-trumpetings from certain quarters. So likewise the depression upon the bourse, according to the German financial press, was not due to the withdrawal of French gold

German Army Maneuvers.—An invasion of Germany by a foreign power was simulated in the recent maneuvers of the German troops which have attracted so much attention because of the Morocco crisis. The movements soon took on the realism of actual war operations and were followed with the greatest interest and enthusiasm. Many American officers were present upon the scene and the actions were critically watched by the Emperor. The invading force under Prince Friedrich Leopold marched upon Berlin, and after various successes and reverses finally met with a complete defeat by the smaller army under Field Marshal Baron von der Goltz, who made good his reputation as a strategist and leader. In a real battle the invading host would have been completely cut to pieces or captured by him. Should a war occur Baron von der Goltz would most probably hold supreme command of all the German troops.—One of the main lessons taught in these maneuvers is the great effectiveness of the aviation service for reconnoitering the position and ascertaining the movements of the enemy. Dirigible balloons and aeroplanes were in constant employ, and both commanders stated that their operations had been based mainly upon the reports brought in by the aviators. An official acknowledgment was drawn up by the general staff praising their eminent service. French officers seem to have arrived at similar conclusions from their own experiments. In favorable weather any turning movements, such as decided the Russo-Japanese war, could not escape detection. The German army department has at present an entire series of airships under construction, representing every type which has met with official approval. Everything points to a rapid development of an aerial reconnoitering service as an appendage to every army.

Austria.—The explanations offered by the British Ambassador at Vienna, Sir Fairfax Cartwright, to exonerate himself from the embittered expressions against Germany and the German Emperor, ascribed to him by the Neue Freie Presse, are not considered satisfactory. The paper contends that the person responsible for the published interview is a man of approved reliability.—The resignation of the Minister of War, Baron von Schönaich, was promptly handed in to Emperor Franz Joseph on his return to Vienna. It is an open secret that disagreements between the Archduke Franz Ferdinand and the Minister of War have led to this culmination.

Holland.—Queen Wilhelmina has abandoned her purpose of opening Parliament in person in consequence of the determination of the Socialists to make a demonstration on the streets for the purpose of demanding universal suffrage.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Morality without Religion

"Morality can certainly be taught independently of religion. Many contend that it can be practised perfectly without religion. . . . There were good pagans."

We were greatly surprised, or rather deeply pained to read these words on the editorial page of a brilliant Catholic contemporary. The statements will undoubtedly prove a stumbling block to many, and are likely to be quoted with gladness by the enemies of Catholic education. When the writer laid down the proposition that "morality can certainly be taught independently of religion," he may have been thinking of the "peccatum philosophicum," or of sin in the life of an atheist; or possibly he wanted to emphasize the difference between morality and obligation. Now, if by morality we mean the goodness or badness of a human act, it may be defended that some acts are good or bad without any reference to religion. One can well imagine a school teacher telling the children it is wrong to lie or steal. But it is hard to imagine how one can teach them, without reference to religion, that it is wrong to curse or to swear. Thus the morality of many actions, some of them the most important in life, cannot be taught apart from religion.

But if by morality we mean not merely the goodness or badness of an action, but the doctrine of man's obligation of performing certain actions and of avoiding others, there is no Catholic who can talk of morality and say it can be taught without religion. The reason is this. Obligation implies law and law implies the binding of the human conscience. Such a binding force implies a law-giver whose authority reaches the conscience. But there is no such law-giver apart from a Personal God, and consequently the existence of moral obligation cannot be taught apart from religion.

As to the morality of the pagans, in some cases it was a morality without any basis but that of decorum or ambition; in other cases it was based on religion and the belief in an all-seeing Deity.

But it is not the morality of two or three actions, but of a vast number that has to be taught our children. And even religion, if it be only natural religion, cannot take all these actions within its sphere. The only religion that can reach out to all such actions and show their morality clearly and effectively is the religion given us through God's merciful Revelation. Hence, as to morality, if the word is used to imply "obligation,"—and this is the morality to be taught in the class-room—there is no such thing apart from the religion whose central truth is the existence of a Personal God, who is at the same time Lawgiver and Judge. On this point the mind of the Church is explicit. "Morality needs a divine sanction" is the teaching of the fifty-sixth proposition of the Syllabus, and "the obligation enforcing it must come from God."

The letter of Pius IX to the Archbishop of Friburg speaks in strong terms of condemnation of a system of education for the young which is divorced from the Catholic Faith. Such a system of education is declared to be a source of "grievous harm" to society, and "most pernicious," especially if adopted in elementary schools. Leo XIII, addressing the bishops of Canada on this very subject of religious education, in his Encyclical Affari Vos (Dec. 8, 1897) expressly declares that "without religion there can be no moral education deserving of the name." But it is hardly necessary to quote ecclesiastical authorities on this point. Americans should ponder over the words of Washington in his farewell address:

"Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education or minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle."

And again: "Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with public and private life. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligations desert the oaths, which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion."

The distinguished editor whose proposition that morality can certainly be taught without religion we have taken exception to, is far from upholding such a system, or belittling the effective work of Catholic schools. He very pointedly remarks that the public schools are not bad for what they are, but for what they fail to do. He insists that "religion should be taught in conjunction with secular knowledge, and any formal severance of religion from education is calculated to make a bad impression on the youthful mind."

We should rather say in the words of Pope Pius IX that the severance of religion from education is "most pernicious" for Catholic children and "a source of grievous harm to society." The Catholic writer owes it to the Church to be emphatic in his defence of Catholic education. It is certainly his duty in such matters to guard against any dangerous principle, the admission of which might lead to results directly the reverse of those intended and tear down where the writer's intention is to build up.

Boy Scouts

Discussing lately the training of children, we touched on the Boy Scouts, an organization growing and spreading so quickly, as to deserve a fuller consideration.

Founded in England by General Baden-Powell, famous for the defence of Mafeking during the South African War, it caught the public's fancy, and passed over almost immediately to this country and to Canada. It is frankly educational. It undertakes to make the boy, of whatever kind he be, physically, intellectually and morally better. At the most critical period of his life a boy joining it is turned over to the Chief Scout and his subordinates, and the atmosphere of romance surrounding it procures for them an influence other teachers may seek in vain. The Catholic parent who values his son's soul must ask: How far is it to be trusted?

From what we see in the hand-books of the organization we judge that its officers may be, and often are, men without a supernatural idea, and contented, nay, even proud to be so. The scout law, it is true, requires its subjects to reverence God. But when there is question of how God is to be revered, the scout is told that each one does this best in the religion of his family, Catholic, Protestant, or Hebrew. Should Moslems or Buddhists find their way into the Scouts' ranks, no doubt Mohammedanism and Buddhism would be added to the list of religions objectively equal, each subjectively preferable to the other, because it is that of one's family. The organization might have held a pure negative position. Instead of that the boy learns from his new teachers an error destructive of supernatural faith and explicitly condemned in the Syllabus of Pius IX; and he has not to wait long to hear the real scout religion, which is to replace what he learned at his mother's knee: to do good to others without boasting; for one honors God best when he helps others most. Either the God of Christian revelation is not the scout-god, or else the Scouts treat Him with contumely; and the Catholic boy who imbibes those ideas is virtually lost to his Church.

But not only are the Scouts' leaders without faith: they are too often saturated with notions destructive of all faith. If one may judge their camp-fire talks by topics suggested in their books, they will tell in them how man was first of all a brute beast, and developed gradually until the first gleam of reason appeared; how after a long period of solitary existence in which, lower than any savage, each saw in his fellows only enemies, men began to associate among themselves for mutual help. In a word, from the study of nature, which plays a great part in the plan of the Scouts, occasion is taken to preach to enthusiastic listeners the most advanced Evolutionism, in which mere natural forces usurp the place of the Triune God.

In the number referred to in the beginning of this article, we dwelt on the error of taking the child out of its natural social condition, and of making it before the time a man, with a man's rights and responsibilities. It is not necessary to repeat what we said then, and it is equally unnecessary to prove formally that the Scout organization is guilty of that error. This is a corollary of the self-evident proposition, that it puts them in a society that has no place for parents, in which they are practically their own masters. One may reply, that the scout law urges obedience to parents. True; but it also urges, as we have seen, the worship of God. The enlightened scout knows, however, that he can fulfil this worship by picking up a banana peel lest one should slip on it, or by helping an aged person across the street; and so he learns that scout law and scout officials come before parents and their commands; that those are always with him in a society which treats him as already emancipated, and that for their sake it is no fault to ignore parental claims resting upon divine law, natural and revealed. Given two authorities, one legitimate, the other self-constituted, sooner or later the clash must come; and that will prevail which has established its ascendancy over the subject's will. This danger found, more or less, in all boys' voluntary associations, is extreme in those to which, as they flatter vanity and self-love, boys are too ready to give themselves up entirely. It has been seen to work havoc among the members of Greek Letter societies in the schools: the Scouts can easily become as great a peril as these.

For the scout organization seems designed to have an absorbing interest for boys. It does not restrict itself to what the name implies, the strengthening of the body and the training to habits of observation. It takes possession of them, instituting all sorts of subdivisions to suit various tastes. There are seamen scouts, pioneering scouts, firemen scouts, surveying scouts, astronomer scouts, engineering scouts, chauffeur scouts, in all some sixty classes; and the wolf badge of merit is given those who pass the tests in twenty-one. For some the requirements are ridiculously small; for others, though ridiculous, they demand much in the way of absence from home. Thus the camping scouts must have camped out one hundred nights at different times, the ornithological scout must have observed one hundred and twenty-five different kinds of birds. It is hard to see what home life, or school life either, there can be for boys of twelve or fourteen, bitten with the desire of the badges of such classes: and what is to be said of him who seeks the supreme wolf badge?

A danger not to be overlooked lies in this, that the organization has its own law, its own oath, its own signs and passwords for the initiated, and, as we have seen, its own moral code and its own religion. It is, therefore, such as can be turned very easily into a nursery for the secret societies. We do not say that this was the object of its founders, but simply view the organization in itself. In every country it assumes naturally a special character. In England and America it is not military: in Russia and Germany it is just the reverse. It has been introduced into Belgium with the removal from the oath and from the statutes of the very insufficient mention of God found in those of England and America, so as to be an instrument in the masonic warfare against the Church. One, therefore, who remembers that though they pursue their end by different means, there is a perfect solidarity between English and Continental Masonry, is hardly to be blamed for suspecting the whole movement to be of Masonic origin.

The Boy Scouts have, therefore, grave faults to be removed and serious defects to be remedied before Catholic boys may be enrolled among them. What, it may be asked, is to be thought of organizing Catholic Boy Scouts? The question deserves consideration. We may be allowed, however, to call attention to the principle that possibly underlies it: We must provide our boys with the pleasures offered them by anti-Catholic organizations, otherwise we shall lose them. The principle is absolutely false. We do not, nevertheless, run to the opposite extreme of ignoring the propriety of procuring suitable enjoyment for our boys; but we do say that the mere fact that proselytizing organizations provide certain pleasant things for them, does not oblige us to provide the same. Catholics must learn in their youth that renunciation of the material for the spiritual, of the temporal for the eternal is the true law of Christ, and that grace in this life and glory in the next are to be found only through the royal way of the Cross. If we get our boys to practise this law in such matters as a Y. M. C. A. gymnasium and the Boy Scouts we shall be doing more for their final perseverance than if we avert temptation for the moment by furnishing them with similar gratifications. Do what we will, we shall never be able to provide them, either as boys or as men, with the equivalent of every bait held out by the world, the flesh and the devil.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Sixteenth Century Education in Mexico

II.—THE JESUITS.

"We cannot travel in the most distant countries, traverse unknown seas, visit the most remote lands, or penetrate the most frightful deserts without finding everywhere under our feet some memorial of the Jesuits."—Balmes.

The lack of material means and their ignorance of the native tongues were not the only obstacles which the missionaries had to overcome to carry on the work of education. There were many among the Spanish laymen, and not a few among secular priests, and even among the friars themselves, who were strongly opposed to teaching the Indians anything beyond that which was absolutely necessary for their salvation, and accused the friars engaged in the work of education of imparting to them such knowledge from which nothing but error, harmful both to the Faith and to society, could result. But the work of the friars could not be suppressed by such idle reasoning: the work begun must be carried on even on a larger scale; the labors of the Franciscans, Dominicans, and Augustinians must be broadened by the Jesuits; these must leave for a while the field in which they had so brilliantly and successfully fought against Luther, to come to the wilderness of America.

The Jesuits arrived in Mexico on September 28, 1572. The beginning of their work was very unassuming. They settled in some uncomfortable houses situated on the outskirts of the city, where the Indians of Tacuba built their first church. So poor was the mission that they had vestments for only one priest, and the Holy Sacrifice was celebrated with chalice and paten of tin. There they began their work of preaching and education. (Icazbalceta "Opúsculos Varios," Vol. 1, page 198.)

While the building of their college was in progress Father Sanchez, the Provincial, determined to establish a seminary, and to this effect he preached a sermon showing the Spaniards the necessity of an institution of this kind. The public answered generously to the just demands of Father Sanchez, and on January 1, 1573, the seminary of San Pedro y San Pablo was opened. At the beginning, the seminary was not under the charge of the Jesuits, its first rector being Father Gerónimo Lopez Ponce, a secular priest. Later there was some disagreement among the trustees of the institution, and the Jesuits were asked to take charge of it. Under their management the number of students was so largely increased that it was necessary to establish the little seminaries of San Miguel, San Bernardo, and San Gregorio, all of which were under the direct jurisdiction of the Jesuits, and later were incorporated into the great college of San Ildefonso, in existence at the time of the suppression of the Society. (Op. cit. pages 189-200.)

The preparatory department of the Colegio Máximo was solemnly inaugurated on October 18, 1574. Its first teachers were the Provincial and Father Pedro Mercado, the latter a Mexican by birth. The college department was opened on October 19th of the following year, the chair of philosophy being filled by Father Pedro Lopez de Parra. At this time the Most Rev. Archbishop Moya conferred a signal honor on the Society by appointing Father Sanchez to give a course of Moral Theology in the Archbishop's house, which was to be attended by all the clergy. (Icazbalceta, "Opúsculos Varios," Vol. 1, page 202.)

But if the opening of these new institutions was considered by all a great benefit to the community, many criticized the Jesuits because they did not devote themselves to the conversion of the natives rather than to teaching the Spaniards and criollos, who were supposed to have sufficient notions of Christianity. But the Provincial of the Jesuits had good reasons for adopting this mode of procedure. The Franciscans, Dominicans, and to a great extent the Augustinians were successfully engaged in the conversion of the natives, and the innumerable duties which their work imposed upon them prevented them from checking other evils which demanded immediate attention. In a former article reference was made to that new social element, the mestizos, who wandered through the land without home or shelter, plunged in the greatest ignominy. True it is that in 1553 Viceroy Mendoza established an institution wherein to harbor these unfortunate people; but we may easily suppose that one college was by no means sufficient to provide for all the evils accruing from such an element. It was, therefore, necessary to use more efficacious means to make good citizens of the growing populace, and to correct the vices of the Spanish soldiery, who, by their bad example, retarded the conversion of the natives. Hence the necessity of establishing seminaries for the young clergy.

Devoted to the building of their colleges, seminaries and churches, the Jesuits had not yet undertaken the study of the Indian languages, so indispensable for the work of conversion. But the Provincial did not forget that this work must also be attended to. Soon they began their evangelical labors, and no one is ignorant of the work of the Jesuit missions in the western provinces of Mexico. One of these provinces, the richest, the most beautiful, as the result of iniquitous war, forms now part of another country; but if that war could change the limits of Mexico, it cannot alter its history, and the labors of the Jesuits in California will always be considered as a natural sequence of the great educational movement inaugurated in Mexico by Fray Pedro de Gante.

Towards the end of the sixteenth century, the Jesuits had established colleges in the principal cities of New Spain. The following are the most important: After the City of Mexico, Pátzcuaro, in the province of Michoacan, was the first city to have a Jesuit college; the Fathers of the Society also took charge of the seminary of San Nicolas, founded in that locality by Bishop Quiroga. The City of Morelia, also in the province of Michoacan, was the next city to have a college of Jesuits; then followed the City of Oaxaca, capital of the province of the same name, and on May 9, 1578, the great college of El Espíritu Santo was established in the City of Puebla. (Icazbalceta, "Opúsculos Varios," Vol. I, pages 205-206.)

On the authority of the Rt. Rev. Carrillo y Ancona, the learned Bishop and historian of Yucatan, we know that all the colleges of the Jesuit Fathers that were at a distance of three leagues from the capital, wherein was the central University, had power to confer university degrees. Hence we can understand the great benefit which they afforded to those who, by reason of their poverty, could not go to the City of Mexico for the completion of their studies.

No doubt the Jesuits brought about a complete revolution in the educational movement of the time. It has been remarked that with the exception of the college of Tlalatelolco and the University, the curriculum of the large majority of the Franciscan schools was limited to elementary subjects. The Jesuits introduced and developed the study of the humanities. They quartered in the Colegio Máximo Antonio Ricardo, one of the first printers that came to Mexico, and who afterward was the first to introduce that art in Lima, Peru. While Ricardo was at the Colegio Máximo he printed the text-books of the Jesuits, and among the Latin authors we find Martial, the Eclogues and Bucolics of Virgil, select orations and epistles of Cicero, and fragments from Ovid's "Tristia." We also find an introduction to the Dialectics of Aristotle. (Icazbalceta, "Opúsculos Varios," Vol. I, pages 220-221.)

The Jesuits were also devoted to the composition of treatises of theology and philosophy. Father Antonio Rubio, a Spaniard who received his doctorate at the University of Mexico, wrought and taught in Mexico his "Curso de Filosofía"; and his "Lógica Mexicana," so called because written in Mexico, became the exclusive text-book of Logic of the University of Alcalá. (Icazbalceta, "Opúsculos Varios," Vol. I, pages 239-243.)

This brief sketch of the work of the Jesuits finishes our review of the most important facts of what was done in Mexico for the cause of education during the sixteenth century. Although these facts are supported by reliable documents, their veracity has been questioned by many. How is it possible, some argue, that if during the sixteenth century so much was done to educate the Indians and to raise them both physically and morally in the scale of civilization, they still remain in their primitive ignorance and abjectness? This apparent contradiction is well answered by Mr. Icazbalceta, who devoted his life to the study of the history of his country.

"If we examine," says he, "the development of the new institutions, we find that the two races (the Mexican Indians and the Spaniards) who lived in Mexico after the Conquest, soon began to intermingle. As always happens in the wars of conquest, when there exists a well marked difference between the education of the conquerors and of the conquered, the noble element of the Indian population who could appreciate the superiority of the Spaniards, sought their allegiance, adopted their language and customs, and went so far as to despise those of their own race who clung to the ancient traditions. The marriages of this portion of the Mexican Indians with the Spaniards produced a new race, that of the mestizos, who, being plunged in the greatest misery at first, became so powerful and proud as to be the most bitter oppressors of the Indians. Of the Indian population there remained only a sediment of the lowest and most ignorant kind, a parallel of which is to be found in the most highly civilized countries of to-day. The decadence of the religious orders was accompanied by the consequent decline of their colleges; if it is true that the secular priests who gradually substituted the religious kept many schools in their parishes, they could not be compared to those of the old teachers who differed from the iron race of the conquerors only in the habit they were. Thus the work of education, as also the whole scheme of Spanish civilization in America, was left unfinished."

Prof. Bourne has this remarkable paragraph on the subject: "If the rule of Spain could have lasted a century longer, being progressively liberalized, as it was during the reign of Charles III; if a succession of such viceroys as Revillagigedo in Mexico and DeCroix and De Taboada y Lemus in Peru could have borne sway in America until railroads had been built, intercolonial intercourse ramified and a distinctly Spanish-American spirit developed, a great Spanish-American State might possibly have been created, capable of self-defense against Europe and inviting cooperation rather than aggression from the neighbor on the north. (Quoted by Dr. Walsh in his article on Spanish-American Education.)

Others have tried to minimize the work of the religious by exaggerating the culture of the Aztecs; but whatever the culture that existed, it was confined to the nobility. There was no primary education given to the people, whom the missionaries found plunged in degradation and utter darkness. And when to the ignorance of the masses we add their belief in the most diabolical network of idolatry ever invented, then we begin to understand the energy and perseverance of those religious who laid the foundations of the great system of education which flourished in New Spain during the sixteenth century and which, no doubt, is the most brilliant chapter in the history of American civilization.

BENJAMIN MOLINA CIREROL.

True Principles of Homeric Criticism

The story of Phidias and his pupil, Alcamenes, has often been told. They competed for a prize in sculpture. The statue of Alcamenes was about to be chosen because of its exquisite finish, when Phidias objected to any decision until the statues should be put in the high position they were designed to occupy. At once, the opinions of the judges were reversed, for the apparently rough lines of Phidias' creation stood out in sublime majesty, while the polish of Alcamenes' was lost when both statues were raised aloft. The story illustrates a splendid rule of art which has often been forgotten in the study of Homer. The epics of Homer were not made for the test-tube and the microscope. They were not made even for readers; they were composed for listeners. Put them on their proper pedestals and the minutiae revealed by the grammarians' microscope will be lost in the grand sweep of the story. You would as soon halt Shakspeare's "Macbeth" because of the anachronisms, or condemn Leonardo da Vinci's "Last Supper" because of modern masonry in the walls or carpentry in the table, as apply the philological and archæological tests of the higher critics to Homer.

Apply the tests of art to Homer and judge him by those. Take the matter of the contradictions which critics have talked so much about. In many cases, especially where mythology was concerned, the material the poet had to handle bristled with inconsistencies and contradictions. Long ago Aristotle laid down the sensible rule for drama, and it is equally true for Epic Poetry, that the poet is not responsible for the improbabilities in his materials. The sculptor may have flaws in his block of marble; the painter may have defects in his lead or oil, or pigments; and the epic poet found contradictions in the fairy stories of mankind which he wove into the story he sang. That one consideration will sweep away instantly heaps of higher criticism.

Again, the artist is more taken up with the end than he is with the means. In the fervor of his composition he wreaks himself upon expression, he burns to embody his ideal and, engrossed in that, he is likely to be less observant of the material of his art. The achieving of the effect is more to him than mathematical accuracy in the use of the instruments by which he achieves the effect. He makes his hero win his battle; he may unhappily forget some of the tactics or even the geography of the battle-field. His object is not to teach the art of warfare or furnish the topography of the country, but to tell an interesting story in an interesting way. The "Iliad" has a wall that vexes many critics. It was built in the tenth year of the war, which was no time to build a wall, and was put up simply because Achilles left the field. Besides, according to these critics the wall appears and disappears strangely. So the conclusion is: Homer did not build the wall, but some other poet came along and projected his masonry into the epic. In answer it has been shown that the wall behaves very well, but whether it does or not, it matters little. The poet is not a surveyor or a street commissioner. He wished to make his story interesting, to make the character of Achilles prominent, to bring some agreeable variety into what might prove a monotonous catalogue of similar battles. Those are the reasons enough for a poet to build a Chinese wall or reduce it to dust when he does not want it, or conveniently overlook it in the heat of an imaginary charge.

Professor Rothe, who has been writing on Homeric topics for thirty years in German periodicals, has published recently a book in which he defends the unity of the "Iliad" by the simple principle of judging it as a poem. The reviewer of Professor Rothe's work in The Classical Weekly (Feb. 8, 1911) praises the work, and for the reasons he adduces the work undoubtedly deserves high praise. It is, however, a mistake to consider these arguments of Rothe in any way new. The reviewer had found certain objections of the Homeric Dissectionists cogent and welcomes Rothe's solution. The solution is practically identical with what Mure urged fifty years ago, and it briefly amounts to the truism: a story teller is more concerned to please his hearers than to guard against inconsistencies which they would never detect as listeners, and which even close readers did not detect for about thirty centuries. A work of art is not to be judged as a mass of machinery is, nor is a poem to be scrutinized with dictionary and grammar as you would a school boy's exercise. This is the statue of Phidias over again. A stage scene will differ somewhat from a miniature, and an epic takes liberties with walls and rivers and even mountains and oceans, liberties which would not be tolerated in a quatrain. These principles are as obvious as daylight, but apostles of the obvious are needed in abundance in the harvest fields of higher criticism.

What is needed for Homer is a study of his art in a broad but not a shallow way, comprehensive and fundamental like Aristotle's brief discussion. For the wonderfully analytical mind of Aristotle Homer's "Iliad" and "Odyssey" were models of unity, because he looked upon them as works of art, not scrap-heaps of philology and archæology. Put the poems of Homer on the pedestals for which he made them, for listeners who had to be entertained and clamored for variety. "It is a trait of Homer," says the reviewer quoting Rothe's principles, "constantly to shift the scene. The motive may be weak, but the eye of the poet was not on the motive, but on the scene; so he not only shifts the scene but varies the description of the events." The poet's eye, it might be added, is also like the orator's, fixed steadily on his audience, and the audience must be relieved even if masonry or geography suffer.

The paramount principles of variety and growth of interest which govern every good story hold sway in Homer. Take a staple action of the Iliad, the battles. Homer's audience wanted fighting, yet jaded listeners and the artistic poet knew there must be in the fighting variety and growth of interest. Even in the matter of killing men, which seems to us unimportant but which would not be to an audience of fighters, Homer has shown a wonderful variety. A German professor has diagnosed the Homeric surgery with all the thoroughness of his class. The conclusions may be found in Seymour's "Life in the Homeric Age." The number and variety of the wounds, the weapons used, the percentages of fatalities, are all given in full detail. "Hardly could the poet have covered more completely the possibilities of wounds for the human body if he had proceeded systematically and mechanically." Some will have it that Homer was a surgeon and an army doctor. Certainly the history of anatomy has its first chapter in the "Iliad."

But to pass over the variety displayed in the wounds and other smaller points, consider the actual fighting. For the manœuvres we may refer to two interesting chapters in Lang's "World of Homer," where the variety and consistency of Homeric warfare are well described and defended against the Dissectionists. The point, however, we are working towards is the variety shown in even the external circumstances of the warfare.

A closer study than we can afford to give would reveal more variety, but we may mention the plain, the wall, the river, the night as in the tenth book, the mist. These are the various circumstances which the poet introduces into his battles, relieving the monotony and sustaining the interest. There is no falling off. The different heroes, too, succeed one another; the victory alternates from one side to the other; the battle on earth has its echo among the gods. The interest rises. Patroclus enters the fight, and then his fallen body becomes the center of the struggle, as the wall and the ships had been before. Something, too, is left for Achilles. Ferocious as may have been the fighting before, it becomes a veritable shambles when Achilles enters the fray. Never were such frightful wounds, never such rivers of blood as may be witnessed in Book XX "when the black earth ran blood," "when beneath the great-hearted Achilles his whole-hooved horses trampled corpses and shields together; and with blood all the axle-tree below was sprinkled and the rims that ran around the car, for blood-drops from the horses' hooves splashed them and blood-drops from the tires of the wheels. But the son of Peleus pressed on to win his glory, flecking with gore his irresistible hands."

Then follows the battle in the river, and finally the battle of the gods themselves, and after the necessary relief and lull and reawakening of interest comes the last battle of all and the climax of the poem in the conflict of Achilles and Hector.

A study of the art of Homer along its great lines will give us the true principles upon which to judge him. Such a study will put him in the right perspective. The statue of Phidias will mount on high where its artist wished to have it enshrined. The "Iliad" and "Odyssey" were meant to cross the bronze threshold of some great palace, "where there was a gleam as it were of sun or moon through the high-roofed hall of a great-hearted King. Brazen were the walls which ran this way and that from the threshold to the inmost chamber, and round them was a freize of blue and within were seats arrayed against the wall this way and that." Then "after the men had put from them the desire of meat and drink," they called upon the minstrel. "For minstrels from all men on earth get their meed of honor and worship; inasmuch as the muse teacheth them the paths of song and loveth the tribe of minstrels." "And the minstrel being stirred by the god began and showed forth his minstrelsy and took up the tale where it tells how the Argives sailed away." That was the setting of the Homeric Epic, and thus speaks one whose "heart had melted at the song and whose tears wet his cheeks beneath his eyelids." "Verily it is a good thing to list to a minstrel, like to the gods in voice. Nay, as for me, I say there is no more gracious or perfect delight than when a whole people makes merry, and the men sit orderly at feasts in the halls and listen to the singer and the tables by them are laden with bread and flesh, and a wine-bearer drawing the wine serves it round and pours it into cups. This fashion seems to me the fairest thing in the world."

There is the place that Homer chose for his matchless poems, and there they should be judged. The hearts that melt with song are not searching for digammas or Aeolic forms. They want the story, the long voyages and the strange adventures, the swaying lines of battle and the prowess of heroes. They look for and recognize the different characters which must be as varied and as clearly marked as in the life around them. They must not be surfeited with too much of anything. Voyages and battles must vary and grow in intensity and be crossed with pictures of nature, brief but thrilling and immensely relieving,—the lion, the wheat field, the tossing ocean and the steady downfall of an unending snow storm. With these and the plot entangling and disentangling the listeners to Homeric song and story will not look for that polished smoothness and frigid exactness, the absence of which vexes the minds of modern Germany. Phidias' statue occupies its proper pedestal, and the true judges award to Phidias his well-deserved prize.

FRANCIS P. DONNELLY, S.J.

CENTRAL VEREIN CONVENTION

The fifty-sixth General Convention of the Central Verein opened at Chicago, Sunday, September 10. After a brief meeting of the five hundred and seventy delegates from every part of the United States, an imposing procession formed to escort the Papal Delegate, Archbishop Falconio and Archbishop Quigley of Chicago, to the splendidly decorated church of St. Michael. At the pontifical high Mass which followed Bishop Schrembs, of Toledo, spoke in impressive words of the first duty of Catholic men, which was to serve neither the world nor Mammon, but Christ the Lord. The struggle with the new paganism, with Freemasonry and Socialism, he said, is but the old battle of Lucifer with St. Michael and his angel-knights fought over again upon earth.

In the afternoon a mass meeting was held at Orchestra Hall, where a letter was read from Governor Charles S. Deneen, who expressed his regret at not being able to attend the convention. Mr. Nicholas Gonner, editor of the Catholic Tribune, eloquently set forth the aims of the Central Verein. He dwelt on the fact that the spirit of Christianity is either ignored or opposed in modern life, and that only an active propaganda for the Catholic school, the Catholic press and Catholic social reform can instil into our nation those Christian principles which are to be its only salvation. Dr. Charles F. Bruehl, of St. Francis Seminary, then dwelt upon the possibility of Socialist victories unless timely efforts are made by us to stem the tides of irreligion, immorality and class hatred. "Only the Catholic Church can save America!"

Archbishop Quigley then declared that organization is the hope of the Catholic Church, and societies such as the Central Verein are the pledge that she shall not stand without defenders in the hour of her need. Want of organization made it possible to fether and persecute the Church in France and Portugal. Although there were thousands of loyal Catholics ready to lay down their very lives for the faith, yet they stood without leadership and were defeated. "I want to say," he continued, "that when the time comes in this country—as it surely will come—and the same forces attack the Church here, they will not find us unprepared or unorganized and they shall not prevail."

He declared that for many years he had followed with great interest the work of the Central Verein. As a counterpart of the German Volksverein he considered it a model for all Catholic societies. It should be imitated, because it is founded upon the ideals of the first fearless champion of Christian social reform, Bishop Emmanuel von Ketteler.

The Papal Delegate then addressed the meeting, emphasizing the high praise showered upon the society by Archbishop Quigley. He concluded with reading a cablegram received from the Holy Father, in which he sends his apostolic blessing in touching words of approval and encouragement. At this the entire multitude sank down upon their knees and in silence, with bowed heads, received the solemn papal benediction.

On Monday, Bishop Dunn of Peoria celebrated a Pontifical Requiem for the deceased members of the Central Verein, after which the delegates assembled for their work, Archbishop Quigley and Monsignor Falconio being present again. The Apostolic Delegate addressing the delegates told them of the confidence the Holy Father and the hierarchy place in them and added: "I do not believe that any other body enjoys so completely the sympathy of all the archbishops and bishops of the United States as the Central Verein."

The work of the Catholic Colonization Society was urgently put before the meeting by Very Rev. Edward Vattman, who insisted upon the great need of directing Catholic settlers to districts where their faith will not be endangered. Father Ledvina spoke of the needs of Church Extension. Correspondences from Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop Riordan, Bishop Janssen and from other archbishops, bishops and distinguished laymen were read. Greetings and best wishes had likewise been received from Mr. J. Giesberts, of the German Reichstag. Recommendations were made for Laymen's Retreats to be instituted in all parishes, for thorough instruction in social reform problems, for a national press committee and for the enactment of workingmen's protective laws.

The deliberations continued for three days, closing with a business meeting on Wednesday evening. Another mass meeting took place on Tuesday night, when Mr. F. P. Kenkel, the able editor of the German Amerika, spoke on the subject, "The Central-Stelle," and John W. Freund, of Springfield, took for his theme "The Civil Duties of American Catholics."

The general resolutions were naturally largely the same as those passed during preceding conventions, since the social evils and economic conditions have not undergone any substantial changes. Two very important steps, however, were taken which require special consideration here. The first of these was the organization of a German Catholic Women's Federation on the plan of the Central Verein.

This question was discussed in the meeting held on Monday morning by the delegates. At the same time, in another hall, was taking place the first women's meeting held in connection with these conventions. A committee from the men was sent over to the neighboring assembly to propose the subject of the National Women's Association. This was at once taken up with the greatest enthusiasm, and an organization was immediately effected of which Mrs. Rohrbacher, of Chicago, was elected president, and Mrs. Henry Schomer, secretary. The various isolated women's societies are, according to the outlined plan, to be united into local unions. These in turn are to be gathered into state federations, which again are to be centralized in one universal Catholic women's organization for the entire country.

Another important proposition was the resolution submitted by the Committee for Social Propaganda, recommending the founding of a house of studies for Christian social education. The resolution was unanimously passed. The object of the future institution is to train popular speakers and leaders in the social field, while priests and professional men are here to obtain a practical post-graduate course, as it may be called, in social science and economics. The intention is to connect the institution with some one of the Catholic universities of our country. In the meanwhile, the project is to be placed before the German Catholics to obtain their financial support. The committee stated that they had already a fund of $5,544 at their disposal, while the Staatsverband of Nebraska at once offered a contribution of $1,000 for the purpose.

Another proposition, made by Monsignor Wurst, of Wabasha, Minn., will certainly set in motion a mighty wave of enthusiasm to sweep over all the country. Its object is to institute for the coming January a general Catholic festival, in commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Windhorst.

In the election of officers, which took place Wednesday morning, Joseph Frey, of New York, was elected president, in place of John B. Oelkers, of New Jersey, who had guided the destinies of the Central Verein for nine years with prudence, dignity and efficiency, and under whom it had grown into a mighty organization, numbering at present over one hundred and ten thousand members. May it long continue and become in our own country a worthy rival of the great Volksverein of Germany.

Japan's First Factory Law

Up to the present Japan has been essentially a farming country. During the long centuries that it has lived apart from the rest of the world the question of questions for the Government was to make the soil produce enough to feed the population. Agriculture was encouraged, and the peasant class was held in esteem. They came in the second rank, that is immediately after the samurai, or nobles and before the merchants and artisans. Even to-day sixty per cent. of the population are engaged in cultivating the fields.

But with the new conditions which the commercial competition of foreign countries produced, agriculture alone was unable to support and enrich the ever-growing population of Japan, and industrial enterprises became a matter of necessity. But industry, as we understand the word, was unknown in Japan until her ports were thrown open to the world. It was then that the government inaugurated the new movement and labored for the development of industrial enterprises so energetically, that just as elsewhere, the farms are being deserted.

Forty years ago the rural population represented 86 per cent. of the whole, and the cities only 14 per cent., whereas in 1900 the cities had already run up to 75 per cent. Indeed, the migration to the towns is such that in the space of twenty years, that is from 1890 to 1910, the urban population has doubled. Nevertheless, the excessive population of Japan has thus far prevented any disastrous consequences to the agriculture of the country, for plenty of workmen still remain on the land and the new methods of cultivation obviate the necessity of as great number of toilers as in former times.

On the other hand, as factory work is so recent, there is a great lack of skilled labor. Even those who are employed in the Government arsenals and shipyards cannot compare with their rivals in Europe or America. One Occidental is worth two or three Japanese.

Another feature of factory work in Japan is the preponderance of women operatives. For this there are two reasons: the deftness of Japanese women and the meagre salaries with which they are satisfied. As the principal manufactures of the country are silk, cotton, tea and straw-braids, women are naturally in demand, but as the traditions of Japan are domestic the work is mostly done at home. Only the cotton-spinning mills have as yet gathered a large number of female operatives around the looms. In the Government tobacco factories, however, 20,000 women are employed.

Nevertheless the number of factory hands is on the increase. Indeed, it has doubled within ten years, as the following figures from the census of 1909 will show: Private manufactories which use motors run up to 9,153, and there is twice that number without motors. Together they employ 300,000 men and 500,000 women. On the other hand, the Government, with its monopolies, arsenals, etc., gives work to 170,000 persons, 30,000 of whom are women. Thus the total of all employees in both kinds of factories does not yet exceed one million. Of course, I do not count the 235,000 miners, who extract 16,000,000 tons of coal a year.

Industrial matters are not all rose color in Japan, and naturally so, for experience comes only with time. Thus in organizing a business the Japanese are enterprising, but soon become involved. They are born speculators. They overlap and hamper each other, but though there are many financial wrecks along the road of business, others crowd in to take their places, and collapsed concerns are resuscitated. Few think of building on a solid basis, or of working for the future. They are looking only for quick and large returns. Thus, unlike enterprises in western countries, the business combinations of young Japan begin by paying large dividends, which soon decline and then are withheld completely. Add to this, that in businesses like that of transportation, lighting and hydraulic production of electricity, the Government is continually interfering, and even threatens to monopolize everything, so that the most solidly established enterprises are demoralized, the shareholders suffer heavily and confidence is made impossible.

The desire for quick returns is the greatest enemy of industrial progress in Japan, for the reason that two conditions of ultimate success are neglected, namely, care of the machinery and care of the workingmen.

Order and cleanliness are rare in Japanese establishments run in European fashion. Whether it is because the Japanese does not know how, or does not wish to give himself the trouble of caring for either of these things, simply because they are foreign, it is impossible to say. The serious consequences of neglect in these particulars is evident to anyone, but the Japanese do not seem to grasp the fact that the most elementary reasons of economy require a scrupulous care of the machines, as well as a readiness to replace what is old and imperfect by what is newest and best. They have their eyes fixed on the dividends and give no thought to the reserve fund that is needed for running expenses and repairs.

Still more than this negligence, the abuse which they give their machinery would shock a European or an American mechanic. The old saying that "philanthropy has nothing to do with business" is followed to the letter in Japan. But apart from humanity and philanthropy, the destruction of so many human lives, though human life is cheap in Japan, the loss of life from a business point of view is ruinous and ought to open their eyes. The condition in which these poor employees live and labor may be the subject of a future communication.

LISBON, Aug. 27, 1911.

The triumph of President Arriaga with one hundred and twenty-one votes in the Constituent Assembly against only eighty-six for his closest competitor, Bernardino Machado, was a triumph of the more moderate elements of the party over the extremists. It was, therefore, a real defeat for Affonso Costa, author or perpetrator of the Law of Separation, for he was heart and soul for the election of Machado. While the election was in progress the troops were kept under arms in their barracks and the guards of the palace were reinforced.

After repeating the affirmation prescribed by the Constitution, Arriaga delivered a speech, in which he dwelt upon the necessity of union among all Republicans without dangerous personal factions. Then there were salvos of artillery from both land and sea forces, and the troops drawn up before the palace presented arms.

The President will receive a salary of $24,000 a year, with an allowance of $6,000 in addition for expenses. He will not be permitted to reside in any of the palaces formerly belonging to the exiled royal family and now the property of the State. The senators and representatives will each receive a monthly sum of $106, but for each unwarranted absence from the sessions of Parliament a deduction of $5.20 will be made. Deputy Alexandre Braga, supported by Affonso Costa, had advocated that the State should provide residences, not only for the President, but also for the cabinet and other public functionaries, but the Assembly would not entertain the proposal.

Catholic Churches in Sweden

Unfortunately the magnificent edifices built by our ancestors in the Middle Ages, the splendid cathedrals of Upsala, and Lund, and Linköping, and Skara, or the famous monastic church of the North which St. Bridget illustrated are no longer Catholic, nor are those others, which though not so resplendent are yet remarkable for their beauty, and though the work of Catholic hands, have for centuries excluded Catholic worship, and will never become Catholic again unless Sweden returns to the Faith of the long ago. Our present purpose it to give some idea of the few churches which the scattered Catholics of Sweden now have at their disposal.

The oldest of them is the church of St. Eugenia, at Stockholm. It is not large, but it bears the impress of a certain lofty mysticism with its marble statue of the Blessed Virgin, the work of Nicholas Bystrom, a Swedish sculptor of no little merit, and its retable, which is a copy of Rafael's Transfiguration, by Mlle. Sophie de Adlersparre, in which the figures are life size. Above the altar of the Sacred Heart is a Death of St. Joseph, and in front is the baptistry in polished porphyry, which is the royal gift of Queen Desirée, the consort of Charles-John XIV, who was the founder of the present reigning dynasty of the Bernadottes. Stations of the cross with figures excellently cut and statues of the apostles in niches higher upon the walls complete the adornment of this modest sanctuary. The liturgical music and the exactness and precision of the ecclesiastical ceremonies at St. Eugenia's are such that even the Protestants of the town and the tourists who happen to be in the neighborhood, make it a point to be present at the great solemnities.

It was built in 1837, and it is particularly dear to Catholic Swedes because it was the first Catholic church erected since the Reformation. Indeed it was only in the private chapels of the various legations that Mass could be celebrated. Conversions were rare, for to become a Catholic meant exile and confiscation. It was only in 1860 that religious toleration was proclaimed in Sweden, and even then it was of the most restricted character.

In 1892 the Catholics of Stockholm were made happy by another church dedicated to Eric, the royal martyr, who suffered death in 1160. It is situated in the southern part of the city, near Gotgatan Street, with its façade turned towards a great public square. It is approached by a magnificent flight of granite stairs, and on entering, one finds himself in a basilica whose walls and roof are richly decorated in color, softened by the various hues of its richly stained glass windows. It is the only Catholic church in Sweden that has a chime of bells.

It is at St. Eric's that the Vicar Apostolic Mgr. Bitter resides. He is a prelate who has endeared himself to everyone. He can be scarcely said, however, to reside in Stockholm, for he is always journeying from one end to the other of Sweden in the interest of his flock, and that means traveling incessantly over a territory of 447,864 square kilometres. Except a mortuary chapel at the cemetery, the two churches we have mentioned are all that the Catholics of Stockholm can boast of.

In the provinces there are churches at Malmö, Gothenburg, Norrköping and Gefte. Malmö, in the south, is the principal centre of activity among the Polish harvesters, who arrive in Sweden by thousands to work in the fields when the crops are gathered. Every Sunday they flock to the little church of Malmö, in many cases giving up a good part of their wages to buy a railway ticket, and often not breaking their fast till mid-day so as to receive Holy Communion. Their great friend is the Count Bernard de Stolberg, descendant of the famous writer Count Frederick de Stolberg, the celebrated diplomat, whose conversion made such a stir in the Protestant world. The present count is a priest. His usual abiding place is at Norrköping, but he makes long apostolic journeys through the country in the interests of both Swedes and Poles, or indeed wherever the preaching of the Faith may call.

BARON G. ARMFELT.

The Apostolic Delegate announces that a new diocese has been erected in western Iowa, with Des Moines as its Episcopal See. It is taken from the Diocese of Davenport, and makes the seventh diocese within the Province of Dubuque, and the fourth in the State of Iowa.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

"Mona Lisa"

A cartoonist in a recent issue of a French paper struck off a series of pictures which represent perfectly the present mental condition of France. A comfortable old couple are seated at the breakfast table reading the morning news. The Morocco trouble, with its thunderous rumble of German domination underneath leaves them undisturbed, and they sip their café au lait with serene delight. The bread riots that forebode revolution all over France cause them no anxiety, for their own larders are full. But lo! the awful intelligence looms up before their eyes in heavy crape-like type: "'Mona Lisa' is stolen." The old lady collapses like a broken dam in a deluge of tears, and the lord of the manor roars around the apartment swearing and tearing out the scant hairs that time has left on his perspiring brow. It is too much to bear. The whole nation is in a tumult, shouting: "Great is 'Mona Lisa' of the Parisians!" and police-dogs are watching the Louvre.

Meantime some of the papers are denouncing the Government. It is an infamy; it is a political trick to distract public attention from what is going on in Berlin; it is a herring on the trail to make the people lose sight or scent of the diplomacy that may be hanging over Morocco to Germany, and so on to the end of the gamut.

Such explanations seem to an outsider to be what the French call chercher midi à quatorze heures, looking for mid-day at two o'clock in the afternoon. The disaster is probably due to that remunerative love of art which the Government inculcated in its employees when a few years ago it appropriated the churches and decided that their valuable pictures would be safer in the Louvre than in the sanctuaries, where they had been hanging for centuries. It must be gratifying to the teachers that one newspaper scribe has been able already to count 323 art treasures that have disappeared of late from the Louvre alone. How many others were lost on their way from the churches no one ever can tell. Perhaps "Mona Lisa's" smile was painted in view of this event. She is sneering at the simplicity of the French, who thought the loot was prompted only by hatred of religion. Of course, the Gioconda herself was never hung in a church; and fortunately so, otherwise some devout Catholic might be accused of eloping with her. France is like a child crying for her doll while the house is on fire, and perhaps that, too, amuses the cynical lady.

More Light on the Pauline Privilege

As the world has been forced to learn something lately about Catholic marriage legislation, the story of another Parisian case which was decided in Rome on June 13, 1911, but only just published, may be useful for further information on that ever interesting topic.

On November 8, 1904, Jean du Breuil de St. Germain, a Frenchman and a Catholic, was married in Paris to Mary Denison, an American, who was a Protestant Episcopalian, with due observance of the Tridentine form and a dispensation from the impediment of mixed religion. Difficulties soon arose between the married pair, and the lady obtained a civil divorce. Du Breuil wanted to marry again, and urged by his mother attempted to prove that his marriage with Miss Denison was null in the eyes of the Church, for the reason that she had never been baptized.

The case was referred from Paris to Rome. Miss Denison not only had no certificate to prove her baptism in the Episcopalian Church, but did not even know where she was baptized. However, because she had been previously married to a Protestant by an Episcopalian minister, the Roman court "presumed that she had been baptised as it was certainly presumed by the minister." Secondly, it ruled that "because she did not know where she was baptised, she evidently supposed the fact of her baptism." Thirdly, although it was asserted by the lady's sister that Miss Denison had never been confirmed, that very insistence on confirmation implied that she had been baptised; otherwise the defect of baptism, and not the minor one of confirmation would have been adduced. The neglect of confirmation was shown to have arisen from the fact that at the time confirmation should have been conferred she was living at a boarding school where no attention was paid to religion. Finally it was declared by the Rev. Henry Jones, a Protestant minister of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., that on the parish register of his church there was the following entry: "Mary Huling Denison, daughter of Charles and Helen Denison, born on May 20, 1861, was baptised on October 6, 1861." To this, however, the appellant objected that the baptismal record in question referred to an elder sister, for the Miss Denison whom he had married was born on May 20, 1867, and at the time of the marriage she had given 1867 as the date of her birth. Therefore, he declared that the baptism of 1861 could not be that of the defendant.

When asked how it happened that the child who was born in 1861 should have the same name and the same birth-day as the child who was born in 1867, and that the days of their baptism should also coincide, the appellant attempted to show that such a coincidence was not impossible, but the contention apparently made no impression on the court, which held that as du Breuil was twelve years younger than Miss Denison, she probably concealed her age; the agitation she showed, when the baptismal certificate was asked for, being a presumption that such was the case. This position was strengthened by the fact that at the previous marriage of Miss Denison at Ryde, in the Isle of Wight, to a Richard Winslow, she had told the minister that she was born in 1861. "The disparity of age," said the Court, "might be supposed to offer a temptation to reduce it, and her own declaration to du Breuil that she was born in 1867 is the only real evidence adduced as to the fact."

In summing up, the Auditors declared that "from the documents and facts adduced by the appellant it was not possible to argue the defect of baptism in his wife. They rather proved it contrary." "All this having been considered and duly weighed," continue the judges, "to the proposed question we say, decree and definitively pronounce sentence in the negative viz: we declare that the nullity of the marriage is not shown, and that therefore the sentence of the Curia of Paris is confirmed, and we order, moreover, that the appellant Jean du Breuil de St. Germain be bound to pay all the costs of the litigation."

Thus we find a Protestant sustained against a Catholic by the Court of Rome, which, moreover, accepts a Protestant baptism as valid and presumes that it has been properly and really administered, although no direct positive evidence had been presented on either point. The mere probability that such is the case is regarded as sufficient for the Court to declare definitively that the very mature, democratic American and once widowed Protestant woman from Wilkesbarre or Wilkes-Barre, Pa., is still the wife of the young and foolish scion of the noble house of du Breuil de St. Germain.

Socialism and Economics

A study of Socialistic propaganda reveals the fact that the leaders of the movement attack not only social conditions in which abuses manifestly exist, but most unwisely principles of religion as well. In the counter attack made by those who see the evils of the new movement, much stress is laid on this anti-religious aspect, and the matter is suffered to rest there. This, however, is not enough. Economic questions are also deeply involved, and there will be no adequate solution of the problems which form the staple of Socialistic denunciation until these questions are mastered and a rational solution for the difficulties applied. As a step to the knowledge of the theories of Classical English economists and the strength or weakness of their theories, we commend a paper read at the annual Conference of the Catholic Young Men's Society of Great Britain, held at Southampton, England, June 3-5, 1911. We do not hesitate to recommend this essay as one of the ablest reviews of the subject we have in English. The editor of the Catholic Mind has wisely selected it for the latest issue of that publication, which is issued, as many know, by the America Press.

French Patriotism

In the ill-natured days of a few years ago Catholics used to be charged with being essentially unpatriotic because they owed allegiance to the Pope. It was like saying that a man could not be an American because he was warmed by the same sun that illumined the shores of England or France. The influence of the Church is divine and is not restricted by lakes or rivers, or oceans. Far from killing patriotism, the Church keeps it alive, and inflames it with an inextinguishable fire. In fact, Catholics submit in silence to legislative enactments which the most insignificant sect would rise up against in mad rebellion. Nearly all of them when oppressed would be quite willing to follow a Cromwell, Catholics are the very opposite, and an instance of it is at hand at the present time. In the possibility of the French Congo passing into German hands, the Catholic press of France utters a fierce protest: "What! Surrender our glorious missionaries to a Protestant power! Back down at the arrogant and brutal demand of a conqueror! Abandon these devoted apostles, who in the jungles of Africa, teach the law of God, and love for France!"

As the present French policy at home with regard to the Church is so cruel the protest seems almost ridiculous. But nevertheless there are these French missionaries, in whose name this protest is said to be uttered, flinging all policy and prudence to the wind, and denouncing the Kaiser, whose subjects they may soon become. Fortunately the kindly war-lord will treat them better than their own countrymen.

British Colonial Navies

For some two years colonial navies have been talked about in Canada, Australia and England. The questions: Who shall exercise authority over them? What flag shall they fly? What is to be the sphere of action of each? have been discussed in legislatures and in the Imperial Conference. In Canada the navy is playing an important part in the election campaign now going on. Meanwhile, the navies are practically non-existent, and it seems probable that they will not exist for many a long day.

The Canadian Government laid the foundation of its navy by buying from England two cruisers for training ships, the Niobe for the Atlantic Coast and the Rainbow for the Pacific, and by talking of building a squadron. The Niobe is in Halifax, after having been got off the rocks in a sinking condition. The Rainbow is virtually laid up in Esquimalt. She left England manned chiefly by naval reserve men, who were to teach the Canadian recruits their duty. But of these only thirty appeared; and their teachers, finding that as regards food, clothing and pay their condition was very inferior to that of the deckhands of the fishery patrol steamers, are leaving one after another for employment ashore. The commander has returned to England in disgust; and, were it not for a handful of enlisted men of the royal navy, the Rainbow could not leave her moorings. As for the squadron, it is still the subject of much lively conversation.

The Australian Commonwealth ordered a great armored cruiser, some smaller ships and torpedo boats and prepared an ambitious scheme of shipbuilding. Now there is difficulty about the manning of the cruiser and other vessels, either completed or approaching completion. The Commonwealth Government finds that it can furnish no more than 800 men, and therefore has applied to the British Admiralty for 1,683 officers and men. As the Admiralty has all it can do to keep the home fleet manned, it probably will not furnish crews for a navy that is to attempt the feat of serving two masters. And so the Colonial Navy question seems about to solve itself.

Catholic Press Extension

The attention of Catholics in the United States has been focused on the Convention of American Federated Catholic Societies, which recently held its sessions in Columbus, Ohio. In the glare of its public and private sessions the importance of the first annual convention of the editors and managers of the Catholic publications of the United States and the Dominion of Canada is apt to be overlooked. Yet the success of whatever work was inaugurated or approved by the Federation will, in many particulars, largely depend on the support given to it by the Catholic Press. This was fully recognized at the Catholic Congress of Newcastle, England, where discussions on the importance and the ways and means of strengthening and circulating Catholic literature and Catholic newspapers formed an integral and important part of the practical work of the general committees. Owing to lack of organization among themselves the editors and managers of the Catholic Press in this country had to be content this year with a convention of their own, the value of which was fully recognized by its being so closely connected with the larger convention. Now that the Catholic Press Association has taken shape and promises to be permanent, it is to be hoped that in the near future the work of the Press will be even more closely united with the Federation, and that its deliberations will be embodied with those of the Federated Societies.

Perhaps it has escaped notice that the several Catholic Truth Societies were not represented at the Columbus gathering. The opportunity, it seems to us, should not have been overlooked. In Brooklyn, Chicago, New Orleans, Washington, St. Paul, San Francisco and elsewhere Catholic Truth Societies have been established, and despite division of forces have been doing apostolic work in defending and propagating the Faith. It would mark a great step forward, we believe, if these societies could federate with the Catholic Press Association as at present organized. The mission of the press is to be exercised, not only among Catholics at home, but in the fields of Catholic enterprise and endeavor abroad.

A glance at the work done and projected by Protestant Tract Societies will disclose the magnitude of the propaganda carried on with a zeal worthy of a better cause. The vast sums spent by Protestant missionary societies to recoup the losses of the various denominations in America by increased efforts in their foreign missions should prove an incentive for Catholics who glory in the possession of the truth to counteract the evil as they see it existing in Protestant exploitation of a diluted Christianity, and come to the assistance of Catholic Truth Societies and enable them to contend on an equal footing with an unfriendly and aggressive propaganda.

The American Tract Society, recently completing its eighty-sixth year, reports a great need of religious literature, both at home in English, Italian and Polish, and on the foreign missions in almost all languages. Millions of copies of tracts and periodicals were issued by it last year, the grand total since its organization reaching as many as 776,000,000 copies. Workers in China declare that an exceptional opportunity is now presented to change and modernize China by the circulation of literature. Thirty tract societies have been set up in the Far East, and presses to print Christian literature are run night and day. Some time since the society asserted that not less than $1,000,000 was needed to supply even a part of the demand. In its latest report, issued two weeks ago, it declares another million ought to be used in America, in part among immigrants, or $2,000,000 in all. How true it is that the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light. Among Catholics here there is evidence of increased interest in the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. Last year the Archdiocese of New York won the enviable distinction of leading all the dioceses of the world in contributing the largest amount to the cause, namely, over $100,000. It should not be a difficult task to enlist the interest and cooperation of Catholics in the United States in the propagation of the Faith through the Catholic Press and the Catholic Truth Societies. The weekly publication of news from the mission fields, which finds place in many Catholic papers, is already bearing good fruit.

LITERATURE

Thoughts of a Catholic Anatomist. By THOMAS DWIGHT, M.D., LL.D. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Net $1.00.

This little book is an exceedingly valuable contribution to the literature of Philosophy. The author, a man distinguished alike for scholarly attainments and nobility of life, discusses in the frankest manner the chief philosophical problems that have been agitating the minds of men for years past. And though modesty and simplicity are characteristics of the whole work, yet there can be no mistake about Dr. Dwight's attitude towards the subject under discussion. He scorns the idea that there is a warfare between science and religion and, after professing his faith in God and the Catholic Church, he proceeds to discuss, in successive chapters, the thought of the day, theories of evolution, God, religion, design and plan, living and non-living man, the descent of man, variations, anomalies and adaptations. His treatment of these different questions leaves little or nothing to be desired. For unlike so many who have written on the same topics, Professor Dwight is able to view difficulties from many standpoints. He is not a mere anatomist, nor a mere embryologist, nor yet a mere biologist, nor a mere scholastic philosopher. He possesses the knowledge proper to all of these, and so is able to weave anatomy, embryology, biology, philosophy, and now and then theology too, into his arguments with a cleverness that cannot but win the respect of all thoughtful men.

His treatment of evolution is particularly timely and consoling. True, from the sheer necessity of the case, his work here is for the most part destructive rather than constructive; yet it is thoroughly satisfactory. He examines system after system and rejects all as unworthy of true science save that of De Vries, to which he is a bit partial. He does not hesitate to lay bare the inconsistencies, contradictions, quackery and chicanery which have brought science into disrepute in so many quarters. For newspaper and magazine science, which has done so much to ruin the faith and morals of the man in the street, he has just and much-needed words of scorn.

Dr. Dwight is at his best in the chapters on man, the descent of man and design and plan. He postulates the creation of the soul: in fact any other explanation of its origin is to him unthinkable. And though he admits that many Catholics are still inclined to view "the descent of man's body" from simpler forms as an open question, yet he himself pronounces all the missing links unsatisfactory, and holds that "there is no even probable line of ascent up to the body of man." And in speaking of Van der Broeks' admirable demonstration of the fact that (in spite of many noisy statements to the contrary) the human embryonic skull and pelvis do not show anthropoid characteristics, he says: "One puts down the book with a feeling of bewilderment—even those of us who belong to the craft. True, we knew it before! We knew that no theory would hold water; but yet even we are somewhat surprised, when we have it thus made clear to us, that of the various theories, there is nothing even approximately certain, nor even approximately probable" (p. 199). And in another place he prods at Darwinism in these caustic words: "Study of the variations and anomalies of the human body have done more than anything else to show me the futility of Darwinism as a means of accounting for anything."

In his chapter on "Design and Plan," the Professor scores a strong point in favor of a supreme and intelligent lawgiver by insisting on Mendelëef's proof of perfect order in the inorganic world. And in connection with this he quotes, with entire approval, these humorous words of the Marquis of Salisbury: "If they (the elements) were organic beings, all our difficulties would be solved by muttering the comfortable word—evolution—one of those indefinite words from time to time vouchsafed to humanity, which has the gift of alleviating so many perplexities and making so many gaps in our knowledge. But the families of elementary atoms do not breed, and we cannot therefore ascribe their ordered difference to accidental variation perpetuated by heredity under the influence of natural selection."

The author is not slow to grasp the importance of the teleological argument. He proceeds from the inorganic to the organic world, demonstrating order and design at every turn, even in the minutest details, thus establishing the existence of a law giver above nature and apart therefrom. For instance, he dwells so persuasively both on the "quasi intelligent action" of the human cells in adjusting themselves to new conditions, and on the behavior of the bony tissue after fracture, "say, in the neck of the femur, in which the architectural design is repaired with adaptation to the new conditions," that it is impossible to deny the force of his logic. In pursuing such a line of argument, he is at one with the newer school of biologists, who have become teleologists, and are now as insistent in postulating an intelligent cause for the modifications which take place in nature as their predecessors were in denying such a cause.

Evolution or no evolution, God is still with us, directing all to an end. "A causeless system is not only contrary to reason but beneath it." "Science tells us that whatsoever in evolution can be considered as established rests primarily on the action of an internal force. All that we know of evolution points to law." God is working in all. Such are some of the conclusions of this great and good man, who can speak with the authority of one who has tested science and religion in a way that few can. His decisions may not be congenial to the Philistines, but they are none the less valuable for that.

All the problems which are brought under consideration in this book are treated so skilfully that some few reticences are to be regretted. Thus a discussion of Loeb's discoveries (p. 130) in their bearing on the old problem of the origin of life would have been much to the point. And perhaps more could have been made of the dentition of the Heidelberg jaw (p. 164). Dr. Dwight admits that the teeth resemble those of a man:—some other anthropologists declare that the teeth are undoubtedly human, and have come to believe that human dentition is more primitive than that of the ape. Moreover, these latter now admit that no anthropoid stage immediately preceded the age of the Heidelberg jaw. However, perhaps Dr. Dwight's caution may be warranted by superior knowledge of this subject. The discussion of the Neanderthal and Le Moustier skulls is rather brief. It would be interesting to know how far Dr. Dwight agrees with Virchow's estimate of the small value of the former to the evolutionists. But these are slight deficiencies rather than positive defects. The book is of immense worth, and should be in the hands of confessors and teachers and students of philosophy. Its profound learning, coupled with charming simplicity and a humor that is at times grim, will please and edify and instruct them in many ways. And before they have put the book aside they will be convinced anew that profound scholarship in those very sciences which the Church is popularly but falsely supposed to fear is compatible with an ardent attachment to the Catholic religion.

History of Pope Boniface VIII and His Times, with Notes and Documentary Evidence, in Six Books. By DON LOUIS TOSTI, Benedictine Monk of Monte Cassino. Translated from the Italian by RIGHT REV. MGR. EUGENE J. DONNELLY, V.F., Pastor of St. Michael's Church, Flushing, L. I., N. Y. Christian Press Association Publishing Company.

An American priest who finds time amid his many parochial cares to turn a good book into English deserves well of the Church. This Mgr. Donnelly has done in giving us a translation of Don Tosti's excellent biography of Boniface VIII. There is no Pope who has been more misunderstood, misrepresented and abused than Boniface, for it was his fate to be living in an age that was marked by a gradual change in the medieval mind, owing to the rise of rationalism and to the bold resistance shown by princes to the authority of the Holy See.

Because Pope Boniface opposed, as Hildebrand or Innocent III would have done, the attempts of Philip the Fair to reduce the Church to servitude, this Pope has been the victim of baseless calumnies which his French contemporaries uttered or wrote about him, and which Gallican historians have accepted and perpetuated. For Philip the Fair is the real originator of the so-called "liberties" of the Gallican Church, and because Boniface resolutely upheld the authority of the Chair of Peter, he is catalogued by many English writers among the bad popes.

There is scarcely a crime, indeed, with which Boniface VIII has not been charged, but the voluminous documents Father Tosti cites and the ease with which he discredits the Pope's calumniators prove Boniface to be a good and faithful shepherd, whose one crime in Gallican eyes was fidelity to his trust as Christ's Vicar. The necessity Boniface was often under of opposing unscrupulous and powerful princes, the endless quarrels between Guelphs and Ghibellines, the rise of heresies like that of the Fraticelli, and the course he felt it his duty to pursue with regard to Celestine V, who had resigned the tiara, made his reign a difficult and stormy one. The world was out of joint, and even Pope Boniface could not set it right.

In the Metropolitan Art Museum of New York there hangs a painting of the "Sacrilege of Anagni," the most tragic event in this great Pope's life. The venerable Boniface, betrayed by the citizens of the town and abandoned by his soldiers, is represented, clad in full pontificals, standing before the throne from which he has just been dragged by Nogaret, a creature of Philip's. "Here is my head," cried the fearless Pope, "I, a Catholic, legitimate pontiff, Vicar of Jesus Christ, long to die for the Church!" Then the impious Sciarra smote Boniface on the cheek with his mailed hand. Even Dante, the political enemy of Boniface VIII, had to relent at such a spectacle and sings indignantly:

"Entering Anagni: lo the fleur de lis
And in His Vicar Christ a captive led;
I see Him mocked a second time: again
The vinegar and gall produced I see;
And Christ Himself 'twixt living robbers slain."

The much-tried Pope did not survive these cruelties and insults many weeks, but died a holy death at Rome, leaving the Church to experience soon the captivity of Avignon, which gave birth to the unhappy Schism of the West. Then followed the Pagan Renaissance and the revolt of Luther, events which a thoughtful student of history can see foreshadowed in the pontificate of Boniface VIII, for Philip the Fair had taught the world how to defy, insult and ill-treat the Vicar of Christ. Catholics should read Mgr. Donnelly's book.

The Beauty and Truth of the Catholic Church. Sermons from the German, adapted and edited by the REV. EDWARD JONES. St. Louis: B. Herder.

The sermons contained in this volume, and in subsequent volumes to be published, have been selected and adapted, Father Jones tells us, from the German work, "Schoenheit und Wahrheit der Katholischen Kirche," published by Very Rev. H. von Hurter. Father von Hurter was a popular preacher in Vienna in the early seventies, and his published sermons give us to-day ready understanding of the repute won by him among the people of Austria's capital. They are excellent examples of sacred oratory—correct in doctrine, apt in practical application, lucid in form and style. Father Jones, an alumnus of the Innsbruck University, has the rare merit of preserving in his translation the full grace and vividness of the original. He undertook the work at the request of some clerical friends, who recognized that von Hurter's book cannot fail of being a profitable and interesting help to those whose vocation it is to preach the Word of God, but whose duties leave them little time for preparation of their instructions.

The present volume, the first of five to be translated, and which will cover practically the whole field of dogmatic and sacramental theology, is concerned with the tract "De Ecclesia Dei." We are quite confident that the work, when known, will hold an honorable place in every parish priest's library. * * *

The Secret Garden. By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT. New York: Frederick A. Stokes. $1.35.

The author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy" has written another beautiful and inspiring story, unique of its kind, and a delight from beginning to end. The chief characters are children, but we pity the grown-up who will not derive pleasure and profit from their companionship. Mary Lennox, a sickly and ill-natured orphan girl, just arrived from India, is quartered in a house in Yorkshire with her cousin, Colin, a still more sickly and ill-natured boy, who, like her, has been spoiled by always having his own way—which is as bad for children, we are told, as never having it. How, by mutual reaction and the influence of two healthy Yorkshire children and of Mrs. Sowerby, "the mother of twelve," who keeps them all fat on fresh air and sixteen shillings a week, Colin and Mary become interested in other things than themselves, in birds and flowers and people and sunshine and the breath of the moor, and above all, in the "secret garden," where they practice "white magic," and dig and prune and play, learning "ants' ways, plants' ways, bees', frogs', birds' and beetles' ways, and foxes' and otters', and ferrets' and squirrels', and trouts' and water-rats' and badgers' ways," till they grow healthy and happy and amiable, glad to live "forever and ever and ever," and "praise God from whom all blessings flow"—is a process charmingly described in 375 pages, which may be followed with profit and pleasure by children of any age. There are wonderful new characters in the story—Dickon, the country lad, who knows the ways of animals and plants, "is always talking of live things, always looking up in the sky to watch birds flying, or looking down at the earth to see something growing," and his marvelous mother, Susan Sowerby, and the robin, and the mysterious "secret garden" itself; but its gates are now open.

Vocabolario Italiano-Albanese. Compilato dal P. ANTONIO Buseti, S.J. Scutari, Albania: Tipografia dell' Immacolata. Francs, 9.25; postpaid 11.30.

For seventy years, or thereabouts, the Catholic missionaries in Albania, especially the Jesuits, have been doing all in their power to revive the knowledge of the Albanian language and literature. The task was a hard one, for the reason that the Turkish Government has always been remorseless during the last five centuries in its efforts to obliterate every vestige of both language and literature. A bishop or priest who was suspected of sympathy with the people in that particular was almost sure of being banished from the land. It was very difficult to obtain any knowledge of the language except from intercourse with the people, many of whom, fortunately, still spoke it. In many parts Turkish expressions have never encroached on the popular speech, especially in country places. In the cities and towns it is not so pure. Nevertheless, after many years' study, and aided by the previous researches of his brethren, Father Buseti, who has long been attached to what is called "The Flying Mission of Albania," has succeeded in compiling this dictionary, which he now offers to the public. Universities and Public Libraries ought to be eager to secure this valuable work, which furnishes the key to a very ancient language, many of whose philological mysteries, however, still remain to be solved. It is an octavo of 1,150 pages, preceded by a Morphology, or a Study of Word Formation, consisting of 56 pages. The prominent place which Albania now occupies in the new adjustment of the geography of Europe, not to speak of every good man's sympathy with the heroism which this splendid Christian people has displayed in its fight of centuries against Turkish domination, ought to make the publication of this timely contribution to a new, or, rather, revised literature, most acceptable.

La Perla de las Virtudes. Una exhortación al joven católico. Por el Padre ADOLFO DE DOSS de la Compañía de Jesús. St. Louis: B. Herder. 35 cents net.

This is a Spanish version of our familiar "Pearl among Virtues." The translator sums up its excellences in a few striking words: "Leedlo hasta que sepáis su contenido como el Padrenuestro, y despues, seguid todavía leyéndola cada día; pues siempre descubriréis en él nuevos tesoros, siempre sacaréis nuevos frutos. . . . Pero repito: leed con entera atención;" which means, in brief: read it; read it often; read it always.

In these evil days of eugenics and sexology, and similar extravagances, more good is to be expected from the earnest perusal of this little volume than from all the diagrams and statistical tables that daydreaming wisacres can muster. Means and motives are of far more importance than mere facts, however discreetly these may be set forth. But what is to be said when they are presented with a crudeness which amounts to coarseness? It is far better to know and love the beauty of virtue, as it is portrayed in this little book, than to be intimately acquainted with the nature of vice.

* * *

Three booklets have come from the Catholic Truth Society of Pater Noster Row, London. "How I made My Retreat," is a popular explanation and exposition of St. Ignatius' Spiritual Exercises by Father Joseph Rickaby, S.J.; "The Restored Hierarchy" is a short story of the "papal aggression" of 1850 and of Lord John Russell's fanaticism, told by James B. Milburn; and "The Saints of the Mass," compiled by Mother Philippa, of the Bar Convent, York, is made up of brief accounts of the apostles and martyrs whose names are mentioned in the Canon of the Mass.

Several new Latin books have also reached the reviewer's desk. One is a copy of the sixth edition of the "Martyrologium Romanum," which has the names added of the saints canonized in recent years. It is published by the Pontifical Press of P. Marietti, Via Legnano, 23, Turin. From the same house comes Father Arthur Cozzi's "Disputationes Theologiæ Moralis," first delivered in the Argentina Seminary. It is especially suited to the requirements of South American priests. The Jesuit Father's well-known "Cursus Scripturæ Sacræ" is now being enriched by a "Novi Testamenti Lexicon Græcum," by Francis Zorell, S.J., of which the second and third parts are now ready. P. Lithielleux, Rue Cassette, Paris, is the publisher.

Those who would like to follow intelligently the long ceremonies required for the "Consecration of an Altar" will welcome the neat little book on the subject with Latin and English in parallel columns, which is published by the Cathedral Library Association of New York.

In "A Handbook of Schools," a pamphlet published by Doubleday, Page & Co., a half dozen schoolma'ams and pedagogues discuss the ideal school. But as none of the writers seems to think that boys and girls are anything more than intellectual animals, no provision is made in the school of to-morrow for religious instruction of any kind. Catholics, therefore, will not find the discussion at all thorough.

The third volume of Father Campbell's "Pioneer Priests of North America" receives a studied and judicious review in the last number of the Boston Pilot. "This is the third and last volume of what we do not hesitate to call a great work," writes the critic. "Its greatness appears when we consider the difficulties with which the author had to contend. He was not entering upon a clear field. Others who had been there before him had made the way less easy for him to travel; they had misinterpreted many of the landmarks, had ploughed up the footprints of the holy men who had walked there with the glad tidings of the Gospel, and finally they had sown there the bad seed of perversion and vilification."

"Father Campbell, therefore, had much to undo. He had to rehabilitate the noble men and show them to be as they were in reality, apostles, at whose heroism, whose holiness, we stand aghast.

"The long list of authorities given proves how accurate the author has aimed to be. Naturally the "Relations," as the first-hand authority, are the foundations of his history. He has not, however, followed them blindly, but has availed himself of the researches of other historians, and in many cases, as we may judge from the narrative, has made his own investigations of the very spots sanctified by the footprints of these other soldiers of St. Ignatius.

"The result is a history that is worthy of consideration. The two former volumes of the work had to do with the preaching of the Faith among the Iroquois and the Hurons. This last has its scene among the Algonquins. . . .

"Every page is full of interest, but the sketch of Father Rale, heart-breaking as it is, will bring one back to read it again and again. I wonder if we may look to the author to give us a more detailed life of this great man. The present sketch is excellent, so excellent that it makes us long to know more and more of the martyr that has sanctified our New England shores. The Bostonian will take a special interest in the life of Father Druillettes.

"But it is not as mere history that the book appeals to us. It is as the thrilling story of souls of men who loved Christ and who yearned to make Him known to others even at the cost of their lives. It is deep spiritual reading, the kind that nourishes the apostolic spirit. Would that the teachers in our schools would use it, tell the story of it to our boys and girls in these days when the Church is calling for helpers in the vineyard."

EDUCATION

Early in the Spring of 1909 the Cosmopolitan Magazine published the first of a series of articles which aroused a great outcry in the educational world. The author, mentioning by name the leading non-Catholic universities of the country, asserted that doctrines subversive of Christian faith and Christian morality were taught in their classes. Forestalling an attempt to discredit his statements, which was later actually made, the writer expressed his readiness to produce documentary proofs to convince the world that his charges were the result of a conscientious investigation of American colleges extending over two years. His information, he stated, had been obtained while attending lectures, from interviews with members of the faculties and from consulting the type-written or printed records of what is taught in those institutions.

* * *

The editor of the Cosmopolitan, in a note introducing the series to his readers, summed up the statements made in these articles in this vigorous strain: "Out of the curricula of American colleges a dynamic movement is upheaving ancient foundations and promising a way for revolutionary thought and life. Those who are not in close touch with the great colleges of the country will be astonished to learn the creeds being fostered by the faculties of our great universities. In hundreds of classrooms it is being taught daily that the decalogue is no more sacred than a syllabus; that the home as an institution is doomed; that there are no absolute evils; that immorality is simply an act in contravention of society's accepted standard; . . . that the change from one religion to another is like getting a new hat; that moral precepts are passing shibboleths; that conceptions of right and wrong are as unstable as styles of dress. . . . These are some of the revolutionary and sensational teachings submitted with academic warrant to the minds of thousands of students in the United States. It is time that the public realized what is being taught to the youth of this country."

* * *

It is strange that in the two years since these articles appeared no answer worthy of the name has been forthcoming. To be sure a host of writers hurried to the rescue,—but they failed to play the game fairly. The Cosmopolitan was denounced as unworthy of credence, the writer of the articles was affirmed to be without authority in the particular line of his investigations, and interviews innumerable appeared charging a Catholic Bishop, who had made these articles a partial reason for a ringing address to members of his own Church, with narrowness and unprogressive illiberalism. But there was a surprising lack of directness in the statements made. The definite charges filed were ignored, and no specific refutation was attempted in reply to the indictment that in our large universities doctrines destructive of Christian faith and morality are held up to the admiration of the students.

On Sunday, September 10, the press of the country published another strong arraignment of the leading advanced schools of the United States. The charges rehearsed in it are claimed to be the results of an investigation, report of which has just been made public by R. T. Crane, a wealthy manufacturer of Chicago. Mr. Crane is the senior member of a corporation widely known as the Crane Company, iron founders and manufacturers of general machinery. He has long nourished an aversion to educational institutions of the higher class, and has indulged in attacks, both written and spoken, against college education, declaring it unfit for a young man for success in a business career. This fact will, no doubt, lessen the value of Mr. Crane's attack in the estimation of many. Violently prejudiced opinions of partisan witnesses never win much credit; and many will be quite ready to accept Mr. Crane's latest report as an attempt on the part of an acknowledged bitter opponent of college training to make good before the bar of public opinion.

This view of his latest utterance condemnatory of colleges and college education has been foreseen by the author of the report to which we refer. Mr. Crane, therefore, is duly careful to establish, or at least to profess to establish, the reliability of his statements. He tells us he has spent much time and much money in his investigations. To confirm the truth of his thesis that colleges do more harm than good he quotes a large number of examples drawn from this investigation, for which he vouches that his proof is irrefutable. He furnishes a list of statistics, and with a claimed absence of partisan heat or passion, he simply asks his readers to draw their own conclusions.

* * *

The report, printed in the current issue of the Valve World, issued by Mr. Crane, is a startling one. It describes unsparingly student dissipation in Boston, the home of our most honored University of Harvard, and the description is drawn from statements made by an investigator employed by Mr. Crane. It is a story of drunkenness, immorality, brawling and the reckless spending of money in Boston cafés that seems almost incredible in connection with the supposed high character of America's most noted school. The indictment is not directed against Harvard alone. Columbia is worse, the report declares, and Yale, Princeton and Cornell are nearly as bad. College club life in particular is scored in Mr. Crane's paper. Clubs at the various colleges, and especially at Harvard, he affirms to be nothing but breeding places for wrongdoing. The author of this latest attack on the colleges is ready, as well, with what he believes to be the fundamental reason why colleges are to be reckoned "destroyers" rather than "developers" of moral character.

* * *

"Boys go to college," he writes, "at an age when they most need the best restraints of home. They possess more or less curiosity to learn of evil. They are brought into communication with boys from homes of every conceivable moral standard, and with very flexible morals of their own, if they have any at all. The sophisticated are anxious to show the unsophisticated the town, and thus prove their knowledge of the world. . . . The open manner in which the college student flaunts depravity in the face of his fellows lowers their ideals and blunts their morals until they find themselves ready first to tolerate it, then to condone it, and eventually to follow his example."

* * *

The entire paper forms a severe indictment against the conditions which surround the private life of undergraduates at Harvard and the other institutions mentioned. To be sure, the very violence of the attack will cause men to take counsel with themselves before accepting it at its face value. Its too obviously exaggerated tone throughout suggests the man "with an axe to grind." Mr. Crane has a thesis to prove: "that a young man cannot get any standing in a college unless he is a degenerate." That he means not to mince words in proving his thesis is so strongly in evidence throughout his broadside, as to force one at once to question the credibility of his allegations. Truth is always temperate in its expression; it has no need of extravagant coloring. Still a man in Mr. Crane's position can ill afford to arouse the storm which completely unfounded charges would certainly cause to sweep in upon him from the objects of his attack. We are curious, then, to learn what manner of reply the college men concerned mean to make. That they are not minded practically to ignore Mr. Crane's arraignment, as happened in the case of the "Blasting of the Rock" papers two years ago, seems quite assured from the reply made by members of the Harvard Faculty to reporters who interviewed them on the day of its publication. "They wanted time," they said, "to digest Mr. Crane's report and statement before replying to his charges."

Up to the time of this writing nothing has appeared in answer to the severe comments occurring in that statement, save a series of general denials and of protests that the vicious tale is unthinkable when told of institutions with a "social atmosphere" such as that pervading Harvard and its sister colleges. The Evening Post of September 11 reviews the whole question of undergraduate living in an editorial whose temperate spirit is admirable. Asserting that "the first thing suggested by reading Mr. Crane's charges is doubt as to the accuracy of the statistics, which from the nature of the case would be difficult to collect," the writer continues:

"When all allowance is made, the general charge has enough truth in it to give college authorities, at Harvard and elsewhere, occasion for serious thought. The temptations which beset youth nowadays, particularly at colleges near large cities, are enormous, and the wonder is that more harm is not done than actually is. At Harvard, if we mistake not, little personal control is had even of freshmen. The Harvard ideal seems to be that right influences officially shall be brought to bear upon their lives and, for the rest, they must work out their own salvation. At the opening of the term they listen to admirable talks on healthful and proper living, are warned against temptation, and are then told to fight the good fight of winning character and self-reliance. It must be said that those who are strong enough to follow the advice emerge the better for the struggle. But in general the risk is too great. Young fellows, some of them living away from home for the first time, enter into a liberty that is bewildering and upsetting. Many go once or twice a week to wine-dinners in town, where they are confronted by a diluted form of Broadway life; later repair to the front rows of a musical comedy, and between acts adjourn to a neighboring bar. Here is a set of conditions which it is dangerous to open freely to boys at the most impulsive period of their lives. The fact is, freshmen are granted a freedom which few of them can employ to advantage. Here undoubtedly is the place to begin any necessary reforms in the general problem of undergraduate living."

* * *

Had the writer gone a step farther in his admirable analysis of the weak spot in the present day system, or lack of system, in educational methods, we should not have a word to add. Accompanying the too great liberty conceded to young college men is that other evil of a lack of definite religious atmosphere. Occasional doses of altruistic ethics, which comprise the whole of the moral training in all these schools, cannot supply the motives of conduct or inspire the high ideals that a system of moral instruction based upon religion and applied to the concerns of everyday life can and does do. Thoughtful people the country over are awakening to this position held by the Catholic Church from the beginning. Definite religious training as a part of our educational work, from the elementary grades up and on through the most advanced courses, is a necessity, if abuses such as the report of Mr. Crane proclaims are not to grow with each successive generation. Divorce your curriculum of studies from the direct influence of religion, and if the holders of the various chairs in your universities will not directly teach cynicism, immorality and scepticism, at least they will not and cannot make any very strenuous efforts to inculcate the opposite.

* * *

Mr. Crane, no doubt, has made the mistake committed by many an ardent partisan—the abuse obtaining in the system he would eliminate looms too large above his horizon to permit him to note the excellent qualities that belong to it. But, as the Post's editorial already referred to affirms, "his muckraking suggests a question of larger bearing than that of the special evils which he has touched upon."

M. J. O'C.

His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons has ever been a sturdy advocate of a religious education. Speaking of the evils which threaten our American civilization, he points out that one of the greatest "arises from our mutilated and defective system of public school education." He reminds us that "God has given us a heart to be formed to virtue, as well as a head to be enlightened. By secular education we improve the mind; by religious training we direct the heart"; and he quotes the words of the Protestant Guizot, who says: "In order to make popular education truly good and socially useful, it must be fundamentally religious. . . . It is necessary that rational education should be given and received in the midst of a religious atmosphere, and that religious impressions and religious observances should penetrate into all its parts." So strongly does the Cardinal feel on the subject of moral education that he classes with Mormonism and divorce, which strike at the root of the family and society, with the desecration of the Christian Sabbath, which tends to obliterate in our adult population the salutary fear of God and the homage that we owe Him, with the gross and systematic election frauds, "an imperfect and vicious system of education which undermines the religion of our youth."

ECONOMICS

It is pleasant to hear of the continuous lessening of the dangers that beset such as "go down to the sea in ships." Until towards the middle of the last century ships still carried the family features of those in which Vasco da Gama, Drake and other pioneer navigators had sailed unknown seas; and men still living remember how the voyage to the Southern Ocean was held to be encompassed with perils. The books their youth delighted in cast ships away on coral reefs and landed mariners in palm islands for many an adventure with cannibals, as easily as those of to-day take their heroes into the interior of China, or to the bottom of the sea. "Enoch Arden" was published as late as 1864; yet both Enoch and his ship, Good Fortune, belong to the heroic age. An Indiaman of 800 tons was then a tall ship, and the great three-deckers of the line of battle hardly reached 3,000 tons. The average burden of ships tempting the Horn and the Cape was about 400 tons, a large number of them being of little more than 300 tons. How many of them sailed away never to see port again we can hardly realize, and the harvest of destruction and death reaped by every storm breaking on our coast or in the English narrow seas would horrify us to-day. No wonder that owners wrote seriously their bills of lading in a form no longer seen and sadly missed: "Shipped . . . on board the good ship Mary Ann, whereof under God John Jones is master for this present voyage."

The discovery of gold in California brought in the great American clippers; but it was the compounding of the marine engine and the introduction into building of iron and steel that brought about the development in size and security that marked the close of the nineteenth century, and is still more striking at the present day. Travel by sea has long been increasing year by year, and a voyage round the world has become a matter of pleasure rather than of peril.

Nevertheless, man cannot boast that he has tamed the sea. A return of casualties in British shipping during the last twenty years, published by the Board of Trade, shows no less than 8,169 total losses, bringing death to 18,660 seamen and 4,277 passengers. The yearly average, therefore, for the former class was 933, and for the latter, 214. The numbers seem large, but compared with the number of seamen and passengers by sea, they are so small that the chance of any sailor or passenger perishing on any particular voyage is slight indeed, and the greater number of mariners die, like other people, in their beds.

The loss of passengers in 1910 was 260, 46 above the average, which reminds us that, despite all man's skill, the sea will take its toll. The loss of the London, of the President, of the Royal Charter, of the Arctic, of the City of Boston, of the Atlantic and of many another ship, either never heard of or cast away, sometimes close to port, made the annals of the sea terrible in earlier days. Modern improvements have made such catastrophes much more rare: they have not abolished them, for during the year in question two large steamers, new, well-found, with every means invented to preclude such a possibility, the Waratah, with 92 passengers and 119 crew, and the Loodiana, with 83 passengers and 93 crew, sailed away, never to be heard of again.

The total losses during 1910 were 332, only 1.5 per cent. of the British mercantile marine. Turning to a brighter side of the picture, the total number of lives saved from wreck within the British Possessions and from British ships on the high seas, during 1910, was 7,936.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

THE NATIONAL EUCHARISTIC CONGRESS.

The Fifth National Priests' Eucharistic Congress is to be held at Cincinnati, from September 28 to October 1. No labor has been spared to make of it an event of truly national importance. About forty archbishops and bishops have already accepted the invitation to attend the celebrations, which are to be carried on with a pomp and magnificence befitting the sublime mystery which they are meant to glorify. It is announced that all the churches of the city are to be decorated for the occasion and that in each the Holy Hour is to be held, with exhortation or meditation upon the Blessed Sacrament, every evening during the Congress. On September 28, on the stroke of nine, when at the Cathedral the solemnities begin, the bells of every church in city and county throughout the entire diocese are to be rung for five minutes.

It is realized more fully with every day by the Catholic world that the one power which can stem the tide of irreligion, which can conquer the materialism and sensuality of our age, and which alone can strike a solemn harmony through the discord of that great struggle between wealth and poverty, capital and labor, is the Holy Eucharist. This conviction finds its most splendid expression in the great popular demonstrations which are everywhere held in honor of the Blessed Sacrament. The thoroughness and enthusiasm with which preparations have been made for the present convention promise to give it a worthy place among the many Eucharistic Congresses which in late years have illustrated the Church, and which have cast forth the glory of their light upon the millions still seated in darkness and the shadow of death.

His Grace Archbishop Moeller, in anticipation of the Congress, has addressed a pastoral letter to the clergy and laity of the Archdiocese of Cincinnati, in which he says:

"DEARLY BELOVED:—We marvel that, when men, urged on by diabolical hatred and malice, were plotting to remove Christ from among the living, He lovingly made use of His wisdom, His omnipotence, to institute a Sacrament in which He would be present, and remain with mankind to the end of time. Our wonder increases when we consider that, looking down the long vista of ages, He saw plainly the indignities to which this love and condescension would subject Him. But neither the treachery of His friends, nor the fury of His executioners, nor the insults of unbelievers, nor the sacrileges of the unworthy, nor the neglect towards Him of His chosen ones stifled His love, or made the potent words, 'This is My Body,' die upon His lips. Our faith must be weak indeed, our hearts very cold, if we can remain unmoved by this love of the Saviour our God. Hasten to adore Him, to tell Him that you love Him, and to promise that you will do all to increase devotion to Him in the Blessed Sacrament, and to make reparation for the insults which are there heaped upon Him.

"An excellent opportunity of giving evidence of your faith, love and devotion towards the Blessed Sacrament will be offered you, dearly Beloved Brethren, on the occasion of the Fifth National Eucharistic Congress, which will be held in Cincinnati, September 28, 29, 30, and October 1 of this year. Thirty-three bishops have already expressed their intention of attending the Congress. Many priests from various parts of the United States will also be present. We are certain that the clergy and laity of our archdiocese will not fail to give evidence of their love and devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, and do all in their power to make the Congress a grand and solemn Te Deum ascending to heaven, mingling its strains with the Holy, Holy, Holy of the Angels and Blessed to honor Christ, Whom they see face to face, and Whom we adore under the Sacramental veil.

"Also make the time of the Congress an occasion of special and fervent prayer for blessings. Pray to the Emmanuel for our Most Holy Father Pius X, who has signalized his reign by stimulating devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, and whose name will be handed down in history as the Pope of the Eucharist. Implore our Lord to bless him, to lighten his burden and to grant that he may see the liberty and exaltation of the Church. Ask the Emmanuel, who commanded the wind and the sea, to check the tempests of error, vice and persecution that are sweeping over the Church. Beg the Emmanuel to bless bishops and priests, the guardians of the Eucharist, and ask Him to animate them with the faith of St. Peter, the love of St. John towards the Blessed Sacrament. Pray for the rulers of nations, especially of our beloved country, that they may rule wisely and prudently, seeking in all things to do the will of God, so that the catastrophe pronounced against the Israelites may not befall us: 'But if thou wilt not hear the Lord thy God to do and keep His Commandments, the Lord thy God will bring upon thee a nation from afar and from the uttermost ends of the earth to destroy thee.' Deut. XXVIII. Finally, pray for all the members of the Church, and for those outside her pale, that they may love and serve the Lord their God, Who loved them first and without measure."

The following is the program as announced by his Grace Archbishop Moeller:

The first retreat for laymen at Mount Manresa, Staten Island—the first house to be opened for the exclusive purpose of giving such retreats—closed most successfully on September 11, under the spiritual directorship of the Rev. T. J. Shealy, S.J. Thirty-eight men participated, and just before the opening of the retreat, on Friday, September 8, sat down to dinner, at which the Provincial of the New York-Maryland Province, Very Rev. Joseph F. Hanselman, S.J., presided. He welcomed the retreat band and described the occasion as an event of the first importance in the history of the Catholic Church in America. He pointed out the happy significance of the opening date—the feast of the Nativity of Our Lady—and predicted for the house a long and glorious career of good for the Catholic manhood of this country. Other addresses were made by Dr. James J. Walsh, George F. Roesch, Condé B. Pallen, Ph.D., editor of "The Catholic Encyclopedia," and Dr. Hamilton Williams. After dinner on Friday the band went into retreat. On Sunday afternoon the exercises were interrupted long enough to enable an informal meeting to be held, at which a letter of thanks to Archbishop Farley for his great interest in the work was drawn up and signed by all participants in the retreat. Measures were also concerted for extending the work, and it was made evident with the opening of Mount Manresa that no more appropriate place for its purpose could well be imagined, and its accessibility to New York makes it most convenient for retreatants. In this first retreat band there were lawyers, doctors, newspapermen, clerks, mechanics, brokers, teachers, artisans, and three headmasters of Catholic schools. For future retreats application should be made to the corresponding secretary or the Rev. T. J. Shealy, S.J., 140 Nassau street, New York.

Catholics in the United States should by this time be thoroughly informed of the character of the Young Men's Christian Association in this country, and of the danger to their faith which Catholic young men are willing to risk who join the organization. Catholics, of course, are allowed to become members, and their money is accepted with pleasure, while some Catholics are simple enough to be deluded by the specious pretense that "the religious opinions of a member are never interfered with." The Southern Cross, of Buenos Aires, which has been assailed for calling the Y. M. C. A. a Protestant and also a proselyting institution, gives the following interesting bit of history connected with the establishment of the Association in Buenos Aires:

"When the Y. M. C. A. was founded, a few years ago, in Buenos Aires, it was asserted that it was non-sectarian, and that all who profess Christianity could be members, but at one of the first meetings of the Directory the question was raised by a Protestant gentleman whether Catholics could be members or not. The official answer was that Catholics could be members of the Association, i. e., they could contribute money, etc., but no Catholic could be a member of the Directory. Moreover, the Secretary officially informed the gentlemen present that the compliance with the promise of $70,000 from the Association in the United States to help the buying of premises in Buenos Aires was subject to the condition that no Catholic would figure on the Directory. In case any Catholic was elected the money would not be given. Several Protestant gentlemen, in view of this sectarian spirit, withdrew from the Association."

We heard a rumor recently that the Associated Press had become so dissatisfied with the character and the coloring of the news, especially regarding Catholic Church affairs, sent from Europe that it was taking steps to have American Press Agents installed at the news centres in Europe, to take the places of those who are responsible for the erroneous and misleading statements with which the American newspapers are flooded. We hope that credence can be given the rumor and we shall anxiously await developments. Meantime the agents of the Associated Press working in Portugal have it all their own way. A report dated September 6 states that "Agents of the Portuguese Government, while taking an inventory of church property, have found in the underground vaults of the Cathedral in Oporto a great amount of treasure, the property of ancient friars, most of which the authorities of the church had little idea existed." How stupid of the Bishop and his assistant priests not to be aware of the treasure hidden in their own vaults. Surely ignorant priests have no right to their possession, and the whole mass may be considered by the Government as treasure trove. "The chests discovered are filled with gold ingots," says the dispatch, "and plates and gold ornaments studded with enormous rubies. The altar furniture is of pure gold." Until the real facts are ascertained, we feel confident that the agents of the Government have merely come across the sacred vessels, the chalices, remonstrances and ciborium devoted to the service of the altar. The ordinary reader would presume that the ancient friars must have come into unlawful possession, since they were so carefully concealed that not even the churchmen themselves dreamt of their existence.

Suppose the agents of the Treasury Department of the United States were, under process of law or no law, to examine the vaults of St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York. They would undoubtedly find, carefully hidden away from thieves and mountebanks, sacred and costly articles appropriate for divine service. Oporto is an ancient See, probably founded in the middle of the sixth century. To-day it has 479 parishes, 1,120 priests, and a Catholic population of 650,000 and 500 Protestants. It isn't likely that an ancient See would not be in possession of costly altar furniture in keeping with the number of Christian inhabitants and the one-time wealth of the nation. But the miserable makeshift of a government misnamed a Republic, tottering on the verge of bankruptcy, needs funds for its myrmidons, and the Church, as to-day in France and under Henry VIII in England, is a handy treasury to loot in order to pay the debts of official extravagance. The Associated Press dispatch naively concludes: "It is presumed that the treasure will revert to the State under the Separation law."

PERSONAL.

The will of Mrs. Annie F. Doyle, filed in the Surrogate's office, New York, on September 5, leaves the greater part of an estate valued at $20,000 to Catholic charities. The charitable bequests are as follows: St. Joseph's Diocesan Seminary, $5,000; Society for the Propagation of the Faith, $5,000; Little Sisters of the Poor, $500; St. Stephen's Church, $1,000; New York Apostolate, $2,000; Servants of Relief for Incurable Cancer, $1,000, and St. Mary's Church, $500.

"Cardinal Moran," says the Westminster Gazette, "was recognized as one of the great minds of the Church. In his habits he was studious, and in his tastes severely simple, though the people erected for him a grand palace by the sea at Manly, a short distance from Sydney. St. Mary's, his city residence, behind the Cathedral, was like a deserted house, but he was generally to be found there, safely guarded in the outer chamber by an elderly, clean-shaven, blarney-proof Irishman, and attended by his faithful Secretary. The furniture in the hall, and in some at least of the rooms, would have disgraced any other man. The oilcloth was never of the best quality, and the seats in two or three of the chairs had long ceased to serve a useful purpose. But under the Cardinal's care the Roman Catholic Church in Australia made wonderful material progress."

Rt. Rev. Mgr. J. M. Laval, V.G., rector of St. Louis Cathedral, New Orleans, has been appointed Auxiliary Bishop of that diocese. Born in St. Etienne, France, 1854, he came to America at the age of eighteen, and entered the New Orleans Seminary, where he was ordained by Archbishop Perch , 1887. He served as pastor of St. Gabriel's, Houma and Baton Rouge, La., rector of St. John the Baptist's parish, New Orleans, and of St. Louis' Cathedral. In 1898 he was appointed Vicar General with the dignity of Canon. Mgr. Laval is noted for zeal, tact and culture, which, in a diocese that embraces several races and tongues, won him the respect and confidence of all.

Joseph E. Burgui res, a prominent Louisiana planter and broker who died recently in New Orleans, left $50,000 to establish a home for incurables in that city under the care of the Sisters of Charity. The executors are directed to consult Sister Lucia, who is in charge of the Lepers' Home at Indian Camp, in Iberville Parish, with regard to building and equipment. Mr. Burgui res also left some $10,000 to various Catholic churches in Louisiana. He drew the will in New York in 1901, soon after his graduation in Spring Hill College and on the day on which he was leaving for a European trip.

OBITUARY

Rev. Mother Sarah Jones, who died at the Convent of the Sacred Heart, Kenwood, Albany, September 9, at the advanced age of eighty-seven, was born in New York in 1823. Her father, Judge Samuel Jones of the Supreme Court, and Chancellor of the State, of whom she was the favorite daughter, was a member of the Episcopal Church. She was endowed with a remarkably fine mind, developed by the solid education she had received. When about sixteen she met Archbishop Hughes. She frequently questioned him on religious topics, and he cleared away her doubts, overcame her prejudices and led her to see the truth of the Catholic Faith. To know the truth and to follow its guidance was one and the same thing for this upright soul. Through many struggles of mind and heart, the most painful of which was the opposition of a beloved father, Miss Jones was received into the Church by the Archbishop himself, and shortly after became a pupil of the Sacred Heart, later entering the Society at the age of twenty-two.

During many years she held important offices in connection with Rev. Mother Hardey, to whom she was an efficient and reliable support, and whom she succeeded as Vicar in January, 1873. As Mistress of Novices she excelled in the knowledge of the spiritual life, while her perfect discretion and maternal kindness inspired confidence and trust and made easy the first steps of many in the religious life. When the duties of Superior became hers, those under her care found in her a mother and a prudent counsellor. She was just, but, above all, she was kind, and many outside of her community will never forget the zeal and the overflowing charity of which they were the objects.

Rev. Mother Jones had also that knowledge of business methods so necessary in her position. Interested in every detail, accurate in her plans and calculations, she foresaw difficulties in time to have them removed, and was untiring in her calm and watchfulness. The new Manhattanville, built after the fire of 1888, will remain a monument to her determined energy and foresight. She also founded Elmhurst, the Providence Convent.

While Superior Vicar, by her wise government and the gentle sanctity of her personal intercourse, she exercised a great and lasting influence over those who had the privilege of meeting her. Besides her natural gifts, she had been endowed with graces of a higher order: a wonderful spirit of prayer, an intense love for the Holy Scripture, great reverence for all things relating to the service of God and, finally, the gift of speaking well, and even, at times, eloquently, of divine truths, of the love of Our Lord, thus drawing minds and hearts to a closer imitation of His life and virtues.

The last years of Rev. Mother Jones' life were spent in the quiet seclusion of Kenwood. It was befitting that there, where she had taught so many to follow more closely in the footsteps of Christ, she should, by a glorious example of obedience and humility, show to all devoted to His Heart that in carrying His Cross to the end she had found "His yoke sweet and His burden light."

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

PARISH SCHOOL ASSEMBLIES.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On Friday, September 1, I had the good fortune to find myself one of a vast concourse of people who had gathered on Fitton Field, near the city of Worcester, Mass. Fitton Field is the name given to the splendid athletic grounds of Holy Cross College. It is a long sweep of low level ground running along the Blackstone River, which is guided on its course by well-built walls of masonry, and further down by rip-raps when it approaches Lake Quinsigamond. On the other side rises a series of terraces, crowned at the summit by the stately college buildings. It is doubtful if there is another place in the country so well adapted for athletic contests, or so admirably suited for the pageant which took place there at the opening of the school year.

This picturesque ceremony, however, was not for the collegians—they had not yet arrived—but for the school children of the city. On the grand stand the parents of the children had assembled by thousands, and of course their eyes were all turned towards the terraces on the right of them, where the little ones, in bands of two or three hundred, had begun to appear, some from the side nearest the city, on the east of the College Hill, while others who had climbed the slope from the west were seen first on the summit, from which they descended, marching in excellent order down to one or other of the places assigned to them. Soon they seemed to be coming from all directions at once. There must have been five or six thousand of them. Then the martial strains of the band that was to lead them in the procession were heard, and the long line began to deploy along the intersecting roads of the various levels, the highest one first, until they finally reached the great plain beneath, where in columns of four their solid phalanxes came near to the great assembly waiting to receive them, which, as they approached, broke into cheers. Nearing the stand they divided to the right and left, and formed a rigid alignment twelve or fifteen feet deep, and then uniting with the instruments the five or six thousand fresh young voices broke out into "My Country 'tis of Thee."

When the great chorus ended a signal was given, and, as if by magic, those to whom the first parts of the program were assigned appeared in the front ranks, while the others fell back to the rear to await their turn. It was all managed with exquisite precision and without the slightest sign of disorder or confusion, and thus the exercises continued, without delay or mistake, for two whole hours, terminating at last in a burst of enthusiasm when the whole audience joined with the children in singing the national anthem, "The Star-Spangled Banner."

I could not help asking myself: Is there not a lesson in all this? Why could not similar ceremonies be held for the children of our parish schools during the summer vacations at many places throughout the country? The effect on the children themselves, on the fathers and mothers, and on the country at large, could not fail to be instructive and inspiring. Possibly some one may take up the idea. It is in the hope that such will be the case that I have attempted to describe what I saw on Fitton Field this September.

CHRONICLE

The President's Tour.—President Taft at the close of the first week of his speaking tour that will extend to the Pacific coast, had reached the Middle West, being everywhere greeted with unmistakable demonstrations of confidence and good will. His addresses, which were in the main a defence of his official acts, attracted national attention. In these addresses he signified his readiness to eliminate from the arbitration treaties the provision for a joint high commission of inquiry, in order to meet the Senate objection to those measures. He also stoutly defended the Sherman Anti-Trust law, giving unstinted praise to the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in cases arising under that act. The President likewise resolutely defended his veto of the three tariff bills passed at the Special Session of Congress, characterizing them as careless, unscientific and altogether unsatisfactory, and an attempt of the Democratic party to make "a record for political purposes." Perhaps the bitterest disappointment that has fallen to the lot of President Taft since he became Chief Magistrate of the Nation came with the news of the defeat of reciprocity in Canada. "I had hoped," he said, "the reciprocity agreement would be put through to prove the correctness of my judgment that it would be a good thing for both countries. It takes two to make a bargain, and if Canada declines we can still go on doing business at the old stand."

Judge Grosscup's Resignation.—Judge Peter S. Grosscup, of the United States Circuit Court, threatened to retire from the bench. He has served nineteen years as a member of the federal judiciary in the northern district of Illinois, and is a member of the United States Court of Appeals. Judge Grosscup is best known to the public on account of his decisions in corporation cases and his ideas about the control of the trusts. The reason he gives for his resignation is a desire for greater freedom than the bench gives to do his part in the court of public opinion, through which he believes the settlement of economic questions for the future will come and not through the courts of law. In an article in the North American Review of last July, Judge Grosscup refers to the Anti-Trust law as "a weapon dismantled and abandoned," whereas only the other day Mr. Taft said it was "a valuable Government asset." We are "in a new age in which combinations and monopolies even are economic necessities," says the Judge. The thing to do is to "safeguard them as forms of investment," and "limit them in dividends allowed to be paid." This is legislative, not judicial work, and Judge Grosscup believes that as legislator or private citizen he will enjoy greater freedom to promote economic reform. Later Judge Grosscup announced that he will not send his resignation to President Taft until the threatened publication of charges and criticisms of his judicial career has been made and he has taken such action as he deems fit to vindicate himself.

Magazines by Fast Freight.—A saving to the government of fully $2,000,000 on the transmission of periodical mails by fast freight was reported by Postmaster General Hitchcock after a two weeks' trial of his method of shipment. The plan was put into effect on September 1. The Postmaster General says that the system is proving highly successful, and that the leading magazine publishers are cooperating with the department in a most commendable way in making the plan successful. The shipments by fast freight go chiefly from Buffalo and Pittsburgh, in the East, to Chicago, St. Paul, Omaha and Kansas City, in the West. There is a corresponding movement eastward when periodical matter is in sufficient bulk to make carload lots. West bound periodical matter originating in the East goes in storage cars on the regular mail trains as far as Buffalo or Pittsburgh, where it is transferred to fast freight trains. The trains run from Buffalo to Chicago in thirty-one hours and from Pittsburgh to Chicago in thirty hours. The time from Buffalo to St. Louis is thirty-five hours, and from Buffalo to Omaha about fifty hours.

Death of Senator Carter.—Thomas H. Carter, twice a Senator from the State of Montana and a prominent figure in national politics, died in Washington D. C., on September 17. His funeral took place at St. Paul's Church, the final absolution being given by the Most Rev. Diomed Falconio, Apostolic Delegate. In addition to the elective offices conferred upon him by the State of Montana, Mr. Carter had received important recognition in national politics, first by appointment as Commissioner of the General Land Office under President Harrison; later as Chairman of the Republican National Committee in the campaign of 1892. His latest recognition was by President Taft, who appointed him a member of the joint high commission on boundary waters between the United States and Canada; and his name has been frequently mentioned in connection with a Cabinet office in the present administration. Senator Carter was of Irish parentage and was born in Junior Branch, Scioto County, Ohio, in 1854.

Mexico.—On the plea that the elections will not be free, General Bernardo Reyes has withdrawn his name from the list of candidates for the presidency. Three political organizations opposed to Madero have formally petitioned the Congress to postpone the election because public tranquillity has not yet been restored. If Congress fails to adopt their suggestion, they will have an excuse to start another revolution in favor of "effective suffrage."

Argentina.—A delicate question has been proposed for settlement to the Minister of the Treasury. It is well known that Argentina claims the Falkland Islands as a part of its territory, although the British have held them for many years. A certain Martínez brought building stone in an Argentine ship from the Islands and petitioned to be freed from the payment of any duty, since the stone was simply transferred from one part of the republic to the other, although there is no Argentine official on the Islands. When requested to make a ruling, the Minister replied that he would settle each case as it came up.—The steamship companies who do business between Argentina and Europe have provoked a great deal of bitter comment by reducing their steerage rates from Buenos Aires to European ports to about a third of what they were. As the reduction was made when harvest hands were in demand to gather in exceptionally abundant crops, the Argentine press are advocating retaliatory measures on the part of the Government.

Paraguay.—In addition to the disorder resulting from a revolutionary crisis from which the country has not yet recovered, the bubonic plague has developed so alarmingly that the Council of Public Health has called upon Argentina for a supply of serum to combat it.—The expulsion of the partisans of Colonel Jara, who made himself President for a short time, has not restored complete public tranquillity.

Canada.—The Reciprocity Agreement was defeated in the General Election, and the Conservatives have a clear majority of about 50. Mr. Borden, therefore, succeeds Sir Wilfrid Laurier as Prime Minister. Ontario is almost wholly Conservative, and there were large gains in Quebec. The Prairie Provinces did not give the Agreement the support that was expected. The Maritime Provinces were more faithful to the Liberal cause, though even there the general movement was against the Government. Eight of the Ministers were defeated, among them being Messrs. Fielding and Patterson, the negotiators of the agreement. The Nationalists have but one member in the new Parliament.—The Bank of Montreal's office in New Westminster, B. C., has been robbed of over $250,000 by burglars, who blew the vault open with dynamite during the night. The clerk, who should have been sleeping in the building, was absent. The Chinese janitor, who entered it about 4 A. M., was seized and gagged. A police station was only a few yards away. The burglars entered the building apparently, shortly after midnight, and carried on their operations for nearly five hours, until just before dawn. They have disappeared, and at present the detectives have no clue.

Great Britain.—The Railway Commission does not give much hope of a permanent settlement of difficulties. The Union leaders seem opposed to agreements, conciliation boards, State or otherwise, to the providing for the rights of non-union men, to anything except their own absolute control of every dispute. Some of the men are of a different opinion, notably the engine-drivers and signalmen. But these, though the most important in the companies' employ, are also fewest in numbers; and so are outvoted by those more submissive to the leaders.—The boys of an elementary school at Llanelly, Wales, struck the other day because one of them had been punished, and paraded the streets, shouting and singing. A couple of days later the pupils of two other schools struck because the authorities had changed the hour of opening. A member of the school committee met the strikers in a friendly conference and persuaded them to return to their desks. In Liverpool the Edgehill children not only struck, but also paraded before the other schools, calling on the pupils to come out, beat severely some "blacklegs," i.e., children who refused to absent themselves, and broke windows and street lamps as they marched. They sent in to the school committee their demands: an extra half-holiday, the abolition of the cane, no school fees and a penny a week for monitors. The committee, more vigorous than that of Llanelly, broke up the strike.—At the Trades Union Congress, Newcastle, Mr. J. Sexton, of the Liverpool Dockers, made himself the centre of a disgraceful tumult. Standing on a bench and surrounded by a handful of sympathizers, he defied the chairman's order to sit down, as well as nearly the whole body of delegates, who drowned his words with hoots and yells. His language was not parliamentary. He called his adversaries "cowardly hounds." But one must not suppose he was an Anarchist attacking law and order. He was clamoring to be heard against a motion Mr. Will Thorne was trying to force through, without discussion, in favor of education, obligatory and purely secular. He gained his point, and told the Congress that Labor organizations and members of parliament, supported by the money of Catholics, had no right to use their influence against Catholic education. The resolution was carried however by a huge majority in the proportion of 6 to 1. From this one sees that the disgrace attaches, not to the brave man who refused to be shouted down, but to his opponents. All these things augur ill for the future of England.—In consequence of concessions made to the strikers, Atlantic freight rates are to be raised 10 per cent. The other companies will follow this example.

Ireland.—The Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants called a general strike on Irish Railways, September 21. Declared originally on the Great Southern and Western Railway, the strike has extended to the Midland and the Great Northern, thus affecting the three principal lines and greatly hampering trade. There had been numerous strikes for higher wages by industrial and factory workers, notably in Wexford, New Ross and Mountmellick. These resulted in "black-leg traffic" being imposed on the railways, which their employees refused to handle. There was sympathy with the industrial strikers, for their pay is much less than that of similar workers in England, and the manufacturers, helped by the general movement in favor of Irish-made articles, have made large profits. Conciliation boards have been appointed, and the Board of Trade is trying to effect an agreement with the railways; but the chief obstacle to a settlement is the insistence of the central Trades Union executive, an extern body, on interfering in local concerns. The Irish Railways are not popular, being often dubbed "nation-killing" bodies, and a recent Government Commission reported in favor of nationalizing them. The Dublin Leader, holding that unnecessarily low wages is an important cause of the worst of all strikes, emigration, does "not view with unmixed regret the present stirring up of labor in Ireland."—The list of the Intermediate Examination prizes and exhibitions shows the Catholic institutions in the lead as usual both in number and quality. The Christian Schools of Cork and Dublin, Rockwell College and Clongowes, head the boys' list, and the Loreto Convent, Balbriggan, and St. Louis Convent, Monaghan, the girls'.—The annual report of the Local Government Board testifies to the general efficiency of the County and Urban Councils in their administrative functions. In imposition and collection of rates, and discretion and economy of expenditure, their methods are pronounced businesslike and judicious.—Sir Robert Hart, the famous diplomat and administrator, who died last week after serving fifty years as Inspector-general of Chinese Customs, was born in Armagh and completed his education in Ireland. In spite of vast opportunities, no taint of corruption ever attached to "the little man with the Irish brogue." Two other distinguished Protestant Irishmen died recently, Captain Shaw-Taylor, who founded the Land Conference which resulted in the Wyndham Purchase Acts, and Dr. Alexander, Protestant primate of Armagh, to whose scholarship and kindness Cardinal Logue paid friendly tribute.

Italy.—The forty-first anniversary of the taking of Rome was celebrated by processions to the Porta Pia. Freemasons and Methodists were conspicuous in the parade. Mr. Tipple, who achieved notoriety in connection with the Roosevelt incident was in evidence. Mayor Nathan spoke, and, as usual, took occasion to insult the Church several times in the course of his remarks, though the press described his remarks as only "a passing reference." The Government refused permission to place an offensive commemorative tablet on a wall opposite the Vatican.—The eruptions of Etna still continue. The damage done to property is enormous.—The official reports announce that cholera is decreasing. From September 10 to 17, inclusive, there was a total of 1,007 cases, with 320 deaths. The epidemic has at last reached Sardinia. In Cagliari out of 54 cases there were 19 deaths.—It is reported that there was no liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius this year.—On September 22 a new terror fell upon the country. A furious storm swept over the country in the region of Mt. Vesuvius. The downpour of rain caused the rivers to rise as high as the second story of the houses and meantime great quantities of mud and stone swept down the sides of the mountain. How many people have been killed has not yet been ascertained.—The fleet consisting of four squadrons instead of entering winter quarters has been mobilized, and with the assent of England and France is to convey 20,000 or 30,000 soldiers to Tripoli. The movement is said to be due to the threatening attitude of the Turks. Many Italians are leaving the country.

France.—Negotiations between France and Germany continued during the week. A change of tone was noticed, the German papers being conciliatory and the French aggressive. The Daily Consular and Trade Reports inform us that in the division of the Morocco trade the percentage of Great Britain was 35, France 32 and Germany only 17. The markets of Morocco it is thought will soon exceed those of Algeria, of which the French control three-fourths.

Portugal.—Complaints of tampering with private correspondence are rife. Registered letters are regularly opened and then "officially sealed," as is done elsewhere when they have been opened by mistake.—The Chamber of Deputies has suspended its sessions until November 15.—It is stated by the administration that complete tranquillity reigns on the frontier and that all talk of a monarchistic invasion is idle.—As so few of the priests have accepted the pensions, it has been urged to oblige them by law to accept them as a civic duty.—The Archbishop-Bishop of Guarda has been overwhelmed with congratulatory messages on his protest to the Government.

Spain.—As far as dependence can be placed upon telegraphic reports subjected to strict censorship, the revolutionary uprising which threatened the gravest consequences has been checked, at least for a time. Eighty thousand troops were available for restoring order. The whole kingdom was placed under martial law.—In the town of Vendrell, cases supposed to be cholera were diagnosed as "contagious gastro-enteritis." The trouble seems to have been brought under control, thanks to rigid police regulations.

Germany.—A strike of the draymen at Düsseldorf developed into a pitched battle. The strikers had gathered in throngs at the places of their previous employment to prevent others from undertaking their work. When threats proved ineffective the strikers attacked the laborers, and a combat ensued in which many were injured by clubs, whips and other weapons. Hundreds of men participated, and many women were active in the very thick of the fight, encouraging the combatants or taking personal part in the battle.—In Moroccan affairs German optimism still prevails. It is hoped that the conferences will soon draw to a satisfactory conclusion. Some, however, are not satisfied with the tactics of the government. The feeling seems to be far more bitter against England than against France, since it is upon the former country that the burden of all the blame is laid by Germany.—Besides the annual maneuvers and Moroccan complications the versatile Kaiser has found time to deliver an address to students upon the advantages of the study of Greek as a cultural element in education. Sport, too, he declared, has its proper place, but a subordinate one, while he warned against the misuse of alcoholic drinks. Considerable comment, too, has been created by the honor bestowed by him upon the Spanish Ambassador at the German court, L. Polo de Bernabe, who received from his hands the great cross of the Order of the Red Eagle.

Riots in Austria.—On September 17 a monster demonstration was held at Vienna, in the open space before the town hall, to protest against the existing high prices of food and the consequent danger of a famine throughout the country. Socialist activity was conspicuous in the assembly, and successive agitators harangued the hundreds of thousands who were gathered there. Violent attacks were made in the speeches upon the government, and amid enormous excitement and cries of "Long live Portugal! Long live the Republic!" the crowd set forth upon its march. The wildest confusion followed. The police, who had shown considerable patience and restraint, were finally involved in the tumult and were forced to call upon the troops for help. This was adding fuel to the fire, and the cry arose: "Bread and not soldiers!" Benches were torn up, tables and furniture were piled together for barricades, wire was stretched across the streets that the horses of the cavalry might stumble and fall, windows were broken, buildings pillaged and cars upturned and set on fire in the pandemonium which ensued. A squadron of dragoons and a division of infantry finally dispersed the mob, which then resumed its destruction of property in the suburbs of the city. The Socialist party had aided the demonstration, but would not make itself accountable for the observance of order. When the tumult had changed into mob-rule the Socialist leader, David, strove to quiet the infuriated masses, but instead of obeying they leaped upon him and struck him to the ground, where he lay senseless and covered with his blood. At night the confusion reached its climax in the neighborhood of Ottakring, and one of the most serious conflicts took place at the Workingmen's House. The soldiers stationed there were bombarded with stones, but made no resistance until one of the officers was brought to the ground. The order to fire was then given, but the soldiers purposely aimed high. When, however, the bombardment went on without interruption, a volley was poured into the mob. One man was killed and a number lay wounded when the crowd dispersed. The entire list of wounded is eighty-nine. Among those who were seriously injured are four soldiers and twenty of the police. On the following day all was comparatively quiet, and large detachments of troops were parading the streets. Measures are being taken by the Emperor and the government to lower the tariff and reduce the price of food.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The "Irish" Players and Playwrights

"The Irish Players are coming to town" was the refrain of countless newspaper notices heralding the advent of W. B. Yeats, Lady Gregory and Co. to our shores to exploit for us their grand discovery of a drama in which for the first time the weird, mysterious, mystic "Irish note" is duly set and perfectly attuned with all proper accompaniments. We have not heard much of them since their arrival, but a dozen English magazines to hand insinuate in rhapsodies, written by Mr. Yeats and his British friends, that the great Irish Players and playwrights are the only true interpreters of the Gaelic mind since its natural outpouring was checked or dammed by St. Patrick on Tara's Hill. Ossian is dead, but we are given to understand that that calamity has been greatly relieved since Mr. Yeats got possession of his harp. Lady Gregory has improved on the authors of the Cuchullin cycle—has not Mr. Yeats pronounced her "Cuchulain" "the best book that has come out of Ireland," and Bernard Shaw placed her as a dramatist on a level with himself?—and as for the incomparable J. M. Synge, even pagan Ireland and Tirnanoge were unable to furnish a prototype for him. All this feverish advertising and industrious log-rolling has secured them readers, or at least given circulation to their volumes, but apparently has failed to furnish them with appreciative hearers. Ireland for the first time has stoned her prophets. They were driven out of Dublin, the only Irish city where they exhibited their wares. They were received with noisy rapture by a certain class in England, not, however, on their dramatic merits, but because, at a time when the Irish question was the bone of political contention, their representation of Irish character suited the tastes of anti-Irish partizans. Here they will have to stand or fall on their merits, and, judging by their experience to date, the latter is more likely.

Their claim to have initiated the Gaelic literary revival and be its chiefest flower is supported neither by the history of the movement nor by the intrinsic worth of their productions. Half a century ago O'Curry, in his "Manuscript Materials of Irish History" and "Manners and Customs of the Ancient Irish," and O'Donovan in his annotated translations of The Four Masters, the Brehon Code and numerous martyrologies, poems and other religious and secular MSS., afforded the literary world a glimpse into the riches of Gaelic literature. Their monumental works gave to the Gaelic movement both the foundation and the impetus. Their labors were continued in the translations and critical studies of Stokes, O'Daly, Atkinson, Hennessy, Father B. McCarthy, S. H. O'Grady, Fathers O'Carrol, Murphy and Hogan of the Society of Jesus, and such foreign scholars as Zeuss, Ebel, de Jubainville and Windisch, while the more romantic episodes and legends of ancient Ireland, pagan and Christian, were rendered into English verse by Sir Samuel Ferguson, D. F. McCarthy, Aubrey de Vere, T. D. Sullivan, Dr. George Sigerson, Dr. R. D. Joyce and Mrs. Hutton, and popularized in prose by Dr. P. W. Joyce, Standish O'Grady and a growing number of delvers in Gaelic literature. From their labors sprang the movement to restore Gaelic as the spoken and written language of the people, which took practical shape in 1893, when Father O'Growney, Gaelic professor at Maynooth, Dr. Douglas Hyde and John MacNeil founded the Gaelic League.

Pamphlets, magazines, newspapers, translations from other tongues and original works in every department of literature began to be written in Gaelic. Gaelic organizers and teachers traversed the land, reviving not only the language, but the song, music, industries and traditional customs of the people; Gaelic summer schools and colleges were established wherever the native language flourished, and many of the existing colleges were Gaelicized. Aided and blessed by bishops and clergy, Gaelic gradually forced its way into the primary and intermediate schools and the universities; a purely Gaelic magazine was founded at Maynooth, which is now the literary outlet of its students, and the National Ecclesiastical College has become the chief centre of Gaelic propaganda. Meanwhile a long list of writers (among whom may be mentioned such priests as Canon O'Leary, Fathers Dinneen, Henebry, Hogan, S.J., Mac Erlean, S.J., O'Kelly, Sheehan, O'Reilly and Hayden, S.J.) have been editing texts, preparing dictionaries, grammars and text-books, writing plays, poems, stories, essays and miscellaneous works and translating the classics into Gaelic, while Gaelic thought was gradually infusing the organs published in English, nearly all of which are vigorously supporting the movement. This is a summary of the Gaelic Revival; the story of what it has in it that is vigorous and genuine will not record the name of W. B. Yeats or of J. M. Synge.

Ever on the search for a new sensation that would stimulate jaded palates, Mr. Yeats had been flirting for some time with Irish legend when the Gaelic League, under the presidency of Douglas Hyde, and fanned into vigorous life by the strong and sane propaganda of its still stoutest and ablest organ, the Leader, had become a power in the land. Keen to take advantage of every wind that puffed his poetic sails, Yeats began to write so voluminously of the "Gaelic Note," the spiritistic, idealistic, other-world, etc., idea—chiefly in non-Irish organs—that people outside of Ireland came to think he had it patented. His poetry, mystically pagan and pretty in technique, did not ruffle public feeling—the few who have had patience to give it time and thought deserve to be believed when they say they understand it—but when under Gaelic auspices he inaugurated the National Literary Theatre, in collaboration with the unspeakable George Moore, he almost succeeded in wrecking the movement. His "The Last Rose," containing, among other objectionable stories, "The Crucifixion of the Outcast," in which Irish monks, commanded by their abbot, religiously crucify their troublesome visitor, did not commend him as a leader of Irish thought. Ireland's escutcheon had been void so far of the bar sinister of persecution, but Mr. Yeats' poetic cauldron was able to supply it. Neither did "Countess Kathleen"—a German legend whose heroine, transplanted to Ireland, proved her altruism by selling her soul to the devil—nor "Where There Is Nothing"—an attempt, after the manner of Ibsen's "Ghosts," to extinguish law, order, Church and morality—enhance his authority as an interpreter of Irish sentiment. The "Pot of Broth" is an unobjectionable trifle, and "The Hour Glass" and "Cathleen Ni Houlihan" are elevated in style and thought, and worthy of better antecedents, but whether they were the true expression of his mind or were merely a politic adaptation to the national temper of the moment can be judged from the words of his preface, written at that period, to Lady Gregory's "Cuchulain": "If we but tell these stories [of pagan Ireland] to our children, the land will begin again to be a holy land, as it was before men began to give their hearts to Greece and Rome and Judea."

So far the Dublin folk were tolerant, though not appreciative. Douglas Hyde and others wrote plays in Gaelic and English which had much success in the capital and through the provinces, but in spite of the benevolence of an English lady who financed his theatre, Mr. Yeats' venture drooped until he brought on the scene his pièce de résistance, J. M. Synge. So much has been written of this wonderful dramatist, the incarnation of all Irish wit and wisdom, that it may be well to give an account of him. A Trinity College graduate of literary tastes, he went to the Paris Latin Quarter to develop them. There he made a study of the decadent French writers, particularly Baudelaire, and having failed to accomplish anything remarkable under such tutelage, he betook him, by advice of Yeats, to the Arran Isles to exploit the ideas he had imbibed in a new and sensational setting. The device of using the pure and simple peasantry of Arran as a framework for the denizens of the Quartier Latin was sufficiently startling, and quite Baudelairean. Baudelaire would try to astonish folk by opening a conversation with such a phrase as, "After assassinating my poor father this morning," and Synge told how he appeared once in green hair, and grew angry when advised to try sky-blue if he would startle folk. The disciple improved on the master. Synge sky-blued the Connacht peasants and made his best known hero heroic solely by having him kill his poor father.

The design and substance of his plays are of the Gallic decadence. "The Riders to the Sea," perhaps the least objectionable, is Loti's "Pêcheurs d'Islande" set down on the Irish coast. The root idea of "Well of the Saint" is in a play of Clemenceau's. "The Shadow of the Glen" fable may be found in Voltaire's "Zadig."

and the notorious "Playboy of the Western World" is a dramatization of the freak of Baudelaire. Nor is the form and tone less foreign than the substance. His account of his tours in Wicklow, Kerry and Arran reveals his lack of understanding of the people's mind and his ingrained antipathy to their Catholic ways and customs. He is an alien studying curious specimens, and a superior person, to whom the natives are interesting savages and good material for his art; whether they are injured in the process is not of consequence.

He could pick up phrases, but interlarded and distorted them with words, sayings and ideas that are foreign to the Irish peasant. In all his plays ugly sneers at the people's morals and religious practices are frequent, but in "The Playboy" his anti-Catholic animosity is openly revealed. All the characters, with the exception of one, a weakling, glorify a peasant who "had the daring" to kill his father, and who boasts of it, and the women are vying to gain the favor of this hero while the men are getting drunk at a wake. There is frequent and blasphemous reference to God and the Blessed Virgin and the saints; not one of the characters reveals a single good quality, and their only moral motive is "fear of Father Reilly." The language and details are too disgusting for citation.

This is the production which, having been banned in Dublin, was hawked around England by "the Irish Players" for the delectation of those who wished to see Irishmen shown unfit for self-government. They are producing it here under the auspices of Liebler and Co. Lady Gregory says she has some sympathy with those who condemn it, but none "with those who, armed with trumpets, prevented others from hearing it." We quite agree; trumpeting implies the purchase of a ticket. Nor would Lady Gregory's Ibsenistic comedies justify the expenditure; she Ibsenized even Brian Boru in "Kincora." The trio are very much Maeterlincked, Baudelaired and Ibsenized, but Gaelicized not at all. Decent people had better let them alone—to meet the fate which inevitably results from incurable disease.

M. KENNY, S.J.

The Age for First Communion

The decree "Quam Singulari" is the expression of Christ's love for His little ones. It is the children's charter of their spiritual emancipation. It not merely proclaims their right to an early but likewise to a frequent and daily reception of their Eucharistic Lord, their Christ, their Brother, their inheritance, their own by right inalienable from the first breaking dawn of reason.

Time was when the children, like Samuel in the temple, heard the voice of the Lord calling upon them. It was the voice from the sanctuary, and they knew who it was that called them and what His longings were to come to the little ones who were so dear to Him. Perplexed, they arose in the darkness and cried out to Him: "Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth!" Their prayers at length were heard. He has spoken and we know His will. There is no mystery and no doubt, except such as we ourselves may wish to create. "Now, therefore, hearken thou unto the voice of the Lord."

No legal document could be more clear than the decree "Quam Singulari." "The age of discretion, alike for Confession and for Holy Communion, is the age at which the child begins to use its reason, that is, about the seventh year, or later, or even sooner." It is not the full use of reason that is required, as the decree carefully tells us, "since the incipient use is enough; that is, a certain use of reason." So, too, it continues, a full and perfect knowledge of Christian doctrine is not necessary for First Confession, nor for First Communion. There are still, normally, seven full years of parochial school teaching after the first Holy Communion, during which the child can acquire all this. For the present a knowledge of the elements necessary for salvation will suffice and the power to distinguish the Holy Eucharist from material bread (Art. III).

* In case of a prudent doubt whether the child has attained sufficient discretion there can be no reason for scrupulosity. On the one hand, no obligation exists on the part of parent or confessor to insist upon the Communion, while on the other the priest is perfectly free to administer it if he wishes, according to the principle "in dubiis favores sunt ampliandi et odia restringenda." When, however, the seventh year has been reached the presumption is clearly in favor of the child. Such is the argumentation of the great canonist and moral theologian, Father Juan B. Ferreres, S.J.

Acting thus generously and zealously upon an indication of the existence of the use of reason in the child, there can be no possibility of any irreverence to the Blessed Sacrament on our part. For even should the child not have attained sufficient discretion, there has most certainly taken place an increase of grace in its soul, while to the Sacred Heart of the Master there has been given a new thrill of joy in the love that went out from It to the fortunate little one.

If such language seem strange in our time it is none the less most absolutely true. While Holy Communion is not a necessity before the age of reason, yet it is a spiritual favor which we know was for centuries granted in the Church to even the youngest of the children, and which with each reception increases in their souls the gift of sanctifying grace. Around this custom grew up in the early Church some of her most beautiful practices. Children were to come to the Holy Table immediately after the clerics. As the favorites of God's love, they were given the privilege of consuming the consecrated particles left over after the Sacred Banquet. According to a certain rite, the priest was even ordered to dip his finger into the consecrated chalice and purple with the Precious Blood the mouth of the infant and suckling brought to the Table of the Lord.

All fear of irreverence is founded only upon a misconception of the spiritual dignity of childhood. Could we but see with the vision of faith the soul of that infant newly baptized, what wonders of the spirit would be disclosed before our eyes? How it would outshine in splendor the highest seraphs at the throne of God viewed merely in their natural gifts and not in the transcendent brightness of that grace which is their crowning glory, yet which the child at its mother's breast possesses in common with them. It is the garden immaculate of the Mother of God. It is the palace of gold where the Trinity loveth to dwell. It is the temple built without hands which the Spirit of God has made for Himself. It is the bride arrayed in garments of white, adorned with the jewels and pendants of love. What lips, indeed, more sweet and pure to be kissed by the consecrated Host as the Lover of childhood comes to that heart?

These are feeble words, indeed. They halt and stammer as they strive in vain to tell the beauty of that soul in the state of grace. They are not meant to anticipate the time appointed by the Holy Father and by the will of heaven for the First Communion; but they should help us to despise those lurking fears which make us doubt whether the child of six or seven can be fit to receive the Lord.

"Over and over again," says a missionary of the widest experience, whose special predilection, like that of Our Lord, has always been for the little ones, "I have taken boys and girls at the age of seven to the confessional, showed them one by one how to enter and kneel down and ask for the priest's blessing and make their confession. Afterwards I have heard their confession, and I am sure that I have not in my life denied absolution to two dozen such children." What holds true of confession, he argues—and the Church has solemnly confirmed this reasoning—holds true no less of Holy Communion.

So, again, in an average parish, where the priest had most carefully examined all the children, only six were found towards the end of the year who had not received their First Communion, and these had only been delayed for a time because of extraordinary circumstances. Here let me add that to facilitate the work of the pastor, the Sister in charge of the lowest grade—which hereafter will be normally the First Communion grade—should be chosen for her tact, her knowledge of the spiritual life and of the souls of children. So even those who are slow of intellect and whose Communion would have to be postponed beyond the seventh year, will often unfold so as sufficiently to understand, though they may not be able to recite by rote, the few elementary truths which are required to be known.

Here let me point with all sincerity to the noble document on the decree "Quam Singulari" drawn up by the Bishops of the Province of Cincinnati, with its nine episcopal signatures. We do not hesitate to call it one of the noblest achievements of the American hierarchy and one of the most glorious monuments of the loyalty of the American Church to the Vicar of Christ.

By this splendid document, the thousand fears of timid souls, their dread of possible irreverence, their vain consternation about the Catholic schools, are all swept aside with a noble dignity: "The Pope, on account of his position as Vicar of Christ and Head of the Church, guided by the Holy Spirit, can best determine what is expedient for the welfare of souls. It behooves all to comply with what the Holy Father prescribes in the Decree."

There are here no talmudic glosses to confuse the text, no such explanations as that of a learned doctor in Israel, fortunately living on the other side of the great waters, who instructs us that by the seventh year the Pope in reality meant "the tenth, or later, or even sooner." The first protestants revealed themselves when the promise of the Eucharist was given. "How," they exclaimed, "can this man give us of His flesh to eat?" The words were so clear that they could not misunderstand them, and they were honest enough to acknowledge their true meaning, though they walked no more with Him. Let us, too, acknowledge the full force of the decree, but follow it out to the letter as the word of God that is spoken for the regeneration of the world.

To secure the certain attendance of all Catholic children at the parochial schools, the pastoral letter already quoted shows the impropriety of punishing the child for the sin of its parents, and punishing it with the greatest of all punishments possible here upon earth, with the deprivation of Holy Communion. "It is plain," says the letter, "that as Christian instruction cannot be thoroughly and systematically imparted except as an integral part of the school curriculum, parents delinquent in this most important obligation of Catholic discipline burden their conscience with grievous sin." Wherefore it is most prudently directed that "in future no confessor having faculties in the Province absolve parents who require their sons and daughters to attend non-Catholic schools, unless such parents when going to confession promise that they will send their children to a Catholic school at the time to be fixed by the confessor, or agree that they will abide by the decision of the Bishop after the case has been referred to him." This is true charity in the spirit of Christ.

The legislation, therefore, of the Council of Trent has been authoritatively interpreted for us: "If any one denieth that all and each of Christ's faithful of both sexes are bound, when they have attained the years of discretion, to communicate every year, at least at Easter, in accordance with the precepts of Holy Mother Church, let him be anathema."

The sun of love is shining forth. The ice of centuries indifference, error and fear is melting away. The spring already is blossoming in the valleys and all the earth is filled with the sweetness thereof. The Bridegroom behind the lattice of the lonely Tabernacle has waited patiently and long, but His Heart can no longer be restrained and His voice is heard throughout the land: "Arise, make haste, my love, my dove, my beautiful one, and come. For the winter is now past, the rain is over and gone. The flowers have appeared in the land."

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Governor Dongan

That was indeed a kingly gift which Charles II bestowed upon his brother, James, Duke of York, Duke of Albany, etc., when he granted to him "all ye land from the West Side of Connecticut River to ye East side of Delaware Bay," not to mention a good slice of Maine, together with Long Island, "Martyn Vyniards and Nantukes otherwise Nantukett," and with them "all ye lands islands soyles rivers harbours mines mineralls quarries woods marshes waters lakes fishings, hauking hunting and fowling, and all other royalties and profitts comôdityes & hereditaments to ye severall islands and premisses belonging and apperteyneing."

The good opinion that James, Duke of York, had conceived of "the integrity prudence ability and fitness of Coll. Thomas Dongan" moved him to commission him his Lieutenant and Governor "within the lands and places aforesaid," as the duke attested under his hand and seal at St. James's, the 30th day of September, 1682. The commission was followed shortly after by a series of instructions for the new governor's guidance. He was to order an election for members of a General Assembly, who should have free liberty to consult and debate among themselves all matters apprehended proper to be established for laws for the good government of the colony; he was to take care that drunkenness, debauchery, swearing and blasphemy should be discountenanced and punished; and that none should be admitted to public office and trust whose ill-fame and conversation might bring scandal thereupon. "And I doe hereby require and comand you," continues the paper, "yt noe mans life, member, freehold, or goods, be taken away or harmed but by established and knowne laws."

The exercise of authority was no novelty to Colonel Dongan, for he had been recently relieved of the command of Tangier, on the coast of Morocco. Tangier had been in the possession of the Portuguese for two centuries when King Charles II went a-wooing. On a sudden, when it was all but certain that he would espouse a Spanish princess, Charles turned to Portugal, where the virtuous and amiable Catherine of Bragança, sister of King Affonso VI, captivated him, much to the disgust of his ministers. They were partially reconciled, however, by the handsome dower that the king's bride brought. This included two and one-half million dollars in coin, Bombay in India, and Tangier in Africa, where Colonel Dongan had successfully represented the royal authority.

Born in County Kildare, Ireland, in 1634, young Dongan, like so many other Irishmen devoted to the Stuart cause, passed over to France after the decapitation of Charles I in 1649 and entered the service of Louis XIV. In those strenuous days, when warring armies were almost always in motion, the young refugee had ample opportunity to learn the ways of the world, and to drink in those lessons of public policy which he was afterward to turn to so good account. It is likely that while thus engaged he made the acquaintance of the Duke of York. He had reached the rank of colonel, and was on the high road to further preferment when he resigned, in 1678, and returned to England.

On Saturday, August 25, 1683, Governor Dongan and his suite entered New York City. To one who had been familiar for so many years with the castles, strong places and walled cities of France, the scene that met his gaze must have appeared poor and wretched in the extreme, for the town had little to brag of in the way of architectural adornment or of protection against a hostile force. But there was much heartiness in the reception which was given to him by the strange and motley population. Englishmen, Frenchmen, Dutchmen, skin-draped Indians from the interior, and black slaves from distant Africa or the plantations of the West Indies lined the streets and shouted a noisy welcome.

The Dutch authorities had not granted any measure of self-government to the colonists, whose weal or woe was dependent upon the Governor and his council, and in the selection of these worthies the people in general had had no voice. But certain New Englanders had crossed the Sound and established themselves on Long Island, where several thriving villages had sprung up. The Dutch governors had permitted them to manage their own affairs to a limited extent, for they held their town meetings, chose their local officials, and carried on their affairs much as if they were under the British flag. The Dutch settlers had no town meetings and no elections; they were governed by a close corporation, which was empowered to fill vacancies as they occurred and to elect its new members. This was not popular government. The spirit of the Long Island colonists, however, had made an impression on the worthy Dutch burghers, who had begun to clamor for a greater share in public affairs than mere tax-paying gave them. When, therefore, Governor Dongan announced an election for members of a General Assembly the news was received with ringing of bells and firing of cannon and general jubilation.

Among Dongan's early appointments connected with the due administration of the government were those of Major Anthony Brockholls to catalogue the records of the city and province, and of Jacob Leisler, a thrifty trader, to be a commissioner of the Court of Admiralty.

The long-heralded General Assembly met on October

17, 1683. One of its first enactments was a Charter of Liberties and Privileges, which the governor signed and caused to be proclaimed with due solemnity on the last day of the same month at the city hall. As Duke of York, James signed and sealed the charter, but did not send it back to America. After his succession to the throne on the death of his brother, Charles II, he submitted the document to an examining board, whose comments on some of its provisions were cautious, and at times unfavorable. In claiming the right of Habeas Corpus the examiners objected that it claimed what was not granted to any of His Majesty's plantations. In fixing a meeting of the General Assembly every three years or oftener, they remarked that this was an obligation upon the government greater than had ever been agreed to in any other plantation. They also thought it might be "inconvenient" to permit the Assembly, with the consent of the governor, to judge of undue elections and to expel any member as they should see occasion. The section declaring "that all Christians shall enjoy Liberty of Conscience, so they do not disturb the peace," he it said to the examiners' credit, met with no strictures.

But what James, Duke of York, had signed and sealed, King James II, far from delivering, "repealed, determined and made void," as he stated very explicitly in his instructions to Dongan under date of May 29, 1686, in which he directed the levying of "Dutys & Impositions" with no consent from elected representatives of the people. He would have only appointive officers in his crown colony, as is the case to-day in some British crown colonies. In Art. 42 of his instructions, however, he amplified the Charter provisions regarding freedom of worship; for, instead of limiting it to Christians, as it stood in the Charter, he extended it to "all persons of what religion soever, without giving them any disturbance or disquiet whatsoever, Provided they give noe disturbance to ye publick peace, nor doe molest or disquiet others in ye free exercise of their religion." James's heart was right; his error consisted in fancying that he was a Tudor early in the 16th century, whereas he was a Stuart at the end of the 17th century. The instructions of King William of Orange to Governor Sloughter of New York permitted liberty of conscience to all persons "except Papists."

Governor Dongan had brought out as his chaplain a certain Father Harvey, a member, as Jacob Leisler expressed it, of "that hellish brute of Jesuites," who, in addition to his priestly labors, set up a school, which was attended by the sons of some of the principal citizens. Anxious to promote so commendable an undertaking, the governor solicited permission to make over for its up-keep a property known as the Duke's farm, but James demurred. His daughter, Queen Anne, presented it to Trinity (Protestant Episcopal) Church, in 1705. Bounded by the latter-day Fulton Street, Broadway, Warren Street and North River, it laid the foundation of the wealth of the richest church corporation in the United States.

Before he had been a year in office, Dongan received from the town of Hempstead, L. I., a gift of two hundred acres of land, which was soon increased by an additional two hundred. He also came into the possession of a princely domain on Staten Island, from which, however, he received no personal gain, for he mortgaged it to meet the expenses of the government. His original instructions having contemplated a charter for the city, he granted on April 27, 1686, a very liberal instrument, which long served as the foundation of the city's rights and obligations.

Besides contending successfully with Connecticut and the Jerseys, and even with the amiable William Penn, for the integrity of his territory, Dongan strove with equal good fortune against the encroachments of the French on the north. It was in this last undertaking that he sacrificed his private means when the treasury of the colony could not supply the funds for a demonstration against the Governors of Canada, who, not less in earnest than himself in promoting the interests of their country, were eager to establish a claim to the greater part of New York.

King James anticipated by a hundred years a union of the colonies under a central government, but he would effect that union by an exercise of his royal prerogative. He failed. The stern logic of union or destruction was all that could combine those conflicting elements. In attempting to carry out his plan, James directed Dongan to turn over his office to Andros and to return to England, where he might expect "marks of Royall favour," etc.

Dongan retired from office on August 11, 1686, and betook himself to his Hempstead farm. There he might have grown old had not the advent of William and Mary and the dictatorship of Jacob Leisler made life unbearable. It would be a profitless task to inquire into Leisler's sincerity, for it may well be granted; but his wild fanaticism against the Church and Catholics in general no man is able to justify. The first attempt of the son to clear his father's memory before Queen Mary resulted in a decision that "the deceased was condemned and has suffered according to law." Some years later a second attempt was successful.

While quietly busied about his home affairs, Dongan got word that Leisler had issued a general warrant for the arrest of all "Papists," and for keeping the former governor under guard in his own house; but, thanks to the timely notice, he slipped away to Jersey, from where he took ship for Boston. After a short stay in that city he returned to Europe, where, owing to the death of his brother William, he succeeded to the title of Earl of Limerick in 1698. He died in London in 1715.

His efforts in behalf of the welfare of the people are known to few. The charter which he granted to the city is still preserved, a venerable relic of days long past, and jealously guarded. It is eminently just and proper that some thought of him should be brought to the minds of those thousands who hurry along the streets of the city which he dedicated to representative government. The tablet to be placed on St. Peter's Church by the Knights of Columbus will make brighter the memory of the gallant Irish Catholic governor who so ruled as to win for himself the name of one of the best, if not unqualifiedly the best, that governed in colonial America. For reasons that need not be dwelt upon, the important part played by Catholics in laying the foundations of our present civil and political well-being has remained unknown or ignored. All the more to the credit of the Knights of Columbus is it that they rescue from oblivion their forbears in the Faith and thus remind those of the thoughtless present of the religion and patriotism of men who were truly great because they were consistent Catholics at a time when the fickle breeze of popular favor was against them.

Dr. Thomas Dwight

Dr. Thomas Dwight was born in Boston, October 13, 1843, and was the son of Thomas Dwight, a member of an old New England family. His mother was Mary Collins (Warren) Dwight, granddaughter of John Warren, a brother of General Warren, who was killed in the battle of Bunker Hill. He, with his first cousin, Dr. John Collins Warren, represented the third generation in direct descent of an illustrious line of Boston physicians. His mother became a convert to the Catholic Faith when he was a lad of thirteen years of age, and he was received into the Church at that time.

The education of Dr. Dwight was in private schools in Boston, and though he was never graduated from Harvard, having been a student there only two years, the degree of A.M. was bestowed upon him later by the University. After graduating from Harvard Medical School in 1867, he studied for two years under eminent specialists in Europe, and established himself on his return as a practising physician. During 1872 and 1873 he was instructor in comparative anatomy at Harvard, and from 1872 to 1876 was lecturer and professor of anatomy at Bowdoin College. From 1874 to 1876 he was instructor in histology at Harvard, and upon the death of Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes he succeeded him as Parkman Professor of Anatomy at Harvard Medical School.

Although admirably equipped for the practice of medicine, Dr. Dwight in the very early part of his career showed such exceptional interest in the scientific side of his chosen profession that soon the work of the practising physician was laid aside that he might devote his splendid talents to scientific research and his work as a teacher. For five years he was editor of the Boston Medical Journal. In 1884 he gave a course of lectures at the Lowell Institute in Boston on "The Mechanism of the Bone and Muscle," and he was a constant contributor to medical and scientific journals until the time of his death. In 1889 the degree of LL.D. was given to him by Georgetown University.

If genius can be defined as the ability to take infinite pains, it describes Dr. Dwight; for his untiring industry and enthusiastic love of his subject, added to his superior natural endowment, soon started him on the path in which his reputation became an international one, and placed him among the foremost human anatomists of the day. He was perpetually pushing his investigations beyond the limits of his own specialty, but, as it has been said of him, "his modesty could never allow him to claim distinction outside the domain of human anatomy."

During the seventies and eighties, Dr. Dwight served on several boards of public and pauper institutions of Boston, and from 1889 to 1908 he was a trustee of the Boston Public Library. The library was closed out of respect to his memory throughout the morning of the day of his funeral.

Dr. Dwight was a past President of the Association of American Anatomists, a member of the American Society of Naturalists, a fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and a member of the St. Thomas Aquinas Academy of Philosophy and Medicine of Rome.

The world knew Thomas Dwight as the distinguished scientist and teacher. Boston also had good reason to be proud of him as a faithful public servant. These services alone would make more than an ordinarily creditable record for one human life. Yet there is another phase of his character—his life as a Catholic.

It is interesting to note in connection with Pasteur's words as to his own firm faith that Dr. Dwight stated to his son, less than two years ago, that he had never suffered any temptations against faith. There is no reason to think that there is any other record for these last months of his life. His faith had the simplicity and straightforwardness of that of a child, and as a most loyal son of the Church he never swerved in his hearty submission to her decrees. If the Church spoke, that sufficed for him. It was no commonplace Catholic life that could have ever satisfied that loyal Catholic soul, and he lived what he professed. The same signal ability, the same earnestness of purpose, the same enthusiasm shown in so many other ways, had in his Catholic work that ineffable something more added which only the supernatural motive could give. He most truly sanctified his talents in his work for the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, of which he was for many years a prominent and devoted member, and at the time of his death still held the position of President of the General Council. His work for the society was wholly in the spirit of the founder—holding the conviction that the good done to the soul of the man privileged to be a worker was far greater than that of the recipient of the charity.

Beyond the circle of his immediate family Dr. Dwight's social environment was largely Protestant. Thorough in this as in everything, he was thoroughly grounded in his faith, and while never intruding it in any unseemly fashion, he was always ready as the outspoken champion of his faith. Having the courage of his convictions, there was never any smoothing away of corners to flatter the sensibilities of any listener—and "I would rather be thought a bigot than to be lax" was a characteristic remark of his. On one occasion a newspaper, intending to be complimentary, spoke of Dr. Dwight as a "Liberal Catholic." He replied at once that he knew of nothing that he had ever done which could make such an epithet justifiable.

The service for which Thomas Dwight should be most gratefully remembered is his championship of this truth—that there cannot be any clash between science and religion. Admirably trained as he was as one of the foremost scientists of the day, the world could not refuse him a respectful hearing, so that it was a powerful plea for true religion, when this noteworthy anatomist proclaimed himself no less firmly convinced of supernatural truth as taught by the Catholic Church. Until the time of his death he fought the good fight, waging unrelenting war on the pseudo-scientists like Haeckel and his kind, bringing out all the forces of reason and logic against the extremists of the evolution theory, which would involve belief in the evolution of everything from matter.

This uncompromising spirit in the cause of truth—this keen insight which went to the root of things at once, making him quick to prick any bubble of untruth—probably explains why Dr. Dwight was sometimes spoken of as brusque in manners. A reserved man he was, but with a fund of geniality, and though quick in speech at times, it was not from ill temper; while a far more marked characteristic of him was a gracious urbanity which had much of an old-time flavor about it. He had hosts of friends, and it was said of him that "he never failed a friend." In his family relationships he was unfailing in his devotion.

There could be no finer summing up of such a life as that of Dr. Dwight's than the record of the last two years. Just two years ago he knew that he was attacked by a fatal disease. He accepted it, not only with calmness and courage, but with abundant cheerfulness, and wished that no secret should be made about it. He kept on with all the work for which his strength sufficed, and he often said that his health was so much more than it was reasonable to expect that it must be supernatural—a direct answer to prayers. He was an object lesson to all, and called forth admiration from Protestants as well as Catholics, some of the former saying that if the Catholic religion could make a man and all his family receive affliction in such a spirit it was a faith that all must reverence. Though failing all summer, at times he could rally enough to say: "I think there is a fighting chance that I may give my lectures again next winter." Those he gave last winter were up to his highest average. But those near him knew that there was "no fighting chance" left for him in this world. The whole community at Nahant was "as one family," it was said, as this truly consecrated life was ebbing away; and when the last breath was drawn human ears could almost hear the "Well done, good and faithful servant," which must have greeted Thomas Dwight on the other shore.

Freemasonry and the French Revolution

In a review of a recent work by Una Birch on "Secret Societies and the French Revolution," the editor of the American Freemason notes that there are two views with regard to the connection of Freemasonry with the terrible upheaval, "which rises before the mind huge and grotesque yet sublimely appalling because of the passions loosened and the elemental forces that had free sweep for destruction."

It was not Freemasonry pure and simple, the writer tells us, that brought about the Revolution, but it was because "Freemasonry dared to give asylum to ideas which Popes branded as heretical and rulers declared to be treasonable." Among others the system of "Illuminism was welcomed to the lodges of France as supplying a needed flux, and giving unity and definiteness of purpose to what had before been a disorganized and heterogeneous collection of Rites." It is true that all of these lodges with special rites disappeared in the early months of 1789, although they had shown "increased membership and greater activity during the years that preceded the Revolution;" but as "the prerevolutionary lodges had been the secret conventicles of independent thought," Masonry had made the ideas of these societies its own, for

"Revolution is always the result of associative agitation, and in this instance the principal force in the trinity of Masonry, mysticism and magic, was Masonry. From the Swedenborgian stronghold of Avignon, from Martinist Lyons, from Narbonne, from Munich, and from many another citadel of freedom, there flashed on the grey night of feudalism, unseen but to the initiates, the watchfires of a great hope tended by those priests of progress who, though unable to lift the veil that shrouds the destiny of man and the end of the world, by their faith, were empowered to dedicate the future to the Unknown God.

"At the great Revolution the doctrines of the lodges were at last translated from the silent world of secrecy to the common world of practice; a few months sufficed to depose ecclesiasticism from its pedestal and monarchy from its throne. The half-mystical phantasies of the lodges became the habits of life. The Phrygian cap of the 'Illuminate' became the headgear of the populace; Liberty, Equality, Fraternity instead of merely adorning the meeting places of Masonic bodies was stencilled on all the public buildings of France, and the red banner which had symbolized universal love within the lodges was carried by the ragged battalions of the people on errands of pillage and destruction. The great subversive work had been silently and ruthlessly accomplished in the face of Popes and kings; the mine had been dug under altar and throne."

All this is from the American Freemason of September, 1911. It is an open confession that Freemasonry is of its own nature opposed to Christianity, that it is, or was, allied with "mysticism and magic," and that it "dedicates its future," not to Christ, but to "the Unknown God." Secondly, it boasts of being not a conservative social or political force, for it claims as its especial glory that it undermined, not only the Altar, but the Throne, and that its "red banner" was carried by the ragged battalions of the people on errands of pillage and destruction. Finally, if Freemasonry did, as this writer claims, bring about the terrible French Revolution, it will be impossible for American Freemasons to dissociate themselves from their brethren of France, Italy, Spain and Portugal, who never weary telling the world that their whole purpose in political, social and religious life is to continue the work of the Revolution of 1789.

A New Plan for the Retreat Movement

TORTOSA, SPAIN, Sept. 10, 1911.

The Retreat Movement as a factor in Catholic social work is not new to the readers of AMERICA. The permanent spiritual results produced by the Exercises of St. Ignatius among all classes of men in Belgium have proved the power of this important work as an efficacious remedy against the evils of our times. The Retreat Movement as now being enthusiastically carried on in New York shows clearly that like fruits may be expected in the United States. A new plan for the Retreat Movement, and successful in Spain, may be suggestive to those in English-speaking countries.

That in Spain great interest should be taken in the work of giving the spiritual exercises to men is to be expected. The love of Ignatius is still strong in the land. Hence, it is natural that we should find successful centres or houses of retreats in Loyola, Manresa, Durango, Sarria and Valencia, with fervent sodalities in large centres laboring zealously in advancing the good work, by collecting alms for railroad fares or expenses of poor workingmen, or arranging dates and lists of men for retreats.

The Retreat Section of the Men's Sodality in Barcelona sent during the past year eighteen groups of workingmen to make the Spiritual Exercise, and have announced the formation of twenty groups, each of thirty-four men, for the coming year. Excellent, however, as have been the results of the work of retreats to men in Spain, yet it was realized by many that some plan should be thought out by which the Retreat Movement could reach the working classes in small towns far removed from retreat centres. The solution of the problem came in January, 1905, in a letter from a Spanish Jesuit in Colombia, South America. Father Luis Muñoz,

S.J., in twenty months had given the spiritual exercises fifty-two times in different parishes in towns of Colombia to some 5,776 men. His plan was simple: the parish provided a house or two, rented for the occasion, if no large school buildings near the church were available, and dormitories and dining room accommodations were arranged for at least eighty men. Bedding, linen, etc., were provided by families of exercitants.

In November, 1907, fuller details of the Retreat Movement in Colombia were sent to Spain. In 1906 six Jesuits had been assigned to the work of giving the Spiritual Exercises according to Father Muñoz's plan, and in some eight towns of Colombia had given retreats in one year to forty groups, with a total of 10,033 men. The plan had worked admirably, and Father Muñoz's reports suggested to many that it should be tried in Spain. This was done, though not immediately. Father José A. Iñesta, S.J., a man of strong character, winning personality and great zeal for souls, was appointed to give the plan a trial in Spain. The results have been beyond expectation. In the one year and a half that he has been engaged in the work, 5,650 men in eight towns of Valencia, have made the Spiritual Exercises for five days. To prove thoroughly the value of the plan, Father Iñesta began under conditions which would have frightened an ordinary man. He chose for the field of his labors towns where Socialism and Atheistic newspapers were playing havoc among the laboring classes, and where missions had been given with little or no permanent results. The strong Socialistic and Atheistic groups fought the movement frantically, and in one town even threatened to burn down the retreat house if the work continued. Despite calumny, threats and opposition the work went on. Several letters, written by parish priests in several of the towns, have come under my notice. They all tell the same story: their towns had been practically given up as lost to the Socialists and irreligious element; missions had produced but little fruit; as a last hope Father Iñesta had been allowed to come. The results noted are termed "beyond description; the situation is changed; the town is ours; the effects are permanent." Many remarkable conversions of Socialist and Atheistic leaders in the towns are recorded. The great fruit has been in the almost complete banishment of irreligious newspapers from most of these towns and the entrance of Catholic dailies, while confraternities and sodalities for men have been solidly established.

In each town the first groups of men listed to start the movement going included some of its most influential Catholic men, who had to face ridicule and even insults from a gathered crowd as they entered the retreat house. Many at the last moment weakened and remained at home. In every town, on the closing day of the first retreat, an expectant crowd was always on hand to await the exit of the exercitants, in order to learn what the Jesuit had done to them during their five days of retirement. The earnest enthusiasm of these men; their simple and straightforward explanation of the nature of the retreat and their advice to those who a few days before had insulted and ridiculed them produced in every case an immediate effect. A second group of a hundred, or even two hundred men, would soon be formed, and so the work continued. Hundreds of men tainted with irreligious and Socialistic ideas entered the house of retreats and came forth fervent lay apostles.

The plan of Father Iñesta differs somewhat in details from that of Father Muñoz. A house or building close to a church is secured; dormitories are arranged for as many as two hundred men; bedding, linen, etc., are supplied by exercitants. The problem of supplying meals to from one hundred to two hundred men for five days naturally offers the principal difficulty. Father Iñesta adopted in the small towns a system familiar to workmen, "the dinner pail," that is, the meals were brought three times a day in a pail or basket by some member of the exercitant's family. In this the Spanish system differs from that of Father Muñoz's, who installed a kitchen and dining room with meals supplied by the house. The order of time followed by Father Iñesta is as follows:

A. M.	P. M.
5.30 Rise. Cigarettes.	2.15 Rosary. Spiritual Reading.
6.00 Morning offering. Meditation.	3.00 Cigarettes.
7.15 Cigarettes.	3.30 Exhortation. Meditation on Commandments (First Method of prayer.)

It will be noticed that the Spanish workingman is given plenty of time to enjoy his cigar or cigarette. It is especially during these free moments that eternal truths sink deeply into his soul, and in order that the time may be spent usefully, spiritual books are supplied in abundance, especially those which will be helpful to the workingman in getting him into the spirit of the Exercises. Speaking to the writer in regard to this work, Father Iñesta naively remarked: "If I can hold a workingman, no matter how bad, for twenty-four hours without his bolting for the door, he is mine." It is these first twenty-four hours which require more than ordinary tact and prudence on the part of the director of the exercises. The less intelligent laborer is naturally suspicious of the work in hand; he is more inclined to meditate upon the most convenient exit than upon spiritual truths. If the meditations of the first day are dull he will leave before nightfall.

In choosing his first groups of men, Father Iñesta always persuades the town doctor, the town lawyer and other town notables to be among the number. This gives tone to the movement. "Then," in his own words, "I search out five or six of the most intelligent, active and irreligious Socialistic rascals in the town. I pay them their wages for five days, and promise them good food, with no work other than to listen to me talk and do what I tell them. I know the effect of the Exercises of St. Ignatius on an intelligent man. After five days those men leave the house fervent Catholic lay apostles, my most active retreat agents. Their unlooked for conversion becomes the talk of the town and insures the success of the Movement."

As an appendix of a booklet of forty-eight pages, now in press, and entitled, "Eficaz remedio contra los males actuales," and written by the well-known Spanish social worker, Father Antonio Vincent, S.J., of Valencia, a detailed account of the management of as many as two hundred workingmen during a retreat, is given by Father Iñesta.

Failure of Italy's Jubilee

When United Italy planned its Semi-Centennial celebration all the world was invited to share in the festivities. But in spite of the sympathy that may have been here and there felt for the national aspirations of the inhabitants of the Peninsula, the gates of Rome have been barred against the rest of the world during the whole of the year 1911.

In the first place, no Catholic could share in the rejoicings without being suspected of sympathy with the plunderers of the Church; and so the streets of Rome saw none of those great pilgrimages which have been for centuries such a source of profit for the thrifty Italians.

When the time came for the opening of the Exposition the grounds were not ready and the buildings were incomplete, and in one instance a part of the structures disappeared in fire. Railway and other strikes warned prospective visitors of the danger of finding themselves in the midst of popular disorders. On the other hand, the Kings and Kaisers who were to lend the splendors of royalty to the celebration kept aloof; for anarchy is not unknown in Italy, and there was a well-founded fear that those royal progresses might have ended in assassination. But, worse than all, the eyes of the whole world were for many miserable months withdrawn from the Eternal City and centered on the hideous spectacle of the Camorristis in their iron cage at Viterbo. Could there have been a more galling humiliation for an ambitious people? Then came the news that Etna was on fire and pouring its molten lava down the mountain sides, spreading desolation over the most densely populated portion of Italy. The millions so foolishly lavished on the hollow show of the Exposition will be sorely needed now to repair the havoc of the awful visitation, following, as it does, so closely on the disasters of Catania and Messina.

But there was at least one hope of wresting a triumph from the year of sorrow: The great world-embracing and epoch-making Peace Congress was to meet there in September. But that congress will never meet, for cholera is stalking through the land and stamping the seal of death upon young and old alike. The havoc is terrible, but at least Italy is saved from the mockery of an assembly summoned from the whole earth to deliberate on the promotion and preservation of peace in the ungrateful and recreant city where for forty years the Vicar of the Prince of Peace is held a prisoner.

And so the year has passed. What was to bring glory to both king and people has filled the cup of both with bitterness and gall. Well may the nations ask, or they might do so if ideas of the supernatural had not long disappeared from the policies of their statecraft: "Why hath the Lord done this to His land? What meaneth this exceeding great heat of His wrath?" Italy has gone after strange gods, and has forgotten what constitutes its genuine greatness and glory.

The Philippines

It might be well to call the attention of American Catholics to what is going on in the insular possessions of the United States.

Religious workers representing the Church of England, Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Christian, United Brethren, the Y. M. C. A. and the British and Foreign Bible Society have united in Manila in order to bring American wanderers into the fold. Bishop Brent of the Episcopal Church was elected chairman, and Mr. J. M. Groves, associate general secretary of the Y. M. C. A., is secretary of this organization of Protestant denominations.

The movement is not worth mentioning except to emphasize the religious stand taken by the Y. M. C. A. of Manila. This organization is about to erect a $100,000 dormitory for Filipino students resident in Manila. All the schools of higher education are situated in the capital. Thither come the young men from all parts of the islands. The Presbyterians and the Methodists have each a dormitory in Manila for these young men, both of the houses being crowded. They are compelled to assist at Protestant services every day; but the majority of them attend Mass on Sunday, their residence in the Protestant houses being in the main a matter of necessity. Besides the Y. M. C. A. projected building, the Methodists will erect a $20,000 dormitory for Filipino students in Manila at once. Catholics have no accommodation for the thousands of young men who come to Manila; Catholics in the United States have done nothing to help their brethren of the Philippines, while American Protestants have poured hundreds of thousands of dollars into the islands to undermine the faith of the Filipinos. While the success of the Protestant proselytizer is insignificant compared with the amount of money expended, it cannot be denied that an immense amount of harm has been done.

The constant repetition of calumny is tending to repaganize the once Christianized Filipino.

As the Protestant missionaries state in their reports, the public schools are a great assistance in their work. A Catholic American teacher is the exception rather than the rule in the archipelago. A month or so ago the government "University of the Philippines" opened its door for the scholastic year 1911-12. The newly appointed president, who has the honor of being the first to hold the position, is the Very Reverend Murray Bartlett. Until he entered upon his new office he was Dean of the Episcopal Cathedral of Manila. Except that he is a graduate of Harvard, Mr. Bartlett has had no experience in college work. He was a minister in New York State before he came to Manila to be rector of Bishop Brent's cathedral. His salary as President of the University of the Philippines is $7,000; as Episcopal minister in Manila it was but $2,000!

Signs of the Times

Several methods of converting the world to a religious belief have at various times been tried with more or less success. Our Saviour sent seventy-two disciples "before His face into every city and place whither He Himself was to come," instructing them to "carry neither purse nor scrip, nor shoes." The missionaries of the Catholic Church have been following the instructions given to their prototypes, and the poverty of their missions is to-day held up to them as a reproach. The vast majority of the world is still buried in the darkness of paganism. Mahomet unbuckled the sword. The Moslem invaded Christian lands and threatened at one time the extinction of Christianity itself. But the invader was driven back and his progress checked apparently for all time. Thus the missionary without purse or scrip is making comparatively slow progress after two thousand years of effort, and failure is writ large on the drooping banners of Islam. Why not enlist the services of another power, the power of money, in an organized effort to reclaim the world? On October 1 thirty evangelists will sally out to convert the United States. A survey of the territory to be invaded has been made, which will help the traveling workers enormously. Each of the seventy-six cities is covered by as many charts, so arranged that the workers entering it can see at a glance the social and religious conditions of the inhabitants. The mandate of Christ to teach them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you is to be superseded by this survey, which includes a thousand questions, the answers to which are carefully tabulated and arranged for each city. As we have not seen it, we cannot give any idea of what this synopsis of the new religion contains. But the scheme is novel and the promoters confident of success. They have received no commission. Why should a commission be required?

It is a business enterprise, whose funds will be supplied by great captains of finance: J. P. Morgan, Samuel G. B. McCook, R. Fulton Cutting and Cyrus H. McCormick. The campaign will be directed by James G. Cannon, President of the Fourth National Bank. The speakers will invade all places where men are to be found. Into the store and the shop and the mill and the factory; into the office, the church, the home, these thirty earnest seekers after men will carry the summons of their organization: "The Church has something for you that you need, and you are something that the Church needs." Surely this is plastic enough. To what are the men to be converted? What religion is to be taught? When converted, how are they to be kept so? Perhaps these questions and their answers are to be found among the tabulated thousand! We are told that five hundred ministers attended the meeting and that Mr. Cannon, the Bank President, gave a banquet in the Metropolitan Club to the departing corps of thirty workers. And to this has Protestantism come! The signs of the times are so clear that he who runs may read.

A Matrimonial Puzzle

One of the perplexing problems which clergymen frequently meet with when a couple present themselves for marriage is to ascertain the exact degrees of affinity or consanguinity that may exist between them. The genealogical tree, if one may mix metaphors, is the asses-bridge of theological students. It was a test of patience in the days when marriage was marriage, but now that divorce has become fashionable, it is almost impossible to see one's way in the maze. How, for instance, could a searcher, lay or clerical, solve the problem that is now before the courts of New York if affinities had to be considered?

In 1879 a certain Robert Tysen married Ida Rowe. After a divorce in 1892, Mrs. Rowe-Tysen married Harry Kane and Tysen married Fannie Dawson, who had been divorced from William Pollock, while Pollock, not to be left in the lurch, married a Mrs. Kernochan. After a few years the second wife of the original Tysen divorced him and married J. Campbell Thompson, while Tysen made a third venture and married a Mrs. Benrimo; Mrs. B.'s husband meantime mating with an English actress named Robertson. A fourth time the terrible Tysen appears on the scene, and seeks to get rid of Mrs. Benrimo. To make it easier for himself, the judge appoints J. Campbell Thompson as referee. But Thompson is objected to, for he or his homonym had been married to one or other of the Tysen wives in 1899. Bad as the muddle is another complication arises. The former husband of the Tysen-Benrimo woman appears, and asks to be a party in the divorce proceedings, so that he might know where he stood in this matrimonial circus with regard to Helen Robertson. What the court did to Benrimo is too technical for any one but a lawyer to make out.

Such is the pass to which civil marriage has brought the most sacred of human obligations. It is worse than progressive polygamy; it is a descent into the grade of the animal. It furnishes a sufficient reason for the recent Ne Temere Decree of the Sovereign Pontiff, forbidding Catholics to contract civil marriages.

Nathan's Gentle Speech

It is curious how men differ in these days about the meaning of words that are descriptive of moral acts. Thus on the 20th of September, which is New Rome's forty-year-old holiday, the press informed the world that at the celebration of the breach of Porta Pia, Mr. Nathan, the Hebrew Mayor, "was not harsh on the Church." "He only made a passing reference to it." And yet His Honor said to the crowd at the gate through which the revolutionists had passed in 1870 that previous to the entry of these apostles of light the inhabitants of Italy were "enwrapped in darkness and superstition;" they were "suffering intolerable slavery;" they were "shut up in a narrow circle of dogma," and those who were of a contrary opinion were "parricides."

All this is put down as merely "a passing reference." It is like the stab of a stiletto from some Black Hand bravo, who passes over the body of his adversary.

The mob of Masons and Methodists who were grouped around the speaker applauded these mild "references" to the Church, and were especially pleased to hear that they were the authors of the new "morality" which this keeper of stolen goods assured them now reigned in the Peninsula. We note that he did not make even a "passing reference" to the highly moral caged Camorristi at Viterbo. His hearers would have been wild with delight had he advised them to rid the Vatican of its tenant, and they were, of course, chagrined that the Government had forbidden them to affix an insulting tablet on a wall where the Pope might see it. It was a great "moral" event—Methodists and Masons and Infidel Jews holding high revels over the spoils of the Vicar of Christ.

A Simple Lawyer

Mr. Thomas Syms, a London solicitor, has just been declared bankrupt. He attributes his failure, in great part, to money spent in Spiritualism. In 1906 he formed the acquaintance of Mrs. Izard, a trance medium, and for two years paid her £2 a week for séances. On Mrs. Izard's falling ill, he transferred the weekly £2 to another medium, Mrs. Orlowski.

This did not suit Mrs. Izard, so she informed Mr. Syms that Dr. Reeves required some money. As the doctor had been dead some seventy years, one would have supposed that the lawyer would have suspected the message. So far was he from this that during less than two years he gave Mrs. Izard nearly £300 for the venerable deceased. The Official Receiver suggested that Mrs. Izard had converted this money to her own use; but this Mr. Syms would not listen to. He was sure that, some way or other, it reached the dead doctor, who, wherever he was, was speculating in rubber shares, and expected any day to see him walk in, under a materialized body, and pay his benefactor a proper share of the profits.

Then Mrs. Orlowski went in for her second innings. She had a Spanish treasure ship. But to find it Mr. Syms had to get the log of the British Queen, lost while in quest of the Spaniard fifty years ago. Accordingly, he set out to search for it, and Mrs. Orlowski was not left behind. The pair traveled all over England and Scotland, as well as to France and the Isle of Man, with no other result than the spending of another £300 on an excursion, which the lady, no doubt, enjoyed exceedingly.

Mr. Syms represents a class much larger than people dream of. Could one see in a glance into all the mediums' parlors, one would be astonished at the number of persons, educated and shrewd in other things, that were being victimized in them. Mrs. Izard and Mrs. Orlowski also represent a class. But in the matter of a brilliant and profitable imagination the former far outshines the latter.

While digging for the foundations of a building, some workmen in London came upon the remains of part of a Roman ship 62 feet long by 19 feet beam. The men of science came to look at it, and said it had been a single-decked war galley. As it had none of the ornaments of the war galley, they determined that it was all that is left of a "scrapped" war galley. This may be so; but then how do the men of science explain the fact that the "scrapped" galley contained pottery, human bones, iron nails, dice, sandals and, above all, money? No doubt they will provide an explanation; for since the omniscient God has been dethroned the men of science have taken his place. We await their explanation, for something whispers to us that perhaps the vessel was not "scrapped," was not a war galley, was not single-decked, was not a galley, and was not Roman. Still, we have a great respect for men of science—in their proper sphere.

The City Council of Baltimore has set aside Monday, Oct. 16, as a municipal holiday in honor of Cardinal Gibbons. The ecclesiastical celebration of the Cardinal's dual jubilee—the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood and the twenty-fifth of his elevation to the cardinalate—will take place in the week of October 15.

CHAPELS ON WHEELS

The idea of having a chapel on wheels is by no means a new one in the British Isles, for even if the name of chapel can scarcely be claimed by the travelling vans belonging to Kensit and the Protestant Alliance, no one will deny it to the "Little Ark" of Carrigaholt that did so much to keep the faith alive in western Clare during those cruel years that followed the great famine in Ireland.

The motor chapel with which Fathers Vaughan and Norgate are carrying a beaconlight of Catholic Truth through the eastern counties of England this summer is unlike its predecessor in almost every respect. Father Michael Meehan's "Little Ark" was a rough wooden structure built by a local carpenter in the wilds of Clare, and except for the fact of having windows all round, it was more like a bathing box than anything else. The clumsy cartwheels on which it stood allowed but for the slowest of locomotion, and though there were shafts attached to it, when the need for locomotion did arise it was more often the priest's congregation than his horse that pulled or pushed the chapel into place, for the circumstances that had called it into being forbade its being moved far off the narrow strip of foreshore or no man's land, whence even the law was powerless to remove it.

Father Vaughan's chapel, on the contrary, fitted with powerful engines of the most up-to-date pattern, can cover more miles in one day than its predecessor covered in the whole course of its existence, and its appearance, its finish, its internal and external appointments are almost as unlike the "Little Ark" as a mudwalled chapel is to a city church. Yet, motor and ark, chapel and church are all identical in one thing. All alike have been the throne of the Blessed Sacrament, and the home of God.

The work of Father Vaughan and his companions is almost entirely with non-Catholics, whether at home at the Mission House at Brondesbury Park, near London, or giving missions in the Catholic churches of England, or, according to their latest development, travelling by motor to towns and villages where no Catholic church exists as yet, where few if any Catholics reside, and where the truths of which they are the standard bearers are regarded either with stolid indifference or with fanatical dislike. The motor chapel is an important factor in a campaign that is both active and up to date. The "Ark" was essentially a passive resister. The former is combatting ignorance and some fanatical opposition. The latter was indeed an ark of salvation in a densely populated district where frenzied hatred of Catholicity was trying, with the aid of bodily persecution, to force those who had received the gift of faith from God to apostatize.

Religious tolerance has made such giant strides in the British Isles during recent years that some people will hardly credit the fanaticism and persecution that were rife sixty years ago. Ireland at that time was only emerging from the thrall of the penal laws, and it was as yet impossible in the thickly populated districts of the west for the bulk of the people to be instructed in more than the absolutely necessary truths of religion. The National Board of Education was just coming into being, but its schools were few in number, and it was not only in religious but in secular knowledge as well that the people were lacking.

In the parish of Carrigaholt, a long narrow peninsula that lies between the Atlantic and the Shannon, the Board had but one school for a population of twelve thousand people, but of these a third were carried off by famine and by fever, and the remaining eight thousand were left in the most utter destitution. The parish was twenty miles long and there were three priests attached to it, but none of them escaped the famine fever, the parish priest, Father Malachy Duggan, having said Mass at an outlying chapel and administered the last Sacraments to no less than eighteen who were dying of cholera and fever on the very day he himself was struck down. The Bishop of Killaloe, a namesake of Father Vaughan's, appointed Father Michael Meehan in Father Duggan's place, and when the epidemic had abated the prospect before the new parish priest was a serious one.

There had been a certain number of hedge schools in the district which were held mostly at night, and where some secular and a good deal of solid religious instruction could be obtained, but now some local Protestants, led by an agent named Marcus Keane, knowing that the people were hopeless and helpless after the famine and the fever, professed themselves anxious to help them to recover from the effects of these double calamities, and their first act was to establish schools where the children would be provided with food and clothing as well as with free education. This was a bait which, when backed by an assurance that there should be no interference with the children's religion, was naturally irresistible to people who were still only one step removed from starvation.

This being so, even when the assurances of non-interference were disregarded, the doles of food and clothing were continued, though on the understanding that the receivers should attend the Protestant church. With a cry upon their lips that was heartrending, "Good-bye, God Almighty, till the potatoes grow again," the parents allowed their children to remain at the schools, that were now avowedly proselytising centres.

To combat the evil Father Meehan was at his wits ends. He had neither church nor school in the neighborhood where this proselytising was going on, and though he tried to say Mass every week in one or other of the people's houses, he soon found that those who thus made him welcome did so at a heavy cost, and more than one of them were dispossessed of their farms in consequence. Father Meehan then managed to buy the good-will of a couple of cottages from two families who were emigrating, and throwing them into one, he erected an altar, and so, under their thatched roof the Church of Saint Patrick came into being. Almost immediately however the priest's claim even to this miserable shelter was disputed, and the same fate overtook him as had overtaken those who had allowed him to say Mass in their houses, and meanwhile the work of the proselytisers grew and flourished, nourished on the starvation, spiritual and temporal, of its victims.

It was now, when everything seemed hopeless, that the idea of the little "Ark" came to the almost despairing priest. So it was built and placed on the foreshore, whence neither landlord nor proselytiser could displace it, and Sunday after Sunday, in the heat of five summers and for five wet, stormy winters Mass was offered in the frail moveable chapel, with the congregation kneeling bareheaded on the sand or along the roadway, heedless of the weather, but offering to God the caed mile failte, the hundred thousand welcomes that were denied to Him elsewhere.

So by slow degrees the leakage was stopped, and even at last those who had succumbed in their hunger to overwhelming temptation came back to the Faith that in their hearts they had never abandoned. The existence of the little "Ark" became known to others outside the peninsula on which it stood, and both English and Irish papers having taken up the cause, the originators of the proselytising were obliged to give the site for an immovable church.

The little "Ark" had done its work, and so, too, had its promoter, and when Father Meehan was laid to rest in the new church, his last moments consoled by the thought that ten schools, the result mainly of the generous contributions he received during two visits to his exiled flock in the United States, during the early sixties, would carry on unmolested the work on which he had expended his life, the little "Ark" was near him still. And there it still stands, no longer a movable chapel, only a relic of the past, and of the great number who have gone in the last sixty years to seek their fortunes over the ocean, scarcely one has gone without carrying a chip of the weather-stained timber as a reminder that, wherever they may go, their Faith must be to them, as it was to their fathers, a thing worth struggling and suffering for.

The motor which, after so long an interval, has reawakened the interest of the Catholic public in movable chapels has been started to combat no active enemy, but rather to try and pierce the dense cloud of ignorance and prejudice towards Catholicity that the passing of centuries, since East Anglia was the garden of the British Church, has made well nigh impenetrable. It is in districts where there are already Catholic churches and Catholic congregations that missions to combat leaks are needed. Father Vaughan and his companions have embarked on a different campaign. They are proclaiming the Truth where for generations no one has dared to proclaim it. When funds had been provided for the building and equipment of the motor, it was formally blessed by the Archbishop of Westminster and then, under the patronage of Saint Augustine and Saint Gregory, it started on its first tour. Besides the altar, with its vessels, its candlesticks and vases, its crucifixes and pictures, it is well stocked with leaflets, pamphlets and books, for in these days of the ascendancy of the press it is not wise to rely on speaking alone; even when the speakers are some of the best known of the time, the diffusion of literature is a most necessary part of the scheme.

July second was the opening day of the first mission; the place, Haverhill, in Suffolk; the missionary of the week, Father Bernard Vaughan, S.J., and the motto, characteristic of its originator, "Know Popery."

Near by a rival "movable chapel," manned by the Protestant Alliance, displayed its old warning, "No Popery," but in spite of this, the hall in which Father Vaughan's lectures were given was crowded, and Fathers Herbert, Vaughan and Norgate, with a lay helper, were kept busy in attending to the Question Box, wherein any written query might be placed for answer on the following evening. The Protestant Alliance also had not been idle, and on leaving the hall the workers were hissed and booed by an antagonistic crowd, but before the end of the week public feeling seemed to have changed, and Father Vaughan's clearly expressed hope that on his next visit to Haverhill he would speak to them, not in a public hall but in a chapel of their own, was greeted by the people with cheers.

The second week's mission at Royston, where Father Allchin, himself a convert, was the preacher, was no less successful than the first, whilst four other weeks have the same reports to give, of missions preached by the fathers of the missionary society, by Father Nicholson, C.S.S.R., and by Monsignor Benson.

When the full programme of its summer and autumn campaigns have been carried out, the motor chapel will return to its winter quarters in London, and it is not now, but in the future, that the work it has done will develop. The seed has been sown, but no one can tell when or where the harvest will be gathered.

But those who have assisted at a Mass said at that movable altar, the first Mass to have been said in most of the places since before the Reformation, have no doubt that the grace of God must linger round those places, and that His blessing is upon those who have carried the Truth or who have received it through the Motor Chapel.

LITERATURE

The Education of Catholic Girls. By JANET ERSKINE STUART. New York-London, Longmans, Green & Co.

"Be not the first by whom the new are tried, nor yet the last to lay the old aside," is a time-honored precept of rhetoricians when explaining the choice of proper diction. And the intimate sense of the precept has application in many other phases of mental activity than that involved in the use of language. In educational work preeminently, the "new" is not always the best, nor is the conservatism which clings to the "old" always assured of superior efficiency in the system it follows. A flexibility in methods permitting one to use that independence of judgment and discernment which will assist him in welding the progressiveness of modern ways with the tried traditions of older days makes for real up-to-dateness in school work. This seems to be the characteristic note in the book before us.

By a happy coincidence its author, for many years Superior in one of the best known convent schools in England, was called to the position of General Superior of the Community of the Religious of the Sacred Heart just about the time this fascinating little volume made its appearance. Mother Stuart's "Education of Catholic Girls" may then be accepted as an authoritative exposition of the methods in vogue in a teaching community the members of which, to quote words used by the Archbishop of Westminster in an exceedingly complimentary preface, "have had the courage to cling closely to hallowed methods built up on the wisdom and experience of the past, and have united with them all that was not contradictory in recent educational requirements."

Mother Stuart very properly appeals for "the education of girls to have its distinguishing features recognized and freely developed in view of ultimate rather than immediate results." The feature of the "new" in educational systems eulogized especially to-day, which makes for a training that encompasses little towards character training, whilst it abounds in sapient suggestion concerning the solving of the problem of how to make a living is not one that attracts the thoughtful educator. Hence the dissatisfaction, growing stronger everywhere, and impelling parents and teachers alike to frown upon a system which thinks of the college girl as the professional woman of the future, and not as the wife and mother.

That the author of "The Education of Catholic Girls" is not minded to make ethical training a merely nominal article of her educational creed rather than a working principle in her educational practice goes without saying. In her chapters on Religion, Character, Realities of Life, Lessons and Play and Higher Education of Woman, keen observations met at every turn manifest how accurate is the writer's appreciation of the fact that education is an unfolding of the powers of head and heart and body. A writer in the Month, in a deservedly commendatory notice of Mother Stuart's work, expresses a wish in which we of America may gladly join. He would have "The Education of Catholic Girls" fall into the hands "not merely of Catholic parents and teachers . . . but also into the hands of that increasing number of educationalists who are intensely dissatisfied with the past neglect of character training in English schools, and are striving to recover for it its proper place and precedence in the programs of the future." In Mother Stuart they will find an exponent of our convent system at its best, of its ideals and endeavors—a system whose whole aim is to secure the character against breaking. They who purpose this—and it is, after all, the one thing worth while in the training of young people—in their effort to make something that will last may often have to sacrifice present success. But they are consoled by the reflection that "to see results" is a phrase which, in the educational world at least, has a special signification. To train the temper, cultivate taste, and to form good habits and good manners, are details of an efficiency whose efforts are not to be measured in a day. * * *

Heirs in Exile. By CONSTANCE MARY LE PLASTRIER. Melbourne: William P. Linehan.

A voice from Australia: and what a charming, what a far-reaching voice it is! Miss Le Plastrier has succeeded in doing an unusual thing: she has written a thoroughly Catholic story which belongs to the romantic school of fiction. There are several scenes in the book which remind one of Victor Hugo. The hero, along with his deep sense of religion, has the characteristics of a Jean Valjean; he is a sort of human dynamo touched and quickened into strange beauty by the supernatural! He is brave, he is strong, he is resourceful; he is able to burn the candle at both ends without singeing his life; he makes great renunciations; he swims bravely through a sea of troubles. One part, the principal part, of his career is hidden in Christ; yet like Christ, he goes about doing good, putting brightness and holiness into many lives. Nor is his supreme act of self-sacrifice made in vain. He has bargained for souls, and he realizes on his glorious investment in a manner beyond his highest hopes. The gifted author shows clearly that a devout Catholic spirit and the bright face of danger and of romance can enter into a splendid partnership unto the making of a readable and engrossing story. Therefore we overlook the misprints and the illustrations, and thank Miss Le Plastrier for one of the most readable Catholic romances it has been our fortune to peruse in many moons. No Catholic library of fiction—whether for youth or older folk—should be without this charming story.

FRANCIS J. FINN, S.J.

Summa Philosophiæ Christianæ. Auctore JOSEPHO DONAT, S.J., Dr. Theol. et Professore in Universitate Oenipontana. I, Logica, pp. viii and 149, M. 1.36; II, Critica, pp. viii and 180, M. 1.62; III, Ontologia, pp. vii and 182, M. 1.62; V, Psychologia, pp. viii and 288, M. 2.55. Innsbruck: F. Rauch.

The present course of Catholic Philosophy was printed first for the private use of Father Donat's pupils in the University of Innsbruck. It has been used for a number of years with great success by the seminary students of Innsbruck, and Father Donat has finally decided to revise it from beginning to end and give it a wider circulation by publishing it. Thus far four volumes of the course have appeared, viz., Logica, Critica, Ontologia, Psychologia, and two volumes have still to be published, Cosmologia and Theodiciæa. The work has already been adopted as a textbook in several scholasticates of the Society of Jesus, and is sure to commend itself to the Professors of Philosophy in Catholic colleges and seminaries. It steers a middle course between the excessive compression of the ordinary text-book and the diffuseness of works of reference. For clearness and simplicity of style and method of exposition it surpasses any text-book we have seen on Scholastic Philosophy. Moreover, the author makes a special point of discussing the scientific and philosophical questions of the present day in the light of Scholastic principles. Thus, the theory of Pragmatism has a special thesis devoted to it, and such actual topics as hypnotism, telepathy, clairvoyance and psychical diseases are treated under the general heading De modificationibus vitæ psychicæ. And a valuable feature of the work is the large number of citations from the writings of modern philosophers. At the beginning of the volume on Psychology are several chapters on Physiology, illustrated by many excellent wood-cuts and diagrams. This is a new departure and adds greatly to the interest and value of the work. And not the least interesting detail is the freshness of the examples which the author uses to illustrate his definitions. Thus, he does not confine himself to the hackneyed example of sanus when he is treating of Analogy; but he says: "Ita homo pius dicitur mors et etiam venenum, illius causa; actus mentis dicitur idea et ipsius etiam objectum" (Logica, p. 59). The printing and arrangement of matter are unusually attractive and are a credit both to the author and the publisher.

Lectures on the History of Religions. Volume V. St. Louis: B. Herder.

This book concludes a valuable series. Catholics who regard with uneasiness the attacks made on the foundations of their faith by the students of comparative religions will find bulwarks of defense in these five volumes on the History of Religions that Father Martindale, S.J., has edited. There are six lectures in this last volume, some by authors whose names have not hitherto appeared in the series. Mgr. Le Roy writes about the "Religion of 'Primitive' Races"; Father Dahlmann, S.J., on the "Religions of Japan"; L. de Grandmaison, S.J., exposes the shams of "Theosophy"; Mgr. Benson, while bearing testimony to the phenomena of "Spiritism," warns his readers of its dangers; Father Thurston recounts the history of "Christian Science" and the absurdities of "Eddyism," while Father Martindale ends the book with a summarizing chapter on "The Cults and Christianity." In this last lecture it is clearly shown that whatever good there was in all the ancient religions ours possesses in fulness and completeness. Christianity is the only living, uplifting practical religion; the only one that fully explains what man is striving after; the one religion that is "not only suited to his nature when he has got it, but is, on its dynamic side, alone powerful enough to strengthen him to success." To make this excellent work easy to obtain, the moderate price of sixty cents a volume is still maintained.

My Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. By T. FRANK HANLY. The Bobbs Merrill Company.

This is a beautiful little book containing a lecture on Our Blessed Lord's Divinity. With the object perhaps of appealing to a wider circle of readers, while also centering his fire, the author omits from his argument all the miraculous facts connected with the Saviour's life, and insists only on "a consideration of His personality, the effect of His Gospel and the results of His ministry." Mr. Hanly's name is misleading for he is not a Catholic apparently, since he speaks with approval of the garbled "message" that Luther and Wesley gave the world, but in his enthusiastic admiration for the character of Christ, the author is thoroughly Catholic.

"And so we have Him," concludes Mr. Hanly, in summing up "a Galilean carpenter; Not a physician, but the master of all human ills; not a lawyer, but the expounder of the elemental principles of all law; not an author, but the inspirer of the living literature of the world; not an orator, but the interpreter of the universal human heart; not a poet or musician, but the soul and inspiration of all song and of all music; not an artist, but the unfailing light of the great masters, old and new; not an architect, but the soul-transformer and character-builder of all time; not a statesman, but the state and institution founder of the race. And more wonderful than all, a man blameless and unscarred by sin or taint of wrong."

"And when I contemplate the admitted facts of his wondrous life; His death on the cross at three-and-thirty; the effects of His brief ministry and the results of His work, so vast, so far-reaching, and so abiding, and consider His all-pervasive and omniscient personality, my exultant soul slips its agnostic bonds, leaps the shrinking chasm of its doubt, breaks through every hindering quibble, falls at His nail-pierced feet and in glad recognition cries out its joy: 'My Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ!' He was not a man. He is God itself, God made manifest."

The Journal of the American Irish Historical Society. Edited and Compiled by PATRICK F. MCGOWAN, Secretary General. Vol. X. New York: Published by the Society.

"The Journal," says the preface to this substantial volume of 445 pages, "is not only a valuable record and depository of historic facts of vital interest to our people, . . . but also an armory of controversial defence against those who may attempt in the future to ignore or belittle Irish achievement on American soil." Besides the report of the transactions of the Society for the year 1910 and the list of its members, there are eighty-five separate historical contributions in the book. Not all of them, of course, are of equal merit or interest, but each has its individual attraction for the historical student. It is satisfactory to learn that the Society is prospering and that its membership increases constantly. In the ten volumes of its publications it has already established an incontrovertible argument for its successful existence. * * *

St. Margaret, Queen of Scotland. St. Louis: B. Herder.

Here is a good book for girls about a holy queen. The canonized saints of Scotland are not very numerous, and St. Margaret, the greatest of them all, it has been observed, came from England. But highlands and lowlands, "Papist" and Presbyterian have always loved and venerated the "good Queen Margaret." There is a lass in almost every cottage bearing her name, and she is held up to every Scottish maiden, wife and mother as a model to this day.

Though Father Graham writes a preface for this life of the sainted queen, the name of her biographer is not given. It seems to be a nun, however. Perhaps the records that have come down to us about St. Margaret are not full enough to make a book of two hundred and fifty pages, so the author is quite justified in indulging in historical digressions, but the whole book is well written and interesting. This pretty story is told about the queen's early married life: In her love for the poor she would sell her beautiful robes and jewels to supply their needs, and when her own wealth failed she had recourse to the king's treasury, pretending sometimes to steal what she wanted, and nothing pleased her simple husband better than to catch her in the act. "He would take her small hand, money and all, in his own great horny one and lead her to her confessor, asking him how a little thief caught red-handed like this ought to be punished." We learn from her biography, how Queen Margaret brought gentleness and refinement into the rough Scottish court, what a generous founder and restorer she was of churches and abbeys, and how her zeal for religion showed itself in the reforms in ecclesiastical discipline the queen brought about. Her passion was a love for the beauty of God's house. In her closing chapter the author reminds her readers that "Every woman is a queen. Each has a kingdom, large or small, subject to her rule, and it rests with herself whether she will seek, through her queenly power, her own gratification and pleasure, or the happiness and welfare of her subjects," and then holds up the high example of "good Queen Margaret." It is still to be deplored that such useful books as this cannot be had at a lower price. W. D.

EDUCATION

Signs are multiplying to convince one that there is a widely growing distrust of the effectiveness of the dominant educational system in this country. Time was when the advocates of the non-religious school were content to point to the advantages of civilization resulting from the spread of popular education, as a proof of its excellence and completeness. Few of them appeared to recall that the advanced civilization of our times has many aspects, and that it is not to use a correct standard to consider solely the material progress of the day in estimating the value of an educational system and its share in the nation's advancement. The chief progress that has been made in modern civilization has been made in supplying the material needs of man and in providing better physical conditions of life, with a consequent development of useful and mechanical arts. But mere material progress and material comfort are not the end of man nor the measure of his true happiness. Popular education with us has followed the trend of our progress, and, professedly casting aside all thought of the religious element in the child's development, in aiming to energize its intellectual life, it has given scant recognition, if any, to its ethical and moral life. The results are coming home to the one-time ardent upholders of our non-religious schools.

The writer of an editorial in the June issue of The Ladies' Home Journal, after stating quite pointedly that the murmur of dissatisfaction on the part of parents with the education given to their children is swelling each year, endeavors to show just why the feeling exists. In doing so his plain speaking is such as a few years ago would have called forth a storm of protest against a Catholic critic using similar language.

"To say that the desire for education has become an obsession in America," says the writer in the Home Journal, "is not stating the case too strongly. And, as in the case of all good desires that get away from their true anchorage, it is, indeed, a question whether we have not got away from the correct angle in this whole matter. Are we not confusing the word education as meaning something that comes entirely out of and from books, instead of a drawing out and an unfolding of all those powers of head, heart and body that will best help not only to develop the understanding, but also to train the temper, cultivate taste and form good habits and good manners?"

"If," he continues, "we are educating the head either at the expense of the heart, or without a due regard for the relation of the heart, the sooner we know it the better, and the sooner we stop it the better. We are already cutting a sorry enough figure before the nations of the world as being the one nation which has the only great school system without a vestige of a definite and formal instruction in religion in it." Nor does the writer find it an easy task to say just where the widespread awakening to the ineffectiveness of the present educational system will lead to. He affirms, however, "that it will not be long before the dissatisfaction will make itself heard in no uncertain tone." He goes further: "and when the dissatisfaction takes form and reaches expression we shall be mistaken if it be not a definite pronouncement against the growing tendency of the almost entirely scientific character of our educational curriculum, and the gradual disappearance of the distinctly and avowedly moral and ethical element."

* * *

All of these sentiments make delightful reading for the Catholic. It is so comforting to feel that we are being rehabilitated among the intellectuals, and that our unceasing plea for a measure of regard for religious and moral training in the education of young people no longer stamps us as illiberal outcasts among the people. But our comfort is accompanied by no vain complacency in our long-delayed victory. Rather do we regret the fact that a matter of first principle should have needed the confirmatory strength of a bitter experience before its evident truth appealed to so many among us. It is, unfortunately, the undeniable and melancholy fact that crime is increasing with the increase of popular education, not alone in the number of crimes but in the heinousness of their character, and it is this which has begun to open the eyes of the fathers and mothers of the land to the defect inherent in the education given to their children.

* * *

The writer whom we have quoted almost exaggerates the evil. "We in America," he writes, "have neither the religious nor the moral in our school system." And saying this, he adds a word which makes one question whether the years of investigation he professes to have given to the question, have even yet made clear to him "What is the matter." France, he writes, has no definite nor formal instruction in religion in her school system. "But when she stopped it she substituted one of the most thorough systems of moral instruction that the world has ever seen, and which she is to-day working with might and main to make the dominating note in her educational system." Here is the old error of the theorist who blindly fancies that the morality of a people can be conserved without definite religious instruction in that people's schools. We referred, on various occasions recently, to documents showing the disasters that have followed France's attempt to educate without God. Our readers will recall their story of a shocking increase in juvenile criminality, of the notable cooling of the patriotism that used to distinguish Frenchmen, of the constantly increasing trend towards the worst features of Socialism, of the lowering of moral standards among the people as well as of the blunting of the moral sense and a deplorable blinding of the public conscience.

* * *

We cordially agree with the position assumed by the Home Journal writer: "The time has come when every parent must begin to think seriously of how his or her child is being educated, and then decide whether the standards are right or wrong. And we fear that the decision will be that they are wrong." But we believe that when the question comes to be threshed out, as threshed out it must be, and that soon, sensible American parents will not be satisfied with an effort to cure the evil through some sickly, vague and indefinite system of moral teaching not based on positive religion. Morality as applied to the routine of ordinary every-day life, let the theorists say what they may, cannot be taught without the essential reference to religious principles, and the astounding fact was proclaimed some years ago that more than fifty per cent. of all the children of our country receive no religious instruction whatever. A writer in the Educational Review of February, 1898, quoting statistics, contended that less than fifty per cent. of the young people of the United States frequent the Sunday schools, and apart from the religious instruction there imparted, such as it is, what opportunity comes to them to receive the treasures of the one necessary wisdom into their hearts and minds?

* * *

We believe that when the day that marks the final decision of this problem in our country shall have come a vast majority of Americans will be found aligned with the Catholic body in the desire that religion shall enter into the daily life of their children and that a knowledge of it shall go hand in hand with secular studies. The awakening which the Home Journal writer speaks of is proof enough that many non-Catholics are thoroughly in accord with the Methodist Protestant who, in a signed letter to the Literary Digest (Vol. VII, No. 7), affirms: "In our judgment the denominational schools of the land, as compared with the purely secular or State schools, are, on moral grounds, incomparably safer. Our State institutions, as a general thing, are the hotbeds of infidelity, not less than vice. That unbelief should be fostered and fomented there is not unnatural. We thoroughly believe that our church should invest ten millions of dollars in the next ten years in denominational schools. Why? Because we believe this system is American and the only safe one."

MUSICIENS D'AUJOURD'HUI.*

In "Musiciens d'Aujourd'hui" the author of "Jean Cristophe" has made a most valuable contribution to contemporary criticism, and indeed to contemporary literature. He has the true genius of the critic, which is as rare as it is valuable. His delicate insight, his fine powers of interpretation and exquisite gift of expression should make this book a treasure to the many music lovers who are puzzled during this period of artistic upheaval, and wish to form a just estimate of the final value of the various experiments put before them by the musicians of to-day, who in their several ways rebel against the ancient authority in music.

In this series of essays the only two names that are not strictly "of to-day" are those of Berlioz and Wagner. Their inclusion by the author is clearly on the basis of their representing the two powerful sources from which the currents of contemporary music have sprung. Of the two the author considers Berlioz, "that prodigious meteor," the more profoundly original genius, less pedantic than Wagner, and in a more real sense creator of the "art of the future," "for he enunciated a style of music which has hardly even yet reached its full fruition." His melodic phrases, "fluides et frémisantes comme la vie," are, in their long undulating outline, rhythmic and plastic as opposed to the metric art of the past three centuries. He was the prophet of free rhythm and of free melody. Not satisfied with the modern tonality he had recourse to the ancient church modes, and in this effort toward freedom of tonality he is being widely followed by the great composers of to-day.

The other essays give a well-balanced account of such names as Richard Strauss, Vincent d'Indy, Hugo Wolf, Debussy and Pérozi, followed by a very interesting comparison of German versus French tendencies of the day in music, and a somewhat longer essay on musical development in Paris since the year 1870.

One of the most searching pieces of constructive criticism deals with Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande." He describes the atmosphere of Maeterlinck's drama as being based on "a form of thought which is common among the 'élite' of Europe at present, a melancholy abandonment of the will to live to fatalism. In spite of the illusions of human vanity which imagines itself master, unknown and irresistible forces direct, from one end to the other, the tragic comedy of life. No one is responsible for what he wants, nor for what he loves; indeed it is doubtful whether he knows what he wants, or what he loves. He lives and he dies without knowing why. The fatalistic thoughts in which are reflected the lassitude of an intellectual aristocracy of Europe have been marvellously translated into music by Debussy, who has added his own poetic touch and a sensuous charm which renders their contagion the more irresistible.

"In all music there is a power of intoxication, but this music leads the soul into a 'vertige' of voluptuous renouncement"! From an artistic standpoint the success of Debussy's music rests on the fact that it represents a legitimate and vital reaction of French genius against the encroachments of foreign art, especially against the Wagnerian spirit, which does not correspond in any respect to French taste. "Pelléas" is a reaction against all excess of expression; and in its reaction against allowing expression to surpass the thought, it has gone so far as to be afraid to express what is actually felt, even when felt most deeply. The most intense passions are murmured in a whisper, an almost imperceptible shudder of the melodic line alone betrays the growing love of the unfortunate couple. . . . Compare the wild lamentations of the dying Isolde with the death of Mélisande without an outcry or a phrase. . . . Debussy's récitatif translates literally for the first time the natural speaking tones of the French voice, free from the heavy accents and immense intervals which Wagner employs and which are so incompatible with the French language. . . ." The originality of Debussy's harmony lies "not in the invention of new chords, as his admirers unwisely claim, but in the new use he makes of the old. . . . Like the impressionist painters of to-day he paints with unmixed colors, but with a delicate 'sobriété' to which all violence is as much of a shock as ugliness. He possesses the genius of good taste even to excess, like a Japanese painter, and to this he appears to sacrifice the other necessities of art, its tumultuous forces, etc. . . . But this is in appearance only, for through the whole work runs a thread of veiled passion. . . ."

Mr. Rolland's opinion of Dom Lorenzo Perosi is of special interest to Catholics. "His works," the author tells us, "place him in the front rank of contemporary music. They are full of faults, but the qualities they possess are so rare, and especially the soul shines forth so transparently, so sincerely, so touchingly, that one has not the courage to insist upon the faults." The latter consist of a certain awkwardness in the orchestration which the young composer should seek to correct, a facility which is admirable but somewhat too hasty, a few traces of bad taste, and an occasional reminiscence from the classics—all sins of youth. Mr. Rolland is amazed at "the beneficent calm that radiates from his very presence, the very harmony of a life which is serene, rich and in perfect rhythm. How restful after the tempests and convulsions of art in recent times. We hope Dom Perosi will be one of those to lead music back to that divine peace, that peace sought despairingly by Beethoven at the end of his Missa Solemnis, and to that joy of which he sang without ever having known it."

It is a pity that no English translation has been made of this very valuable and delightful volume. J. B. W.

ECONOMICS

We are supposed to have made great social progress during the past fifty years. Still, everyone who cares for the truth sees that much of this progress has been apparent rather than real.

A greater share of temporal goods has been gained by the working classes, but too often eternal goods have been sacrificed. The great principle of the Gospel: "What doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and suffer the loss of his own soul," is put out of the way by denying, explicitly or implicitly, that man has a soul to save. Nevertheless, people are no happier to-day than they were a hundred years ago. The law of material goods is unchangeable: they satisfy but for the moment and then create new appetites. Every amelioration of life makes us long for something just a little better.

This longing is the great obstacle to thrift. The difficulty our grandfathers found in the way of saving was, as a rule, lack of money to save. "Take care of the pence and the pounds will take care of themselves" was the old maxim; but the dealing with casually surplus pennies seemed, not without some reason, hopeless. There are few now who could not save if they would, and the difficulty to-day is the almost heroic effort required to conquer the many temptations to spend. We are tempted not only to spend what we have, but also to anticipate what we have not yet received, or, in plain English, to run into debt.

The horror of debt used to be one of the sound principles of every honest household. To fall into debt through sickness or lack of work was a calamity; to run into debt deliberately and without necessity was dishonest. Now there is a conspiracy against this excellent doctrine. The instalment plan of credit has been invented, and working people are entreated to get into debt. Glaring advertisements tell young men and women how they can get into stylish raiment—whether it is substantial is another question—for a dollar a week. From every hoarding fingers point at the passers-by and a huge superscription tells them their credit is good at such and such a shop. What is the use of getting wages increased only to transfer the increase from one's employer's pocket to the pocket of another's employer?

The worst abuses of the instalment credit plan are found in the furniture business. A failure to meet the monthly payment, even though the debt is almost discharged, means that the dealer may cart off all the furniture sold under it, and after having applied a few cents' worth of polish, put it on sale again. And this not only may happen but sometimes also does happen. We have before us a circular from a furniture house. Of the house we know nothing; we shall just consider the nature of the circular. In the first place, it offers gaudy articles at an extraordinarily low price. Secondly, it offers them on credit, about 20 per cent. to be paid down, and the rest in monthly instalments of about 10 per cent. Thirdly, it discourages immediate payment, saying that the margin of profit is so small that no discount can be given for cash. This is apparently only a pretext. Whether profits be large or small, cash is cash all over the world, and a cash payment has its specific value as compared with a payment deferred. Fourthly, the order blank contains an ironclad contract giving absolutely into the hands of the sellers the decision as to what indulgence may be granted to buyers who, through sickness, lack of employment, or other good cause, fail in their monthly payments, and agreeing on the part of the buyer to return all the goods in case of default in the contract. Judging from the evidence, one is inclined to believe that the profits of the company come from the resale of goods so recovered. A handsome chair may be very cheap at $5.65, but if two or three dollars be paid on it and it then be taken back and sold again, the manufacturers have a good thing.

The house sending out this circular uses a very unbecoming means to gain trade. It sends with it to clergymen a postal card to be returned to it with the names of parishioners who may be induced to buy under the terms we have mentioned, and holds out hopes that in return for this service it will give the clergyman some piece of furniture gratis. We are sure that none of our clergy are to be hired to introduce such a dangerous scheme to the members of their flock.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Mr. Martin I. J. Griffin writes to the Catholic Standard and Times the following letter on the early Acadian arrivals in Philadelphia and their first teacher, Ann Bryald. The letter has more than local interest:

"The opening of the school season brings to mind that the first known Catholic teacher of Catholic children of Philadelphia was Ann Bryald, one of the exiled Acadians, who to the number of 450 were, in November, 1755, brought unwillingly to our city. It may have been soon after their coming that Ann Bryald undertook this needed task of instructing in secular and religious knowledge the little ones of her unfortunate people. In 1771, as I have found by their report, the Overseers of the Poor continued her on their list of beneficiaries. Being engaged in instructing the Acadian children, she was deemed worthy of an allowance for her support.

"Her memory ought to be cherished by the Catholics of our city, and especially by the pupils of our schools. How can this be done? The Girls' High School now being erected affords the opportunity. Let a room in the school be dedicated to her memory. To obtain the funds let every girl in our parochial schools named Ann or Annie or Mary Ann, or other names including the Ann, contribute to the purpose. Might not the rector and Sisters of St. Ann's parish undertake this work? If they do, all the Anns will flock about them.

"What a pitiful and yet glorious story it is, of these Acadians who were cast on our shores, as well as other places along the Atlantic coast. They were confessors and martyrs of the Faith, and their memories should be honored by the Catholics of Philadelphia. They were huddled on Powell's lot, on Pine street, from Fifth to Sixth. Afterwards others lived on the west side of what is now Washington Square, then called Columbia street, and very many are buried in the square, which was once Potter's Field. They there lie unknown, and, worse still, unhonored, though they clung to their faith and their children with a fidelity worthy of recognition, and so would not part with them by allowing others to take them.

"Washington Square is holy ground. It is sanctified by these martyrs and confessors of the faith and by the remains of two thousand soldiers of the Revolution. These latter have been remembered by the Daughters of the American Revolution by a memorial stone, but alas! we Catholics know not, and so have not honored, these Acadians interred in the same ground. It will in November be 145 years since they were brought from their own beautiful and bountiful land, torn by the heartless bruality of the British Government and cast among strangers. Cannot the Knights of Columbus glorify themselves and these unfortunates by erecting a memorial stone at the southwestern corner of the square, near the office of the Standard and Times? That portion I have located as the first burial place of Catholics prior to the founding of the little chapel of St. Joseph's, where interments were made in the ground near it. There many of the pioneers of the faith were buried. I cannot prove this by documentary evidence, but all my searchings and traditions confirm my belief in the locality. So let the Anns honor the memory of Ann Bryald and the Knights of Columbus honor the exiled Acadians."

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

All the clergy of the diocese of Funchal, in the Madeira Islands, one of the suffragan sees of Lisbon, have energetically protested against the inventory of the churches and rejected the pensions offered by the Portuguese Government. They have also refused to mention any beneficent association that might serve as "cultural association." According to the "Annuaire Pontifical" for 1906, the diocese of Funchal contains about 150,000 Catholics, with 50 parish churches, 80 public and 2 conventual chapels, all ministered to by 93 priests.

Mayor Guerin, of Montreal, has been created Knight Commander of the Order of St. Gregory the Great by His Holiness Pope Pius X. This order of Christian knighthood is conferred on Mr. Guerin in recognition of his work for the Eucharistic Congress held last September in Montreal.

A free Catholic High School, the first in the diocese of Brooklyn, was opened, on September 11, by the Capuchin Fathers of St. Michael's Church, Brooklyn, of which the Very Rev. Gabriel Messmer, O.M.Cap., is rector. The Brothers of Mary are in charge of the Boys' department, and the Sisters of St. Dominic the Girls'.

The Right Rev. Henry A. Gabriels, D.D., Bishop of Ogdensburg, N. Y., celebrated the golden jubilee of his ordination to the priesthood on September 14. Thirteen archbishops and bishops and more than two hundred priests from the United States and Canada were present at the services in the Cathedral of Ogdensburg to honor the venerable prelate. Among the visitors were Archbishop Farley of New York, Archbishop Bruchési of Montreal, and Archbishop Gauthier of Ottawa. The sermon was delivered by Mgr. Lynch, of Utica.

The Most Rev. Mariano Alcalá, the recently elected Prior General of the Order of Our Lady of Mercy for the Redemption of Captives, is a native of the province of Teruel, Spain, and is in his forty-sixth year. For the past eight years he has been Provincial of Aragon. On account of the peculiar condition of affairs at present in Rome, it was deemed inadvisable to hold the election in the Eternal City. By direction of the Sovereign Pontiff, the electors sent their sealed votes to Cardinal Vives y Tuto, Prefect of the Sacred Congregation of Religious, on whom it devolved to make the scrutiny and declare the result. Father Alcalá is distinguished as a mathematician, a philosopher and a pulpit orator.

In the Church of the Holy Name, Manchester, Father Henry Day, S.J., according to the London Universe, said that no stretch of imagination could wholly or even principally attribute the recent industrial strife and anarchy to purely economic causes. "Unjust wages and conditions of labor were answerable for much, but the insubordination and disregard for the public welfare, which were the most serious features of the latest phase of the general strike movement, indicated a dangerous moral and religious weakness at the heart of the nation's life. Spiritual advancement had failed to keep pace with the nation's material growth and prosperity, and our civilization was weakened by a one-sided and stunted development. The remedy accordingly was more in moralization than in legislation. It consists in a return to Christ and His Cross, and a more spiritual conception of life."

OBITUARY

The Rev. John F. Dore, a popular priest of the Chicago archdiocese, died at St. Joseph's Hospital in that city, on September 18, after an illness of more than a year. Father Dore was one of the many efficient priests whom the East has given to the West, to assist that section in the rapidly developing needs of the Church. Born in Boston, February 1, 1863, he received his earlier training in the Boston and Holy Cross Colleges. Volunteering for the Chicago archdiocese immediately after his college studies, Father Dore pursued his theological course at St. Viator's, Kankakee, Ill., and was ordained a priest in June, 1889. Since that date he filled charges in the Holy Name Cathedral, in West Chicago, and latterly at Our Lady of Lourdes' Church on the North Side. During the last few years he was director of the parish school in this parish and distinguished himself by the active, intelligent interest he took in the educational work of that institution. Father Dore was a nephew of Monsignor Denis O'Farrell, pastor of St. Francis de Sales Church, at Roxbury, Mass., and he leaves two brothers in the priesthood. He was a well-known and popular speaker and preacher.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

LEGALITY OF THE EAMES-DE GOGORZA MARRIAGE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The several references that have appeared in your valuable columns in regard to the legality of the above marriage have been read with deep interest by your readers. There is, however, one point that still seems not properly or clearly cleared up, and that is, under what conditions, and under what canon law, was Mr. de Gogorza able to declare his first marriage null and void. This does not appear to be a decision by Rome, as the clergyman who married him in Paris was totally ignorant of the first marriage and under the impression that he was a single man. The public statements made by Mr. de Gogorza since his return to this country, and which have appeared in all the daily papers, confirm the fact that his first marriage was claimed by him to be null and void because it was only a civil one. No question was apparently raised in Paris, or has been stated or raised by Mr. de Gogorza himself, as regards his first wife being a Jewess, or is it explained under what conditions his marriage with Mme. de Gogorza, if she is a Jewess, could be so declared null and void, as, while it is admitted that, under certain conditions, these marriages can be annulled, nothing is shown that any steps were taken to dissolve this one, or is there a clear or distinct explanation given of the particulars known. It is the general impression that Mr. de Gogorza was not a Catholic in good standing at the time of his first marriage, nor was he so from then until his second marriage.

I feel that if you would give an explanation of the case in your valuable columns, it would relieve many minds that are at present confused over the situation, over and beyond which I would ask for information in your columns upon the following question:

If two non-Catholics have been joined by civil marriage, and these parties have later on obtained a divorce by the law of the country in which they were married, and one of them has become a Catholic, is such a marriage regarded as binding, and can it be annulled by the Catholic Church, and under what conditions and subject to what regulations.

A CATHOLIC.

September 21, 1911.

To the first question of the letter, viz.: "under what conditions and under what Canon law was Mr. de Gogorza able to declare his first marriage null and void," we answer: Mr. de Gogorza was married in New York before the new Marriage Decree of 1908 came into effect. At the time of his marriage a civil marriage in New York was recognized by the Church as valid if there was no "diriment" or nullifying impediment. But in the case of Mr. de Gogorza's marriage there was a diriment impediment according to canon law, viz.: he was baptized, and the woman he married was unbaptized. Such a marriage is always null and void in the eyes of the Church unless a dispensation has been obtained. The real reason, therefore, for the nullity of Mr. de Gogorza's first marriage is, not that it was a civil marriage, but that he was a Christian and his wife was not, and he contracted the marriage without any dispensation. Moreover, that Miss Elsa Neuman was a Jewess would have compelled him to get a special dispensation.

As to how much the priest in Paris knew about Mr. de Gogorza's side of the case, we have no information. But certainly in this country such cases have always to be referred to the Bishop of the diocese, and no priest has authority to decide a marriage case of this character on his own authority. We may add that Mr. de Gogorza's subsequent life has no bearing on the present discussion.

The second question is: "If two non-Catholics have been joined by a civil marriage, and these parties have later on obtained a divorce by the law of the country in which they were married, and one of them has become a Catholic, is such a marriage regarded as binding?"

Yes, the Catholic Church holds such marriage as binding, provided both were baptized, or both were unbaptized, abstracting from the question of impediments.

It is asked in the third place. "Can such a marriage be annulled, and if so, under what conditions and subject to what regulations?"

We reply that such a marriage can be annulled, in the case of two unbaptized persons, by the use of the Pauline Privilege. This Privilege, as explained by a Catholic clergyman in the New York Sun of September 14, is as complete as newspaper brevity permits:

"The Pauline Privilege is a concession promulgated by St. Paul, and allows, under certain conditions, the dissolution of a marriage contracted by two unbaptized persons. The conditions are, first, that one of the persons becomes a Christian and the other does not; second, that the person remaining unbaptized leaves the company of the baptized person and refuses to live with him or her, or, if consenting to remain, offers insult to God or induces the Christian to sin.

"Even if these two conditions exist, the baptized person cannot contract a second marriage without 'interpellating' the person remaining in unbelief. This interpellation is a formal act by which the baptized person asks for a declaration from the one remaining in unbelief if he or she wishes to become a Christian, and if not, if he or she is willing to continue married, but without any insult to the Creator, or without being an incentive to sin.

"For just reasons the Holy See can dispense with this interpellation. When the dispensation is granted the Christian can validly contract a second marriage and the previous marriage becomes null and void."

NEW HOLY NAME ORGANIZATIONS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Church of St. John the Evangelist, in the picturesque and historic town of White Plains, N. Y., was the scene on Sunday last of the regular quarterly meeting of the Archdiocesan Union of the Holy Name Society of New York. Some 900 delegates attended, and were escorted by the local branch to the grounds adjoining the church, where they were met by their Supreme Spiritual Director, the Right Rev. Mgr. Joseph F. Mooney, P.A., V.G., the Rev. Dr. Richard J. Keeffe, the pastor, and the visiting clergy. In a short and eloquent address, Dr. Keeffe extended to the men a hearty welcome, and concluded by introducing the eminent and distinguished jurist, the Hon. William P. Platt, and the Hon. John J. Brown, President of the town. Following brief eulogistic speeches by these officials, the delegates adjourned to the church, where the usual routine proceedings were gone through.

The continual increase in the membership of the Union, as brought out at these gatherings, is a source of great consolation to all, but at this meeting an added thrill of joy was afforded when "The New York Firemen's Holy Name Society" was proposed for membership. At this announcement four stalwart members, in uniform, of the "Bravest" rose from their pew with their recently appointed Chaplain, the Rev. Vincent de Paul McGean, and the enthusiastic ovation tendered to them will long be remembered. New York City has close on to six thousand members in its Fire Department, of whom at least two-thirds are Catholics, but aside from the missionary work done among them, individually, no effort has, up to this, been made to establish a Fire Department branch of the splendid organization whose chief end is the extinction of blasphemy against the Holy Name. Father McGean has shown himself a practical worker in this new field, and though as yet he numbers but fifty in his band, it is hoped that he will soon witness the day when the seed he is sowing there shall have grown into a powerful factor in the lives of all the Catholic fire laddies of New York City. Meanwhile a branch amongst the "Finest" also would not be amiss.

CHRONICLE

Flood Overwhelms Austin, Penn.—The great dam of the Bapless Pulp and Paper Company, one mile and a half north of Austin, Penn., burst on Saturday afternoon and 500,000,000 gallons of water rushed down upon the town. Probably three hundred of Austin's 3,200 people were drowned or burned to death in the fire, caused by the broken gas mains, which followed almost before the flood had passed. The little town of Costello, below the place, with a population of 500 persons, was likewise swept away. The dam was built two years ago. It was a great structure, 530 feet long, spanning the little valley formed by Freeman Run, and rising to the height of 49 feet. It was of concrete, thirty-two feet wide at the base, and said to be constructed after the most approved plans of modern engineering. The basin behind it was, on the day of the calamity, filled to overflowing and it was noticed that water was running over the top of the structure. Some persons went out from the town to see the unusual sight, and it was while they were watching the overflowing water that the first break occurred. The flood disaster at Austin occurred almost within a hundred miles of the scene of the great Johnstown flood of May 31, 1881, when 2,142 lives were lost and property valued at $16,000,000 swept away.

Who Is to Blame?—It should not be difficult to place the responsibility for the disaster. From the first the dam had given trouble. When completed in December, 1909, there was one small vertical crack about 1.16 of an inch wide extending from the top to the ground level. Other cracks appeared later, and in January, 1910, a leak began and panic ensued. The population of the town fled to the hills. The facts were given in the newspapers of January 26, 1910. T. Chalkley Hatton, of the American Society of Engineers made a full technical report, which was published in "Engineering News," March 17, 1910. The report stated that "the failure of the dam to withstand the flood of January 21, 1910, was probably due to two causes—first, that the great bulk of concrete, which had been hurriedly built, some during freezing weather, and which had been completed but six weeks before the maximum pressure came upon it, had not set up so as to attain its ultimate tensile strength. The most important cause, however," continues the report, "was due to the water getting under the dam. This condition was not anticipated when building the dam. Nothing," says the Engineer, in conclusion, "has been done toward reinforcing this dam."

The President's Tour.—The cordiality of the greeting he has received in the Middle West must be very gratifying to the President. His speeches have not been restricted to matters purely political. At Coffeyville, Kansas, he spoke feelingly on the necessity of a uniform divorce law, and of the menace which the divorce evil is becoming to the American home.

"The increase of divorces in this country," the President said, "is a reflection upon the laws and their loose administration. We ought not to permit the marriage tie to be dissolved at will. You say we ought not to keep unhappy people together.

Who brought them together? We did not. If they got together under a contract, why shouldn't they be bound to the contract, unless one or the other does something which in the eyes of all men ought to permit or require at least a separation, if not a divorce?

"The trouble is not that in an individual case demoralization follows because they are separated, but the trouble is when a man or woman feels it is only a question of option with her whether she still live with her husband, or he with his wife, then, with that option before them, they conduct themselves in such a way very frequently as necessarily to lead to a breach.

"It is the ability to and the prospect of getting a divorce that demoralizes. We ought to have a general uniform law on that subject that stiffens up and makes sacred the marriage tie. I agree that it is not possible in this stage, and under present conditions, to make marriage absolutely indissoluble, but it is possible to make divorce difficult, so that it cannot be obtained by collusion, and only when one party or the other shall have done something that all men regard as necessarily affecting the obligation of the marriage tie."

Panama Canal Route.—A $15,000,000 Steamship company was incorporated at Trenton, N. J. It will be known as the Atlantic and Pacific Transport Company, and will have branch offices in all the principal cities on the Atlantic and Pacific Coasts and on the Gulf of Mexico. The company has been formed to bid on the mail services now being advertised by the Postmaster-General, which call for weekly communication between New York and Colon; New Orleans and Colon; San Francisco and Panama, and fortnightly between Seattle and Panama. Later additional services will be established from Portland, Maine; Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Jacksonville, Key West, Mobile and Galveston, through the Canal to the Pacific Coast ports, and vice versa. The present announcement is of plans to build immediately some fifteen modern steamships of the necessary speed and tonnage, and the statement is made that the whole fleet will be ready for business on the opening of the Canal in 1913. Of course, the new ships expect to carry other cargo than mail bags. The coast traffic amounted two years ago, it is said, to 3,000,000 tons, and is increasing at the rate of ten per cent. a year. A large passenger traffic is also expected, and the cost of the journey by this route is estimated at about two-thirds of the present railroad rate. The transportation of freight without transshipment will make the route more attractive to shippers, and a considerable readjustment of railroad rates is undoubtedly foreshadowed by the appearance of direct ocean carriers from coast to coast.

Mexico.—In August, 1910, there were eight hundred and fifty-two periodicals registered with the Post Office authorities. There are now one thousand, three hundred and thirty-three, thus revealing the effect upon newspapers which the present administration has had. No new laws have been made, but the constitutional guarantees have been respected.—Steps have been taken to expel from the republic, in accordance with Art. 33 of the Constitution, an Armenian who is denounced as a trouble-breeder and a sower of sedition.—After withdrawing his name as a candidate for the presidency, General Bernardo Reyes, once Minister of War under Diaz and for many years Governor of the State of Nuevo León, has left Mexico for Havana, in circumstances which indicate flight. He averred that his life was in danger from the partisans of Madero, but that he expected to return. This is taken to mean that he contemplates starting a revolutionary move. His popularity with the regular army, which has not yet been brought into full sympathy with the Madero revolution, makes him a dangerous opponent. It will be remembered that Diaz fled from Mexico and planned on United States soil the revolution that made him president. Private advices say that twenty thousand Guatemalan troops have been mobilized on the Mexican border for the purpose of preventing interference with the plan of President Estrada Cabrera, of Guatemala, to combine by force of arms the five Central American republics into one republic with himself as president. The scheme is said to find favor at Washington.—The success of Madero is assured by the choice of electors on Oct. 1. Pino Suárez, recently elected Governor of Yucatan, and now a candidate for vice-president, thinks he may hold both offices.

Canada.—Snow falling in the West towards the end of the month found a good deal of wheat in Northern Saskatchewan still uncut. The quality of much of the grain has been more seriously injured by the vicissitudes of the season just closed than was thought.—The composition of the new cabinet is waited for with great interest as an indication of the new government's policy. There seems to be no doubt that extreme Protestants, such as Dr. Sproule, Colonel Sam. Hughes and Bishop Farthing, will try to commit Mr. Borden to a campaign against Catholic rights in the Province of Quebec. But the Conservative victories there were as a rule in the more rural constituencies about the Middle and Lower St. Lawrence, where the Catholic spirit is strong, and in nearly all such the turn over of votes from the Liberals to the Conservatives were such that but little more would be needed to double those victories. On the other hand, Conservatives can expect to gain little in the Prairie Provinces, of which the representation will be greatly increased before the next election; and the Maritime Provinces were so little touched by the Conservative reaction that they will almost certainly revert to their normal Liberalism. Hence the security of the Conservative Party lies in the conciliating of Quebec, in which respect for its religious rights will play a much greater part than tariffs or the navy question. It appears certain that Mr. Borden understands this, and that his administration will be truly conservative, preserving the constitutional rights of every Province; for the Quebec Chronicle, the Conservative organ, in an editorial headed "Justice for All," asserts that he will repudiate any attempt at a "narrow, sectarian policy," such as the Orange Lodges desire, and that whatever Government should show itself hostile to Quebec will have the support neither of its people nor of the mass of the people in the other Provinces.

Great Britain.—School strikes, such as we noticed last week, broke out in London and in several provincial towns. It is noteworthy that they occurred, as a rule, in those places where the late strikes were carried on more actively. In some cases the children said that they were following the example given by their fathers.—W. G. C. Gladstone, grandson of the famous Minister, has been elected to parliament for Kilmarnock Burghs. The Young Scot organization objected to an Englishman for a Scotch constituency, and the only reason the Liberal authorities, so zealous against hereditary legislators, urged was that he is the grandson of his grandfather. As he is comparatively young, and as the second generation of Gladstones have shown no remarkable ability, there was no other plea to make.—The non-union men have been heard before the Railway Commission. Their position is that they are in favor of Unions, but have left or refused to join the existing ones because these have been captured in great measure by Socialists, who use them, not for the benefit of the workers, but to propagate their peculiar ideas. For these reasons they object to the power of the Unions, exercised often tyrannically, being increased by recognition. The companies have been heard also. They claim that recognition would simply put them into the hands of the Unions. Some managers thought that as railways are a public service, they should be put under Government control sufficiently to prevent a stoppage. Others suggested that a strike or a lockout should be a penal offence, unless every possible means of conciliation shall have been exhausted. Neither suggestion seems very practical.—The great naval airship has failed. Some time ago it was found to be too heavy to fly. In lightening it the contractors weakened it so much that as it rose on its trial trip it simply broke to pieces.—There are considerable difficulties in the South Eastern Railway. The strikers were restored to service according to agreement, but they are dissatisfied because the company does not depose the men promoted during the strike in order that those who went out may have the exact places they gave up.

Ireland.—The railroad strike came to a sudden end, and was never as widespread as American reports would indicate. It only extended to the Great Southern, Midland and Northern, and on these the majority of employees declined to go out. For the sole reason that the railways accepted "blackleg traffic," which as common carriers they were bound to do, the English Trades' Union Executive ordered a strike in Ireland, while refraining from doing so in England. The Irish Industrial Development Association, the Nationalist organs, and especially the parish priests of the strikers brought home to the men that in becoming dupes of foreigners they were grievously injuring Irish industries and benefiting no one but British tradesmen and manufacturers. Thus the strike was ended and also, probably, the interference of British labor organizations in Irish concerns.

—The Eighty Club was received in Dublin by Mr. Redmond, in Belfast by Mr. Devlin, in Armagh by Cardinal Logue, and in Galway by Bishop O'Dea. Their object in visiting Ireland, said Sir John Benn, M. P., was not to strengthen their convictions, "but to promote the gracious and healing policy of Home Rule." Cardinal Logue told them that in the past Ireland was ruled too much by people who knew little about her, and she would never have prosperity and contentment until she ruled herself. Their receptions were attended by many Unionists, and there were other indications that Home Rule is acquiring converts rapidly. Motions condemning it were defeated or dropped at the Presbyterian Synod of Ardagh, and the Episcopal Synod of Carlow. Mr. T. W. Russell, who was twice the Unionist candidate in Tyrone, is now the Home Rule candidate to succeed Lord Chancellor Barry; Sir A. Conan Doyle has renounced Unionism, and the London Tablet, a Unionist organ, has an article urging English Catholics to do something for themselves, now that Home Rule is going to deprive them of their Irish defenders.—The Parnell Memorial, a statue of the Irish leader, by St. Gaudens, was unveiled October 1. Mr. Redmond was the speaker, and a specially invited guest was Mr. Richard Croker, whose generous donation hastened the completion of the monument. A week previously Miss C. Anna Parnell, who founded the Ladies' Land League in the eighties and conducted it with great efficiency while her brother was in Kilmainham jail, died through accidental drowning at Ilfracombe. Her organization housed and supported the evicted tenants, and had much to do with defeating Mr. Forster's coercion policy. Since that time she took no part in public life.

Italy.—A Universal Peace Congress was to have met this September in Rome, but instead war has been unexpectedly proclaimed against Tripoli. The reasons alleged are, in general, illtreatment of Italian residents. Twenty-four hours' notice was given to Constantinople of the occupation that was intended unless the Turkish authorities answered Italy's demands satisfactorily. Constantinople endeavored to delay matters, Germany offered to mediate; anti-militarist riots broke out in several towns of Italy, the Great Powers bitterly condemned the proposed action, but all to no purpose, and on September 29 war was officially declared. The ships were ordered to maintain a strict blockade, not only of the coast of Tripoli, but of Albania, Macedonia and Syria. Constantinople is bitter in its feeling at the brutal suddenness of the war, and its press proclaims that henceforth the Turks will live for vengeance. All Europeans have left Tripoli. The Apostolic Prefect, Mgr. Rosetti, and the Manager of the Banca di Roma, asked to remain, but were refused.—Riotous attempts to interfere with the progress of the troops still continue in Italy. Meantime the Balkans are in a ferment and are asking some of the Garibaldis to come to lead them against Turkey. The heroes refused on account of the cold in the Balkan mountains. On Sept. 30th there were bloody encounters between the authorities and the Italian fugitives at Salonica. All Italians were ordered out of Constantinople, and all the Consuls have left Turkey. On October 1 it was reported that the Ottoman fleet had been annihilated, that Tripoli was being bombarded, etc., but the news was more or less unreliable.

Germany.—As announced last spring, a Central Council of the St. Vincent de Paul Society was established for the empire, and a reorganization of the particular and local conferences was then projected to conform to the new status and to make more effective the work of the Vincentians throughout Germany. To assist in the reorganization a series of lectures was given by representative Vincentians in Cologne, September 10-15. Whilst primarily intended to explain the spirit and aims of the St. Vincent de Paul Confraternity to members associated in the work of that body, a general invitation was sent out to men and women interested in social and charitable work, seeking their cooperation with the Vincentians. —Telegrams received from Paris stating that Germany had accepted the latest French proposals in regard to Morocco and that the incident was thus practically closed prove to have been inaccurate. On September 27 the German Minister of Foreign Affairs, Herr von Kiderlen-Wächter, received the French Ambassador, M. Cambon, at the Foreign Office in Berlin and communicated to him Germany's reply commenting on France's latest proposals concerning Morocco. The conference lasted some time—the subject matter discussed, so reports say, being certain word changes in the formal proposals submitted by France. Following the conference it was announced that the papers would be once again referred to the responsible officials in Paris.—Germany's diplomatic action at Rome and Constantinople, in an endeavor to bring about a peaceful settlement of the controversy between Italy and Turkey, is still progressing at this writing, and German officials appear to be still hopeful of good results. Whilst evidently anxious regarding the situation, Germany believes that Italy will not take decisive action without further diplomatic exchanges.

Portugal.—A student of the second year of theology in the seminary for foreign missions has been taken for obligatory service in the army, the reason being that his father is believed to be unfriendly to the republic.—Although the republic is supposed to be duly established, the governor of Aveiro has declared officially that in virtue of orders from the Government newspapers having on their staff or among their contributors any of the journalists who have fled the country are to remain definitely suppressed. Is that liberty of the press with Portuguese sauce?—While the partisans of Chagas and Machado are claiming for them respectively the honor of having secured the recognition of the republic from the great European powers, others insist that all the gratitude is due the Rothschilds of London.—Machado's personal organ, O Mundo, characterizes Premier Canalejas as "a perfect courtier, a typical Spanish politician, a turncoat and a prevaricator."—The floating debt of the republic has increased by $1,728,000 since October 5, 1910.

France.—On September 26, at 7 minutes before 6 o'clock in the morning, the finest battleship in the navy, La Liberté, was blown to pieces in the harbor of Toulon. Between two or three hundred men are dead or dying. The battleships République, Democratie and Verité, which were nearby, were seriously damaged by the explosion, and many men were maimed or killed. Simultaneously with the explosion on La Liberté fires broke out on two other ships. On the following day two torpedo destroyers rammed each other. The smokeless powder is said to have gone off by spontaneous combustion, but the Secretary of the Navy, Delcassé, who visited the scene of the disaster and wept at the sight, declared that the blame was to be placed elsewhere. An anarchist plot is suspected.—It was announced on September 27 that France and Germany had come to an agreement on the Morocco question.

Austria.—The largest federation of the German Catholic students' associations recently held its convention at Linz, in Austria. It embraces seventy-seven student societies and numbers more than eleven thousand members. A magnificent spirit of loyalty to Church and country was displayed in the resolutions that were drawn up. The ideal of student life which they have set upon their pedestal for imitation is a blending of Faith, Wisdom, Jollity and Friendship. The Kartellverband embraces Germany, Austria and Switzerland.—Prompt action was taken by the Government to crush the disorders resulting from the Vienna rioting, chronicled in a recent issue. Many of the persons arrested for participating in the food riots were found guilty and received very severe sentences. Twenty-three alleged leaders of the mob were condemned to serve jail terms amounting to ten years and seven months.

Hungary.—On October 15 there will be convened the customary annual conference of the Bishops of the Kingdom. The meeting is announced to take place in the palace of His Eminence Claudius Francis Cardinal Vaszary, Prince Archbishop of Gran and Primate of Hungary, and will be attended by all heads of dioceses, whether of the Latin or Greek-Catholic rite.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Pope and the Peace Movement

We had occasion lately to point out the character of the more important letters coming from the Holy See. They are official documents. Their every word has been weighed carefully, and they are to be read and studied in the spirit in which they have been composed. Such a document is the autograph letter of the Holy Father to the Apostolic Delegate in Washington on the Peace Movement.

We may observe that in it the Pope gives no encouragement to certain extravagant hopes concerning the movement. Any effort in the direction of peace is, he says, praiseworthy and profitable to the public welfare, even though it attain its end neither straightway nor fully. Apart from this, however, three points stand out. First, the Pope asserts not only the value of his approbation and support, but also its essential place in any efficacious peace-movement. Second, as the Father and Teacher of all Christians, he explains authoritatively the only way to the securing of peace. Third, he calls attention to the fact that he is deprived of his proper functions in the matter. We shall say a word on each of the three.

Our Lord is the God and Prince of Peace. Peace is to be one of the crowning glories of His kingdom, a blessing to be the necessary consequence of the supreme exaltation of that kingdom, and to be attained by men in no other way. It belongs, therefore, essentially and absolutely to the moral order. Hence, the means used to promote it, disarmament, treaties, arbitration and anything else, belong to the same order; they must be judged and determined on by the rule of right and wrong, and must not be regarded from a merely utilitarian or humanitarian point of view. It belongs to the supernatural order because of its intrinsic connection with the Kingdom of Christ, because it is impossible of attainment by the natural man, and because in the Christian dispensation all morality has been raised to that order. The Successor of St. Peter, as Vicar on earth of the God and Prince of Peace, is the divinely appointed teacher, not only of the faith, but also of morals, teaching mankind both to believe and to do all Our Lord has commanded. Wherefore, his approbation and support of the Peace Movement, besides being desirable on account of the influence he can wield in its favor, carry also the weight of his authority in the strict sense of the term; so that if he be ignored there can be no hope of success. Neither conferences, nor tribunals, nor agreements, nor laws, can bring about what is the prerogative of the Prince of Peace, unless His Vicar not only cooperates, but actually directs the work.

Secondly, the Pope tells us that peace consists in order. They are very shortsighted who imagine it to be merely the absence of actual warfare. Germany and France have not been engaged in any great war for more than forty years, but no one will say that they have enjoyed peace in the real sense of the word. Peace, properly understood, excludes not only actual fighting, but also every fear of it. It must be permanent; and therefore can be had only when the universal society of nations is in a state of stable equilibrium. This cannot be had unless all nations and the subordinate societies and the individuals in each are so organized that all enjoy their full rights and none dreams of encroaching on the right of another. A moment's reflection is all one needs to see that nations seething with internal disorder, the condition of every one of them to-day, cannot hope for peace among themselves. There is, therefore, but one royal road to peace, the observance of order established on the unchangeable principles of justice and charity. Here, again, we find ourselves in the supernatural order. Justice is the virtue by which we render every one his due. There are rights of supernatural origin to be defined only by him whom God has put at the head of the supernatural universal society He has established among men; and even men's natural rights God has raised to the supernatural order by proclaiming His supernatural sanction of them, by infusing with sanctifying grace the virtue by which we respect them, and by giving us on each occasion the actual grace enabling us to observe them. By charity our Holy Father does not mean merely natural benevolence or humanitarianism, but that divine virtue by which we love God, as He has revealed Himself, for His own sake, and our neighbor for the love of God. A partial natural justice and a benevolence imitating in some manner supernatural charity, may give a longing for peace and may for a time produce it in the negative sense; but peace in the positive sense, through the permanent exclusion of every cause of war, can be had only when this supernatural order, of which our Holy Father speaks, enters into the social and political life of every nation.

When this happy state has been gained, if ever it be attained fully in the present dispensation, we shall probably be not far from the new heavens and the new earth in which justice dwells. Still, there is no reason one should lose confidence in the work for peace if conducted along proper lines. This world, inasmuch as it is but the preparation for the world to come, ought to be a world of spiritual progress and gradual acquisition. The individual living according to God's law not only draws daily nearer to the moment of his entrance into bliss, but also enjoys its evergrowing foretaste. The nations, would they walk in the light of Holy Church, should, by a closer and closer union with Christ's Kingdom of the present dispensation, with increasing happiness and honor draw towards the day of their highest glory, when they will be merged in it in the moment of its attaining its perfect splendor. So, too, by taking as their ideal the perfect peace of the perfect justice and the perfect charity to come, they may enjoy more and more abundantly its blessings as time moves onward to eternity. This is what the Pope would have us understand when he lays down the theory of peace; and in doing this he does not express his personal opinion, but speaks in his office as the teacher of men.

When, in the third place, the Pope points out that he has been deprived of his proper functions in the peace movement he is not making, as it were, a polite apology for not taking a more active part. He is complaining of the violence done him, which deprives the movement of an essential element of any success. Hence, every one zealous for peace should consider what can be done to set right this tremendous violation of universal order, the enduring impediment to the liberty of action of Christ's Vicar. The chief agent in the crime which renews itself daily was the Italian Government, but nearly all nations are more or less accomplices, and it is the interest of every nation desirous of peace to end it. A few years ago the Czar proposed a congress on disarmament, and among the first invited to it was the Roman Pontiff. The Italian Government, making of its crime a pretext, protested against his sharing in the discussion, because he was not a civil prince. It carried its point, and the congress came to nothing. That same Government has been celebrating the jubilee of its first proclamation to the world of its intention to rob the Pope of his own city; and had appointed September 25, the forty-first anniversary almost to the day of its entrance into Rome, for the opening of an International Peace Congress. Even had the Government invited him, the Pope, who declares peace to consist in order, could not countenance a peace congress bound up with the most grievous breach of order this age has seen. But the congress will not meet. Whether it be on account of the troubled state of Europe, which may at any moment involve in war the nations who were to have taken part in it, as many believe, or whether it be on account of the cholera, as the Government pretends, it has perished before its birth. There can be no peace without an unshackled Pope as its guardian.

With Workers for Boys in Their Teens

It is common with organizers of juveniles to gather their forces in doors, sometimes at least, for recreation doings; and certainly this practice, adopted as an occasional feature, is most deserving of consideration. It by no means follows, however, that the clerical worker should in every instance be urged to enlarge on the foregoing plan by establishing a permanently open indoor amusement centre or "club." Caution in this particular is suggested first of all by the fact that the priest-gatherer of boys can usually succeed without assuming the great burden that the club really implies. Obviously natural inducements must be placed before the juvenile throng but, on the other hand, attractions on a scale wholly inferior to that of the amusement rendezvous can be confidently offered when these lesser attractions are complemented by the drawing and controlling influence which the priest, in virtue of his sacred calling, is able to exercise.

Indeed, we may here find an answer to the complaint heard betimes from Catholics that our heavy outlay on churches, schools, and the other more urgent charities leaves practically no material means for sadly needed "social" endeavor amongst the young folks of the cities. Many a willing priest, contemplating the vast sums non-Catholics are able to sink in juvenile gymnasiums and other gathering places, summer outings, etc., comes to regard these princely expenditures as a necessary condition for success, no matter who or what the worker may be. It seems proper, however, to submit that these disheartened observers have not perceived—as happily they may at any time—that, in the present endeavor, money-competency is really a much lesser asset than is the personal influence that the true faith confers on her ministers.

The earnest priest is conscious from daily experience of enjoying in a large, exceptional way the regard, respect and confidence of his flock, both old and young. But this hold on hearts cannot fail of facilitating in a marked degree the task of organizing boys. The view now offered does not really suffer from the fact that the priestly call into societies has comparatively small effect on young men. Youthful adults of the stronger half of humanity are notoriously the element that responds last and least to pastoral efforts in behalf of church-fraternities. But the immature masculine contingent, the lads in their teens, being purer of heart than "grown-ups" of the same sex and less swayed by earthly affairs, stand ready to act in the present matter almost after the fashion of their gentle sisters, and not at all after the fashion of their older brothers.

It is not, of course, absurdly claimed that to succeed here the priest has only to raise his voice. On the contrary he must at every step be painstaking in adapting things to juvenile weaknesses and demands; still it does not seem that natural attractions swelled to the magnitude of the club are at all needful to one who can do so very much by himself. Indeed, if the elaborate, costly "up-lifting" machinery of non-Catholic endeavor be considered apart from its educational effect and simply as a means of securing well disposed juvenile recruits for religious work, may the machinery not seem clumsy and undesirable when contrasted with Catholic sacerdotal influence which, operating automatically and with very slight external support, wins abundant enrollment and auspicious docility?

Meanwhile, the assertion that the priest can gather boys without permanently housing their fun, is made with a reservation regarding districts that are spiritually famished. Localities of the kind, placing as they do a handicap on the personal influence of the anointed worker, may easily need the club as a base of operations. But even when so demanded, the rendezvous would seem to be rather for lay than for clerical control; and certainly, where faith is of normal strength, the man from the sanctuary ought to make good with the permanent protection of no other roof than the one covering the scene of his religious meetings, the house of God.

GEORGE E. QUIN, S.J.

Methodism To-Day

A few months ago a certain Dr. Workman entered an action for libel against the Wesleyan University of Canada. The trial brought out some interesting facts about Methodism and the broad views tolerated within the Methodist fold. At the judicial inquiry, the Rev. Ernest Thomas, of Merrickville, nobly came to the defence of Dr. Workman. The following salient points of doctrine were discussed, the answers disclosing the extent of the wreck which the higher criticism has made of the Christian Faith among the Gamaliels of Methodism.

The first topic introduced in the trial was that of the interpretation of Scripture. Here the witness admitted that there was some difficulty in interpreting Scripture according to the standard of the Methodist Church, which he declared was a work called "Wesley's Notes." "Do you know of any person in the Methodist Church who literally adheres to the Standards of Methodism?" "I never met any," said the Rev. Mr. Thomas. Naturally this led the court to an inquiry as to the interpretation of the Scriptural account of the Virgin birth, according to the Methodist standard of belief. On this point the witness confessed, "I do not believe there is anything in the standards of the Methodist Church which approaches the question." "The origin of the account given in this (Fourth) [sic] Gospel concerning the Virgin birth of Christ," said the Rev. Mr. Thomas, "is purely a literary question, whether it comes from written documents or from the general faith of the Church; but, of course, every scholar has his own opinion." This is surely enlightening. Every Methodist scholar has his own opinion. But one is tempted to ask, what about the poor Methodists who can lay no claim to scholarship? However, the most startling admission herein implied, is that some Methodists, scholars if you will, appeal to tradition for their belief in the doctrine of the Virgin birth. What then becomes of the Bible as the Rule of Faith?

"Do the standards say anything about a physical or literal Resurrection? Is it not a fact that St. Paul teaches a spiritual resurrection?" were questions that were then asked.

The Rev. Mr. Thomas was puzzled for an answer. He could not say that it was clear "in view of the fact that specialists cannot come to that conclusion." The nature of the body of Christ at the Resurrection, the Reverend witness considered "a difficult question, even in 'Wesley's Notes.'" The Bible doesn't help him, because he has discarded it as his rule of faith and for the Authoritative Church he has substituted "Wesley's Notes." Wesley's Notes are, on this vital subject, as silent as the grave. And now all that the Methodist Preacher has for his guide are wrangling specialists.

Then followed a remarkable exhibition of dense ignorance of the Bible, which would be almost incredible were it not for his reported admissions.

"Would you consider it a violation of the standards of the Methodist Church to say that there is no passage in the Bible which says that Christ is called God?" inquired the court. "No," said the Rev. Methodist minister. "Nowhere in the Bible is any passage to be found that Christ is called God." And he reinforced his statement with the boast: "I passed an examination in this when I was eighteen years old, and I have not seen it yet." Pity the court did not suggest the opening of St. John's Gospel: "And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us: and we saw His glory, the glory as it were of the only begotten of the Father full of grace and truth." Or again, Romans 8, 32: "He spared not even His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all." Or the confession of Thomas: "My Lord and my God!" (John, 20, 28). But since his eighteenth year the Rev. Mr. Thomas had been reading and absorbing the works of specialists, whose specialty consists mainly in a destructive criticism of the Bible, leading to a rejection of all faith in the Bible, even in its manifest statements. Peter, the Fisherman, witnessed the works of Christ, and on the testimony of those works he saw no other conclusion than that Christ was God. The modern theological student or professor studies, not the works of Christ, but the works of iconoclasts, and gulps down the unwarranted deductions of scriptural sciolists, who have poisoned the fountains from which should spring up the living waters into life everlasting.

The Rev. Mr. Thomas, from his deep and prolonged studies of diluted Christianity, was emboldened to declare that, "To say Christ is God is a denial of the Methodist Church and every Christian Church in the world." And that his meaning might be clear he added, "no Christian Church in the world would say that Christ was God." "It is contrary to the law of our Church to say that Christ is God." And what reason does he allege for this? "Because if we say Christ is God we make Christ and God interchangeable terms." Had the Rev. Mr. Thomas spent a little of the time he devoted to the study of scriptural specialists to the study of elementary logic he would readily detect the flaw in his own statement, and the flaws in the sweeping conclusions of the learned works he has pondered over. If the word God is to be made interchangeable with the word Christ in the proposition Christ is God, the word God is to be taken in the same sense in the converted proposition that it has in the original. To say that Christ is God is to say that Christ has the nature of God, or that Christ is a Person having the Divine nature. Where, then, is the difficulty, we ask the Rev. Mr. Thomas, in saying as Christ is God, therefore a Person having the Divine nature of Christ? And that is all that the converted proposition would say; if the second statement is true, the first is true also. One almost blushes to have to explain so rudimentary a lesson in logic, but there is here no help for it.

"What does the term original sin mean in the Methodist Church?" persisted the court. "I do not know," said the Minister. I never heard anyone interpret it. I never heard it explained." This statement fairly takes one's breath away. A Minister in a Christian Church doesn't know what original sin is! Then he doesn't know the meaning of the Fall, the meaning of Redemption, the object of Christ's coming, the need of the regenerating waters of baptism. Then he is in ignorance of the whole scheme of redemption, of the merciful goodness of Christ, of the supernatural destiny of man. No wonder he will not dare call Christ God, for Christ's life and Christ's purposes are hidden from his purview. "The Lord of heaven and earth has hid these things from the wise and prudent, and has revealed them to little ones."

Yet with the confession of this appalling ignorance of the fundamentals of Christian belief, the Rev. Ernest Thomas flatters himself that he is a Christian minister and will continue to break the bread of doctrine to a wandering and scattered flock. It is an open secret that the views of the Rev. Ernest Thomas are shared by many churchmen. It were sad enough if they alone went astray. How distressing to think of their numerous following, who through no fault of theirs, are battenning on noxious pastures and slaking their thirst at polluted streams.

E. SPILLANE, S.J.

The Child and Frequent Communion

The story is told of General Jackson, that one night when his camp was close to the intrenchments of the foe, he called his staff and proposed to make a sudden sally on the enemy under cover of darkness. His officers demurred. Though convinced of their mistake, the general yielded, and no attack was made. But the same thought had likewise occurred to the enemy, and without delay it was put into execution. The consequence was a sad defeat and fearful slaughter in General Jackson's camp that night.

How often this story is repeated in the lives of our little ones! No sooner has the first dawn of reason begun than at once the soul of the child has become an open battle field, where Satan is encamped and opposed to him, are the host of Heaven. Upon us it largely depends whether grace shall have the first advantage or the tempter shall open the attack. Early Communion will bring upon that scene a Power which hell can not withstand.

But the first victory is not sufficient. To give the enemy no opportunity of retrieving his losses and recovering his position we are ordered to press our advantage and by frequent and daily Communion to ensure the final triumph.

Duty and charity alike, therefore, make it imperative that Holy Communion be administered at the first dawn of reason, and that we exert all our influence, in season and out of season, that it be received thereafter—not merely monthly or weekly, but as the decree postulates, frequently, and if possible, daily. Communion several times in the week, or daily, is not impossible nor impracticable. It is practiced in our parishes to-day and requires nothing more than zeal and some sacrifice on the part of priest and parent. "Compelle intrare," is the watchword our Holy Father himself has given us. The success of our parish work can best be gauged by the number of frequent and daily communicants whom we bring to the Table of the Lord.

Many of us realize but too little the strength of temptation as it presents itself to the child in the corrupt civilization which surrounds it from its earliest years. How often will it not return from its play in the streets with strange words upon its lips which, indeed, it may not understand, but which bring a blush to the mother's cheek, and send a thrill of fear to her heart. But what if the child has seen and knows and keeps the secret locked within its breast, while in the quiet moments it broods upon it until the first sin has been begotten! What then becomes of that paradise of God within its soul? A shadow has fallen upon it; a drought has withered it; the abyss of passion has been disclosed. With a strange, new, frightened look in its eyes the child has become a fugitive from before the face of God, whom it knows it has offended. Who knows what sins may follow that first transgression, and how familiar that habit may yet become. Confession alone is not sufficient.

There is one antidote which has not been used, which if given would have made that sin, if not impossible, at least most highly improbable. "This custom (i. e., of waiting until the age of 'ten or twelve' years, or even later)" the decree tells us, "became the cause of many evils. For it came to pass that the innocence of the age of childhood, torn from the embrace of Christ, was not nourished by the sap of the interior life; whence it also followed that youth, deprived of its all-powerful protection, surrounded by so many snares, on losing its innocence, fell headlong into vice before it had tasted of the Sacred Mysteries. Now, even if the First Communion is preceded by more diligent instruction, and a careful Sacramental Confession—which is not everywhere the case—nevertheless the loss of baptismal innocence is ever to be regretted, a loss which, had the Eucharist been received in more tender years, might perhaps have been avoided."

Early Communion is necessary for the children of the poor, brought up as they most frequently are, in the midst of vice, which solicits them to sin with its sensuous temptations from bill boards and posters; which lurks in the eye and falls from the tongue of their comrades of the street; which stares at them in its nudity and shameless obscenity when they least suspect it. No matter how carefully protected at home, unless preserved by the heavenly preventive of sin, the divine allayer of concupiscence, the manna with the sweetness of every delight, they too will most probably taste of that forbidden fruit and drink of those waters of death. They are soon made wise beyond their age and old before their teens.

Not less to be pitied are the children of the rich, with the worldliness and vanity to which so many are exposed. The theatres and amusements in which they participate are often merely allurements to sin. Their Catholic instinct, like that of their parents is carefully repressed, lest freely encouraged it might leap to their lips and protest in their lives, and so might come to mar their fortune. How many a home of the rich, where Catholic literature and Catholic journals, so indispensable for preserving the Catholic spirit in our day, never enter and where Catholic questions are learned only from an enemy's point of view. Magazines filled with false teaching, with slanderous misrepresentations, with sensuous stories and pictures that are often indecent or impure, lie scattered about upon the tables. How chilling such an atmosphere to every Christian aspiration, how fatal to the Supernatural life. Unfortunate children of the rich, poorest of the poor, who are brought up in such a home, how fearful the odds against you! How much you stand in need of the divine Consoler! How the allurements of His love alone, as He comes to you in Holy Communion, can effectually teach and help you to despise the world and all its vanities.

Poor and rich, once they have tasted the fruits of sin, whether found in its corruption in the street or picked for them with dainty fingers from the lap of luxury, their eyes have been opened, they are outcasts of a lost paradise.

Even should we wait only beyond the age of six or seven, where reason has already sufficiently developed to make mortal sin possible, our help may come too late. All the forces are leagued with the enemy. It is imperative that we should make the first attack. Else the coming of the Lord to that soul, as the prophet laments, "shall be as when one gathereth in the harvest that which remaineth . . . and the fruit thereof that shall be left upon it, shall be as one cluster of grapes, and as the shaking of the olive tree; two or three berries on the top of the bough." (Is. xvii, 5, 6).

From what has been said it is evident that an early First Communion is not enough. "Those who have charge of children must take the utmost care that after their First Communion the said children should approach the Holy Table very often, and if it be possible, even daily, as Jesus Christ and our Holy Mother Church desire it." (Art. VI.) As the danger is constant, so too the divine preventive of sin must be constantly employed, as far as this is possible. The Roman Catechism tells us that the sentiment of St. Augustine is that of all the Fathers of the Church who have treated this question, "Since you sin daily, partake daily of the antidote of sin."

Every confessor understands that if children must wait an entire month many mortal sins may be committed. We know how strong the passion of impurity is, how dreadful its urgency upon the senses which have once fallen a victim to it, how it awakens anew at every repeated suggestion from without, how it importunes the imagination and clamors for entrance at the portals of the soul. What wonderful effect frequent and daily Communion has upon the penitent thus afflicted, every confessor who has had experience with frequent and daily communicants is able to tell. The opinion of all is that the result produced is almost an elimination of mortal sin from the entire school, as far as the divine mandate, which comes to us through the Vicar of Christ, has been obeyed. Here alone is more than sufficient recompense for any priest who has hearkened to the voice of God.

In fact, to deny the divine effects of daily Communion upon children would be equivalently a denial of faith itself in the Blessed Sacrament. Holy Communion, the Church teaches us, protects the life of grace, frees from venial sin committed in the past and preserves from mortal sins that else might be committed in the future, increases sanctifying grace, and fills the heart with divine charity as its special gift. Need we wonder then that the Fathers and theologians have unanimously taught, what experience daily confirms, that no passion and no temptation can withstand the frequent reception of the Holy Eucharist.

"But they do not show these results, they are distracted, they are mischievous, they are unruly, they are disobedient." Such objections are often raised after the daily, or at least frequent Communion, has been reluctantly granted, with no slight misgivings concerning the wisdom of the Holy Spirit. A short trial, with little personal enthusiasm displayed in it, and the practice is discontinued. But give me the Christ-like lover of the little ones, who watches and guides and is ever careful gently to prevent or to correct the first irreverence, and all these objections will vanish into thin air. Let us be honest and lay the blame where it belongs—upon ourselves. Neither let us look for miracles to happen at once.

We may, however, for the sake of argument, take a case where no visible improvement seems to occur. What here is so aggravating to us will, in all probability, be at the most a venial sin in the child. In the meanwhile, by its daily Communions, mortal sin is constantly being prevented, especially that leprous malady of the soul, impurity.

Who can count the sins that shall most probably have been avoided, when the child at last has grown from boyhood into youth, and now goes forth into the world with a character formed and trained in that grandest of all schools, the school of the Eucharist. Even should that practice now be somewhat decreased in its frequency, yet it will not entirely be laid aside—and should the one thing to be dreaded come to pass, and should that soul fall into sin, yet it will rise again a hundred times more readily than any other. Let us go so far as to suppose that it shall at length forsake its God entirely, yet the memory of those happy days spent in the Heavenly Father's house, the beauty, the sweetness, the joy of those Eucharistic banquets in the long ago, the yearning once more to feel the thrill and delight of that divine embrace will all come back to it, and, like the prodigal, it will return to cast itself before the feet of Christ, and be taken to His Sacred Heart, and the white robe will be brought and the Eucharistic Banquet will be spread for it once more.

"It has been my universal experience," says a noted missionary, "that where there was the memory of a past brightened by the early and frequent reception of the Lord, as far as that was possible in former days, I have ever found but little difficulty in bringing back that soul to God; but where no such memory existed to charm and attract, that conversion was most difficult and remained most doubtful."

I have taken an extreme case. One which we may well suppose will rarely occur. Had I undertaken instead to speak of the countless fruits of sanctity that will be produced, of the vocations that will blossom forth, of the apostles that will be created, of the thousand graces of the Holy Spirit which will not be made void, I might, indeed, have asked for the glowing coal of the seraph to touch my lips, that I might speak not all unworthily of the power of so great a Sacrament as that of the Body and Blood of our Lord when daily received, from the newly breaking dawn of first intelligence, with the baptismal freshness still upon the soul, even to the consummation of life everlasting, which is the ultimate fulfilment of the Eucharistic promise.

I have confined myself to only a single advantage out of many that will accrue to the early and frequent communicant. There are others so vast and so important that one of them alone, which I have not had space even to mention here, has inspired an entire pastoral letter of one of the most ardent champions among the hierarchy of Europe in the cause of Early and Frequent Communion.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Official Germany and the Catholic Church

The splendid Catholic congresses of Germany were, during the Kulturkampf, more or less of a warlike character. But very soon constructive work began to be of prime importance, though the enemy was never lost sight of. This year's congress, held in the beginning of August in "Golden Mainz," is the last before the new elections for the Reichstag, which will take place after a few months. Very appropriately, therefore, its president, Count Galen, in his opening address pointed out to the listening thousands the present situation of ecclesiastical politics in Germany. It will be of interest for the readers of AMERICA to learn at least the main points of this eloquent speech. An able article in Germania, entitled "Wo Stehen Wir?" (where do we stand?) offers additional information:

"With admiration the world beholds the many works and organizations of charity which have been begotten of these yearly gatherings," it says. "Our present fifty-eighth convention will follow in the footsteps of its predecessors. The problems which in our days confront the Church will be discussed. But we shall not fail to give utterance to our wishes and grievances, and we have many of them. I need only mention the Jesuits and at once we are set aglow. Anarchists, Freemasons and Socialists may combine and organize themselves as much as they please, but the Jesuits—that's something else; if left alone they might assist in realizing the word of Emperor William I, that religion must be preserved in the nation. They must, therefore, not give retreats to the recruits. The Redemptorists, Lazarists and the Ladies of the Sacred Heart are under the same restrictions. The Federal Council willed it so forty years ago. The Federal Council knew neither the Jesuits nor Redemptorists, and has not learned anything about them in these forty years. And are the other religious better off? In Prussia our Sisters cannot establish the most insignificant convent without the express consent of two Ministers of State, and in all their movements they remain under constant police supervision, while the Protestant deaconesses are entirely free. We claim full liberty for our religious and claim it in Prussia and in all other states of the empire."

These remnants of a Kulturkampf law do not remain only on paper. During the current year a sisterhood, working in the German colonies, where the Prussian laws are not in force, wished to establish in Prussia a school of domestic arts to train women for the German colonies; recommendations were obtained from three different colonial authorities, one of which declared such a school a necessity; but the Prussian Ministers did not see fit to grant the permission.

"The pen refuses to describe," says the above mentioned article, "the brutality with which the Berlin police treat Sisters charged with the care of poor neglected children, the policemen going so far as even to examine the beds of the Sisters. But if in the army a young Jew has not been promoted as rapidly as expected, the Reichstag has to spend two precious days on the matter, and the youngster is described from the nose to the tip of his little toe, and is glorified as the Moltke of the next generation.

"France shows us," continues Count Galen, "what this tendency must lead to, and unfortunately the same parties that wrought the destruction in France are more and more uniting their forces in our own dear Fatherland for a death struggle against the Church. The fight against the denominational schools is on in all the states of the empire, and step by step the governments yield before the pressure of anti-Christian influence."

Prussia's latest step in this ignominious retreat is very significant. Not a year ago the Emperor paid a visit to the Benedictine monastery of Beuron and addressed to the abbot and monks his famous Beuron speech, which gained him so many sympathizers among the adherents of positive religion and roused such a storm of contradiction and insult on the part of Liberals and infidels. "I look to you to help me keep my people religious. The twentieth century has set loose ideas which can be successfully combated only with the help of religion and the support of Heaven." Now the government of the same monarch has used all the pressure of its influence to eliminate the clause of obligatory religious instruction from the law which makes the so-called "continuation schools" obligatory—schools which offer a few hours a week of instruction to those young people who have finished the elementary schools but do not attend the regular higher institutions. When the government insisted that such a clause was detrimental, even the Conservative party, otherwise the champions of positive religion among the Protestants, swung around at the last moment and left the Centre alone in the struggle to keep the growing generation religious. It was a clear victory of Liberalism, and the Socialists will reap the benefit of it.

At the same time Liberalism and modern paganism scored another victory. So far cremation, though allowed in several German States, was forbidden in Prussia. But more than a hundred cremation societies kept up a ceaseless agitation. Several times the attempt to introduce a favorable bill into the Landtag had been rejected with scorn by the government. But the Ministry was changed. Under government pressure and with the assistance of the Socialists, a bill allowing the erection of crematories passed the Lower House with a majority of two votes and the Upper House with one of six votes—a moral defeat of its promoters—and the Emperor affixed his signature.

The Kingdom of Würtemberg has never treated its Catholic citizens on really equal terms with the Protestants. It plans another positive blow now. The country is largely agricultural and the greater part of the Catholics live in little towns and hamlets. It leaked out that the government had conceived the idea of uniting the smaller country parishes into larger ones to simplify the administration and reduce the expenses. The loud and indignant protest of the Catholics elicited a declaration which was meant to be a denial, but did not allay the apprehensions of the Catholic Würtembergers.

Just when Count Galen was about to deliver the address by which the great convention, with its sixteen speeches in the general and perhaps ten times that number in the special meetings, was to be brought to a close, the report reached him that another act of intolerance had been perpetrated. A religious congregation of Brothers desired to establish a hospital at Ems, known as the famous health resort of so many royal personages. Count Galen told the assembly that the parties interested had been informed the two Ministers could not see the advisability of such an establishment at Ems.

"In the race of everyday occupations," says Germania, "many a one does not see the ordinary milestones along the highway of national life. But events like these should not be overlooked by any one. They are symptomatic; they show what the Catholic Church has to expect from official Germany." F. S. BETTEN, S.J.

IN MISSION FIELDS

MANUAL TRAINING SCHOOLS IN INDIA

The Salesian Bulletin for September, 1911, quotes from the Catholic Register the following gratifying account of the success of the manual training school established at Tanjore, British India:

Much conflicting advice is given by various writers and economists as to the methods for developing a steady industrial population in our Indian Empire. Whatever policy may be precisely the best is perhaps yet to be discovered, for the difficulties of governing and civilizing in India are recognized as constituting some of the hardest problems that lie before the administrative body. However, a great deal is being done by the Government departments to promote Industrial Institutes, and among those receiving a grant is the School of Arts and Trades which our confrères are directing at Tanjore, in the Madras Presidency. Although but a few years in existence, it appears to have made great headway, as the reader may judge from the following account of its prize-day. His Lordship the Bishop of Mylapore presided.

A great gathering of the natives filled the large playground to witness the acting of the boys and enjoy the music, but the item of real importance was the report read by the Director. After his compliments to the guests, he went on to say: The success of the pupils of the Industrial School in their recent examinations was very gratifying. The boys of the Artisan class, first division, that we sent up for the Government examinations (two for weaving, and six for cabinet making, elementary grade) were all successful. I may here make mention also of four certificates of merit (first class) won by our school for weaving, cabinet making, drawing and for a Chatterton Loom Museum; in short, for all the subjects taught in our school, in the recent Industrial Exhibition held in Tanjore in 1910. Similar certificates were also awarded to individual pupils and teachers of our Institute. The conduct, application and progress of the boys who attend the parish school are also reported to be satisfactory.

Our weaving factory, which started work with only two looms in the first year, has gradually increased, and is now enriched with eight European hand looms, all after the Chatterton model. The young artisans are trained in the manufacture of various kinds of checks of the Calicut model, German shawls, Indian carpets, chair canvases, towels, napkins, bed-sheets, etc. Samples of these can be seen exhibited in the school office room. As regards the work turned out in our cabinet-making workshops, the numerous orders received from the Government offices and other public local bodies speak for themselves. The ability and skill of the young artisans trained under our care can be judged from the various articles of furniture that are now exhibited for the inspection of our friends and patrons. A suitable building for our workshops, a sawing machine and more tools for the carpentry department are to be our next acquisitions. . . . We have also started a night school to impart instructions in the chief subjects, and for that, too, we are expecting Government recognition. Another application will be submitted for raising our school to the intermediate grade, so as to provide intermediate training for those who have passed the elementary.

The report then mentions several visits received from distinguished persons, and gives a final word on the exhibition of work done. This display was visited by large numbers, including all the municipal authorities of Tanjore. The approbation of the Deputy Collector and the Chairman is worth recording. They said: "It is a blessing for this country to have an industrial institution such as this; for a well-trained artisan, provided his conduct is good, can nowadays find employment in any town, whereas many students who may have even passed the matriculation, cannot find a suitable position."

Any one who reads the above report will be ready to admire the labors of the few Sons of Don Bosco who have gone out to Tanjore to assist in the Christian education of the young of the poorer classes. There are, doubtless, many difficulties besides the climate and language, and this consideration makes their advance all the more praiseworthy. To give the poorer classes the means of becoming skilled and successful workmen is surely one of the principal aims of our administrators in the great work of reform which is in progress in our Indian Empire.

First Factory Law in Japan

The vast majority of workingmen, and especially workingwomen are ridiculously underpaid, overworked and ill-fed in Japan. In the matter of nutrition the state of things is revolting. An outlay of energy is exacted out of all proportion with the nourishment obtainable. The result is that in three or four years the health of the children and young girls is irreparably destroyed, or they quit work. Hence new apprentices have to be found and poor work results. It is calculated that Japanese workingwomen in the textile industries of silk or cotton produce on an average only $530 a year, whereas in England, their work would produce $1,530. Now the textile industry of Japan employs 415,000 women, or rather young girls, 30,000 of whom are under fourteen years of age. The average daily wage of the latter is from six to seven cents, of the older ones from eleven to thirteen cents, irrespective of night or day work, and that ordinarily for twelve consecutive hours of work without a break. Evidently the output of such workers must be very small.

In proportion as the industrial enterprises of the Empire develop the concern of the Government for the workers increased. In 1896 a draft of a Factory Law was attempted, and in 1902 it was submitted to the Parliament. Then it dropped out of sight, either because the employers were against it, or the Japanese-Russo war caused it to be pigeon-holed. On the other hand, as the workingmen count for little numerically, no pressure could be exerted. However, the Government had no desire to wait till the question became acute, and so took the initiative. Besides, the rapid growth of manufactures made it imperative.

In February, 1910, a Factory Law was presented in the Lower House. But everyone agreed that it had been carelessly drawn up. Two points especially called for criticism: the Government control was too arbitrary, and the restrictions impracticable, both as regards the hours of labor, and the night work of women and children. On the other hand, had a law after western ideas been drawn up, it would have provoked a rebellion of the employers, and they would not have observed its provision: Hence the Bill was withdrawn.

In the month of October following an amended bill was published, but before submitting it to Parliament it was laid before the leading manufacturers, the Chambers of Commerce and a number of experts. Naturally it met with opposition. Some rejected the law on general principles, namely, that the Government was exceeding its powers, or that the law was premature for Japan and would only excite the ridicule of other nations. Others again found fault with the powers vested in the local authority, and finally the mill owners declared that the abolition of night work by women and children would ruin their business. They called attention to the fact that Europeans were establishing factories in India and China, so as to avail themselves of the low wages paid in those parts, and that such concurrence would put their Japanese rivals out of business.

The study of the Bill by 110 business associations resulted in loading it down with amendments. However, it was passed in the Lower House on March 2, but with one important modification. The Government wanted to apply the law to all shops employing at least 10 workers. It would thus act favorably for 700,000 employees; but the House restricted it to shops with 15 workers, and thus only 100,000 employees would be benefited by the law. The Lower House was supported by the Lords, but only after a very hard fight. The result was, on the whole, a victory for the Government and the Bill was passed.

This Bill differs widely from similar acts in occidental nations. It gives no day of rest in the week, and does not limit strictly the hours of labor. Again, though the Government professed that its principal purpose was that of sanitation, so as to check the progress of consumption among the employees, more than 10 per cent. of whom are affected, not to speak of other maladies which are destroying the working population, yet the law as it stands concerns itself only with cases of declared illness, and takes no measures to secure the ventilation or other hygienic necessities in the shops, dwellings or food of the employees; nor does it provide for protection against accidents, etc. In the twenty-five articles of which it is composed there is no mention of any of these primary requisites.

It is now decreed that no child under twelve can be employed in a shop or factory. Against this clause a protest was entered by the Boards of Education, who demanded that the obligatory term of primary schooling should be insisted upon before the child should be put to work. But the needs of business were considered too important. Another provision is that boys under sixteen and women, no matter what their age, shall not work more than twelve hours a day, or at night between 10 and 4 o'clock, without "special reason," two words which make ducks and drakes of the law. Again, women and children are to have two holidays a month, and a rest of at least thirty minutes after six hours' work. Moreover, they are not to be employed at anything dangerous or unhealthy. After fifteen years, night work of women and children is to cease. Rules are laid down for sickness and accident and the extent of surveillance by the local and central authorities is specified, and penalties for infractions are imposed. The annual expense for the application of the law is fixed at $150,000.

Though very imperfect, the law is looked upon with great disfavor by the manufacturers, and there are no labor unions among the factory workers to resist oppression on the part of the employers. On account of the resistance to the Bill the Government did not dare face the subject of wages. The real difficulty, however, is with the parents. They are so harassed with the trials and privations of their state that they hand their children over to this industrial slavery. It is part of their struggle for existence. However, the future is not without hope. The sudden change of house labor to factory labor is something the country was not prepared for. The transition cannot be accomplished without a certain amount of suffering. Unfortunately there is not a superabundance of philanthropy floating about in the hearts of the great employers. Indeed, the Government seems to be the only humanizing influence at work. In the impossibility of adjusting the claims of labor and capital at one stroke the legislature has endeavored to get what it could, and has applied whatever remedies were available to diminish the hardships of the working classes. It is to be hoped that with time the great problem will be satisfactorily solved.

Conditions in Nicaragua

GRANADA, NICARAGUA, August 5, 1911.

Undoubtedly, Nicaragua by nature, has a privileged location in the world. The canal was our golden dream, but Panama took away all our hopes of prosperity from its colossal construction. Nevertheless, we believe it has had a great part in the beneficial attitude of the United States of America towards Nicaragua, the fortifications of the canal being useless should these countries continue on their present road to bankruptcy. It is then to the interest of the United States to advance our prosperity, in order to make us able to maintain and defend our integrity and neutrality. For this reason we are entirely satisfied with the American influence in the government of the commonwealth, and we expect that, once the loan in perspective is signed and approved, the remains of past despotism will disappear. It would be impossible under the influence of the great American Eagle that anything but liberty could prevail.

The history of Nicaragua presents an interesting lesson of sociology. We have seen here confirmed the truth that every country has the government it deserves, and in consequence tyranny cannot prevail when the people have an elevated standard of morality. Corruption in its ideas made this country the natural prey of despotism.

This period of ignominy is a matter of common knowledge; but we must speak of an error of no small political consequence, which in this long reign of tyranny has been poisoning the public mind. It has been believed here that the evil we lamented consisted only in the presence of Zelaya in power, and that his sway once destroyed, all things would regain their former position in the orderly and prosperous fabric of the commonwealth. When one endeavored to draw people away from this error, they laughed at the admonition as bigotry, showing thus their sad intellectual mediocrity. But Providence watches over our steps, and we expect that the remains of past despotism will be nothing but the material proof of the necessity for annihilating tyranny and of a moral regeneration of society. The political affairs of the republic are in the hands of the military; and they naturally do all in their power to maintain themselves at any risk.

To this is due what we have in our "Asamblea Constituyente." As a Conservative tyrant is a contradiction, because a Conservative is obliged by his creed to maintain order and liberty founded on the influence of religion on public conscience, the first thing they do is to proclaim Liberal principles. This the national Assembly has done, dictating a constitution opposed to the vote of the nation, which publicly petitioned for a Catholic constitution. In the debates they have employed intrigues and threats, thus defeating the Catholic elements of the Assembly.

In social and religious spheres things are not different from the political. A Catholic reaction is to be noted in the country it is true; but we need to maintain and increase it, and we need the cooperation of religious orders, whose influence on society is well appreciated by statesmen who love their country. We hope that, in the near future, Jesuits, Dominicans; Salesians and other religious will come here to spread the light of the Gospel, and to apply its doctrines to every part of our national life. In this respect, however, there is the fear that the public officials, who have, as we have seen manifested in the deliberations of the constitution, an anti-Catholic tendency, will not leave the doors of the nation open for the friars. It would have been impossible if they had their wish; but happily the activity displayed by Catholics has hindered, as far as possible, the detestable exercise of so impious a theory of government. In the proposed constitution they guaranteed liberty of association . . . in a "liberal" spirit (read French or Portuguese manner). The Catholic Press protested and proved the inconsequence of a constitution proclaiming freedom of worship and prohibiting at the same time one of the demonstrations of the Catholic Faith. Thus it happened that in the first debates they rectified the error and gave us entire freedom of association.

We have just read Cardinal Gibbons' speech at his Jubilee celebration, and it has made us think of the difference existing between the United States and this country. There a Catholic Cardinal may say of a Protestant nation: "The State holds over the spiritual rulers the ægis of its protection without interfering with the sacred and God-given rights of conscience." Here, in a Catholic nation, Catholics could not utter such words. It is prohibited by the constitution to sanction any worship whatever, and we should be thankful if we could say only that both "Church and State move on parallel lines," because in a Catholic country, be it by character, temperament or nature, it is a fact that "a free Church in a free State" has come to mean "antagonism between the civil and religious authorities." This, history proclaims.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

From the Primate of Spain

The Cardinal Archbishop of Toledo to the Reverend Editor.

Rev. Father:—

I rejoice that the Catholic review AMERICA has entrusted to Don Norberto Torcal the care of Spanish topics. Long accustomed to journalistic polemics, clear-headed, an indefatigable worker and a fervent Catholic, his articles will faithfully reflect, I have no doubt, our social, political and religious condition. Thanks to him, the readers of AMERICA will become acquainted with our true situation; they will know that Spain is not that half-barbarous land pictured in the darkest colors by novelists and tourists, who are swayed, perhaps, by motives to which the traditional Catholicity of the Spanish people does not appeal. I congratulate you, therefore, for having chosen the President of the Associated Press to write on Spanish affairs, for he is one of our most distinguished journalists. I also avail myself of an occasion so timely to offer myself as

Your affectionate and humble servant in Christ Jesus, ✠ EL CARD. AGUIRRE.

The Seizure of Tripoli

United Italy ended the fiasco of its Jubilee by branding on its name a reproach that it can never efface. Either on its own initiative or prompted by some other power—no one yet can tell—it has leaped without warning into a conflict which may set the world on fire. It gave Constantinople twenty-four hours to surrender Tripoli, and the next day it was sinking transports and bombarding towns. All this in spite of the fact that a week ago it was lamenting its inability to hold its long-expected and loudly trumpeted Peace Congress—alleging the outbreak of cholera as an excuse. The conclusion for most people will be that preparations were then being made for war.

Its unexpected action in bringing about this crisis has evoked a most bitter and angry condemnation from all the Great Powers, who, however, are not above reproach in such matters themselves. But, on the other hand, it is not surprising that Italy should have yielded to the temptation of securing new possessions. Has it not spent the whole year rejoicing in a robbery which was infinitely more shameful than the invasion of Tripoli; the seizure of the Papal States? But that crime is forgotten, and only its most recent offence is visited with condemnation.

It alleges several excuses for its mad outburst. One is that the measure was adopted in the interest of civilization. But to sweep away all considerations of decency, justice, law and order, without which civilization cannot exist, is to destroy the very foundations of civilization. It is to adopt the methods of a savage tribe.

The needs of commerce, of territorial expansion, the desirability of providing a nearby place for the thousands of emigrants who are every year flocking to Argentine and elsewhere, are also offered as apologies. But though each and all of them may be good enough in themselves, they can never justify the means that were employed to bring them about.

The most extraordinary palliation of the aggression is that the possession of Tripoli would accrue to the advancement of Christianity, and some enthusiastic or sarcastic writer describes it as a war of the cross against the crescent, in which France and Spain and Italy are the champions of the cross. But none of those countries could well be considered as furnishing crusaders if judged by the attitude of their present rulers towards the Church. Fallières, for instance, on his recent visit to Africa was very courteous to the Mohammedan religionists who flocked around him, and very lavish in his promises of protection, while at the very same time he was signing proscriptions against the priests and monks and nuns of his native country, and his chief assistants in the Government were announcing their intention of extirpating all religion from France. In brief, if we are to be guided by past experience, the future of the Catholic missions in Africa is by no means assured unless some saint arrives to convert the invaders.

Irish Opinion on "The Irish Players"

The Dublin Leader, which since its foundation, a dozen years ago, has been the most influential propagandist of the Irish Revival, devotes the first page of its issue of September 16 to Mr. Yeats and his "Abbey Theatre, which rather anti-Irish institution is to be hawked in America." It wonders "how the Irish Societies will take the infamous 'Playboy,'" and presents for their consideration Mr. Yeats' recent utterance, that he had found on a former visit, "a great school of Irish boys in a religious house in California . . . thinking almost the same thoughts that young Catholic boys would have thought in Dublin. The Irish imagination," said Yeats, "keeps certain of its qualities wherever it is, and if we are to give it, as we hope, a new voice and a new memory, we shall have to make many journeys." But no one need fear that Ireland will accept such a guide for its Catholic youth, for, continues the writer, "though he has humbugged a few people here and a lot of people in England, this country either ignored him or laughed at him." Ridicule is heaped on "the Irish Bunthorne," who, after preaching extreme politics and lofty ideals, accepted a government pension, and continued with "his new voice and new memory" to pose as having a "Mission."

That the "Mission" of Messrs. Yeats, Synge and Shaw is to de-Catholicize Ireland is the opinion of the editor of the Irish Ecclesiastical Record, who deems their work "part and parcel of a pagan renaissance." Mr. Yeats made an open avowal to that effect, and "Mr. Synge was the originator of a class of plays which the critic of the Pall Mall Gazette described as not remarkable for wit or humor or genius, but rather as distorted pictures of human nature and, in many cases, 'photographs of bestial stupidity and depravity.' " Dr. Hogan's charge that these writers "seem to bear a continuous grudge against the Catholic Church" and are trying "to effect by turning movements what their predecessors failed to accomplish by frontal attack," and that "the coarseness of their insults to the Catholic peasantry of Ireland is as inartistic as it is offensive," will not appear exaggerated to those who know both the plays and the peasants. The "Playboy," reiterating that he murdered his father, says, "I did surely, and that the Holy Immaculate Virgin may intercede for his soul"; and another glorifies a man who "got six months, God rest him, for maiming ewes, and he a great warrant to tell stories of holy Ireland till he'd have the old women shedding down tears about their feet." There are reams of such blasphemous caricatures, and yet the writers have apparently persuaded themselves and their friends that they know the Irish peasantry. Synge tells in his essay on "Kerry" how a Kerry fish-dealer insisted that he (Synge) must be a Kerryman, so perfect was his accent, and likewise a fish merchant, so much did he know of fish. He was unconscious that the Kerryman was laughing at him. "These people," says Dr. Hogan, "have no hold on Ireland," and the Leader assures us that Ireland is laughing at them. Neither will they gain a hold on any here who respect decency and the verities.

Monsignor Duchesne

As far back as February, 1911, we were called to task with considerable asperity by an admirer of Mgr. Duchesne, and were bidden to beware of casting the least suspicion on the orthodoxy of that distinguished ecclesiastic. We had not been so temerarious. We had merely made note of the feeling that had manifested itself in France at the time when Mgr. Duchesne was honored with a fauteuil among the Forty Immortals of the Academie Française. His literary ability, and not his accuracy of doctrine won him that honor. But M. Lamy, the Directeur Général of the Correspondant, who addressed the illustrious assembly after the new member had taken his seat, referred somewhat playfully, but pointedly to the habit of satirical and caustic writing, which is sometimes remarked in Mgr. Duchesne's contributions to history. He called the monsignor "the least believing of believers," a man who had "the soul of a believer and the intelligence of a skeptic," and defined his work as "a tempest let loose which respects nothing, and leaves nothing standing except what is colossal." Not a few went so far as to say that "he was admitted to the Academie a little bit as a Churchman, and a little bit otherwise."

It is with the greatest regret now that we find that all these academic utterances were not mere persiflage. On September 1st, 1911, the Sacred Consistorial Congregation declared that Duchesne's work on "The History of the Ancient Church" must not be tolerated or admitted in seminaries, even as a book of reference. The reasons that call for this sweeping condemnation are given. To quote only a few, they are: "The studied and continued reticences (which indeed are admitted by the author himself) regarding matters sometimes of the first importance, especially when they bear on the supernatural; the doubt he casts on others, or the manner in which he expounds them. He not only fails to give the true idea of the history of the Church, but falsifies it and distorts it enormously by presenting the Church as though she were destitute of those supernatural charismata on which she is based and without which she cannot be explained." He vilifies the martyrs and extols their persecutors; he belittles the Fathers of the Church, and dismisses some of them as of no account; he describes the battle with the great heresies that arose in the Church as misunderstandings that might easily have been settled, and treats in a very objectionable manner the cultus of the Blessed Virgin, the Unity of the Church, etc. The "History" is denounced as dangerous, and the results of reading it disastrous.

It is a sad story and shows how far a man may wander away when he prefers the glimmer of his own mind to the light of revelation.

Catholic Colleges

A census recently taken by AMERICA of the young men attending five Catholic colleges in Greater New York indicates that, all told, they number but six hundred. These figures represent, be it understood, the sum total of Catholic boys in the largest city in the land who, after finishing their high-school course, are now continuing their studies in a Catholic college. As to how many of New York's young Catholics are getting their education at secular or Protestant seats of learning, or are attending Catholic colleges that lie outside the State, we have no data. But we would call attention to the fact, humiliating as it is, that out of a Catholic population of nearly two millions there are only six hundred young men, or less than four per cent., who are securing, in their own city, a college education under Catholic influences, though opportunities to do so are abundant.

A large majority, moreover, of the boys who enter the Catholic high schools of New York fail for various reasons to begin the college course. Many, indeed, fall by the wayside long before finishing even their high-school training. Out of a class, for instance, entering the first year of high school one hundred and fifty strong, it was observed that but one-third of that number graduated from the high school four years later; only twenty-five returned to begin as freshmen, and but fifteen stayed to receive their college diploma.

Whether the scanty interest in higher education manifested by New York Catholics is also conspicuous in their co-religionists throughout the country, we are not prepared just now to say. New England, at any rate, seems to be offering a more encouraging spectacle, for in Massachusetts two Catholic institutions of classical learning have altogether, it is reported, some seven hundred students in their college classes.

With regard to the explanation of this regrettable apathy on the part of Catholics, it may be due to poverty, selfishness, coldness of faith, indifference to learning, or to all these causes combined. Be this as it may, it is certain that without a college education, and especially a good course in Catholic philosophy, our young men will never be able to take with safety and distinction the place in the civic, social and religious life of their communities to which our numbers and advantages justly entitle us.

The Cardinal's Holiday

The unfailing tact and wisdom of His Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, has again come to the rescue in what might have been an embarrassing situation in the Monumental City.

Last June, on the occasion of his Jubilee, a splendid reception was given to him, in which clergymen of every denomination and representatives of the City, State and Federal Governments vied with each other in paying him honor. Baltimore can never do too much for the one who has reflected so much honor on the city. In the month of October the ecclesiastical celebration was to take place, and as the enthusiasm of the city is still unabated it was proposed to make the 16th a general holiday. Business was to be suspended and the schools closed. But at a meeting of the Ministerial Union, in which the various Protestant denominations were represented by 100 clergymen, it was resolved to protest against the project. As the celebration was altogether ecclesiastical, it was not fair, they said, to force all other religious bodies to participate in it. Unfortunately, the First Branch of the Municipal Legislature had already passed the measure, with only two dissenting votes, and their action would be surely endorsed if it went higher up. At this point the Cardinal intervened, and, while expressing his unbounded pleasure and happiness at such a remarkable declaration of regard, he intimated that it would not be in keeping with his views to have a general holiday for the entire city. The legislators breathed freely; a storm was averted, and the parsons themselves were protected from making what would have been a very unpopular protest.

The action of the Cardinal in this instance, as in many others, is educational in its character, and might well be taken to heart by the dissenting brethren themselves. Not to cite other opportunities where their benignity might exert itself, the Borough of Brooklyn will afford them an excellent chance to return the compliment to the distinguished Churchman of Baltimore.

Every year Brooklyn is in a flutter over its Sunday School Parade. It takes place not on Sunday, nor on Saturday, the usual holiday, but on some other day of the week, which the fervent promoters insist upon, even if it closes all the schools, and puts out on the streets thousands of children who have nothing to do with the parade. Every year the pageant grows in importance, and even Presidents of the United States have lent the splendor of their presence to enhance the glory of the celebration. Remonstrances, and petitions, and protests have been made that it is not fair to compel children who are not Protestants to give up their schools for a strictly Protestant demonstration, but all to no use. Here is the chance for these pious parsons to imitate the graciousness of the Cardinal, and to declare that they do not want to do in Brooklyn what they so vigorously protested against in Baltimore.

Praiseworthy Plan for Catholic High Schools

Word comes to us from Cincinnati of a plan which may prove to be the solution of a perplexing problem that has long worried Catholics. We have successfully met the difficulties that faced us in organizing an elementary school system, and our parochial grammar schools are conceded everywhere fully to meet the requirements of the State schools' standards. But the burden entailed in establishing and in supporting these training places for our Catholic children is a heavy one, no matter how loyal the spirit that inspires the carrying of it. So heavy is it that one dreads the further exactions surely to be put upon our people in the development of the Catholic school system through its second stage—that of the high school.

Yet this problem is upon us. For some time the feeling has been growing in Catholic educational circles that ampler provision for Catholic high school training is imperatively demanded. Too many deserving and ambitious pupils, after finishing the parish school, are forced to choose the alternative of going without a higher education or attending the public high schools. The latter course offends the instinct of the Catholic parent who appreciates as he should the necessity of securing for his child a religious training in every phase of his educational progress; yet, since free, endowed colleges and academies are the rare exception among us, it is only the fairly well-to-do among Catholics who can afford the expense involved in sending their children to our high-class colleges and convents.

Many attempts have been made of late to secure for all who may have the capacity, and the will to pursue it, the opportunity of advanced training in high school. Some zealous pastors have added a year or two of high school studies to the existing grammar school grades. But the result is generally admitted to be as unsatisfactory as makeshifts are wont to prove. The plan multiplies small high schools of an inferior grade, devoid of adequate equipment as well as of suitably trained teachers and with an insufficient number of pupils to follow properly the ordinary course of standard high school training. It is, too, a common experience to find students of such quasi-high schools obliged to begin their course anew should opportunity come to them to continue their work in a standard college or academy.

The Cincinnati scheme, tried this year for the first time, appears to deserve the credit of a true and practical solution of the problem. The Reverend William Conway, pastor of the Assumption parish in that city, proposes, with the assistance of his people, to send those boys and girls who wish to go on with their studies after completing the regular grammar grades in his parochial school to adjoining colleges and academies, and to pay for them. In September thirty of his boys and girls, who completed the parochial school curriculum last June, entered the high school attached to the Jesuit College and the Notre Dame Academy in Cincinnati, under the new conditions.

The correspondent who sends us information regarding the experiment quotes these as the reasons advanced by Father Conway to win the consent of his parishioners to his project:

"First of all, the children will have all the opportunities of a first-class school, at no expense to the parish of new buildings, equipment and teachers, it being much cheaper to pay merely tuition (at special rates) than to organize and carry on a high school. Moreover, this arrangement frees the pastors from all the trouble and labor of trying to become high school superintendents, for which some persons have no special desire, and leaves them free for their own parochial duties—in many cases already onerous enough. The plan, too, does away with a scheme proposed in some places of taxing the faithful to establish diocesan high schools, a burden, one may affirm, not to be lightly imposed upon the already heavily taxed Catholic people."

The experiment deserves to succeed. Besides these advantages, it will possess another not inconsiderable one: If generally adopted it will fill our present Catholic higher schools and enable them to grow and develop until they become a credit to the Catholic name.

Practical Politics in Spain

Some pious Spanish Catholics, as our readers will recall from the perusal of our Spanish correspondence, were emphatically persuaded that the best way to remedy their country's economic and other troubles was to retire absolutely from all participation in public affairs and elections, and thus permit such an utter demoralization of the national life that the people would be driven by a sense of their desperate state to a heroic moral and political reformation. Where they found historical or rational proofs or precedents for their attitude and expectations it would be hard to say, but they sat securely, if not calmly, behind their walls and hopefully waited for the catastrophe which should summon them to the rescue of the tottering State.

Days passed by; it did not come; they fumed, but kept on waiting. But in the meanwhile some good souls with more modest pretensions to piety and political foresight were uneasy in conscience, and were eager to know whether wisdom had really been monopolized by the stay-at-homes. Their uneasiness found expression in a query to the Holy See. The answer, which was communicated to the Spanish hierarchy by the Papal Nuncio on July 20, 1911, and has been given to the public press, is as follows: "The rule of action about which they inquire was formulated for the sake of eliminating false and inappropriate interpretations of former pontifical utterances, and is to be taken as it stands, without reference to any preceding documents."

Here is the rule:

"At elections all good Catholics are bound to support not only their own candidates where circumstances advise the nomination of such, but also, when such nomination is not advisable, those other candidates who hold out guarantees for the good of religion and the country, so as to secure the election of the greatest possible number of worthy persons. To cooperate by one's action or inaction towards the ruin of the social order in the hope that a better condition of things will arise from such a catastrophe would be a reprehensible attitude which, on account of its deadly effects, would become almost treason to Church and country."

AT THE DAHLIA SHOW

The Dahlia Show of the American Institute has been an annual affair for these many years. It brings together a number of dahlia specialists who vie with one another in the display of the choicest and most novel specimens of their favorite for the delectation of the visitor and, incidentally as it were, for the possession of the coveted prizes which the Institute offers for numbers, varieties and excellence.

This year, the show was kept up to the high standard of former years, 'tis said; but we can testify that it was kept open a little too long, for some of the specimens looked very forlorn, bedraggled and dispirited before the lights were mercifully turned off. Those specimens ought to have been renewed or removed before the man at the door clutched our "four bits"; for their woebegone appearance hurt the rest of the display.

Having thus relieved our pent up emotions, we are ready to take another close and careful look at the dahlias. As in bonnets, so in dahlias the fashions change. Time was, and not so very long ago (for we have no intention of confessing to a charge of excessive antiquity), when almost the only specimens commonly seen were the "show dahlias," as they are called, big, double, solid-colored blooms, as starched and formal as the crinolines of the sixties. Why is it that such dahlias always wear an artificial air, as if they had been made to order from fragments of stiffened paper? Perhaps the readiest answer from some friend of theirs may be that they don't; but to us, owing doubtless to our defective perception of their charms, their unbending stiffness is a blemish.

Then came the "fancy dahlias," whose severe primness of outline was toned down by stripes and flecks of color which softened their expression without detracting from their dignified reserve. It was a great stride forward when some floral genius brought out the first "decorative dahlia," whose gently yielding petals, as rich and as varied as if chosen from some grand storehouse for oriental velvets, gave to its glorious double blossoms a certain gentleness, so to speak, which the haughty "show" could not claim.

Everybody, of course, likes the little pompons. In the first place, they look up at you in a very friendly way, they never, never, stare or glare, as do some of the big aristocrats of the dahlia world. Then they do not grow weary in their glad work of pushing out more and yet more blossoms in a wonderful variety of hues from spotless white to the deepest and darkest maroon. Three or four blooms with a couple of fern fronds for company, and lo! a charming nosegay is the result. One could almost caress it, it is so mild and unassuming. But the great "shows" must be put up there in a crotch, where they can look down on everything and everybody.

Now the way is open for the "cactus" members of the dahlia household. There must certainly have been a little half-smothered cry of delight when the first, the very first "cactus" opened its eyes upon the flower world. No more primness, no more self-conscious righteousness, but with a jolly pirouette, the first case of floral bohemianism made its welcome appearance in the staid dahlia family. We are familiar with the appearance of the little nephew just as he escapes from the kindly ministrations of his maiden aunt. With corkscrew ringlets laboriously developed from obstinately straight locks, with broad, stiffly starched collar and a general expression of immaculate uncomfortableness, he moves about like a colt new to the check-rein. But take him in the midst of his romping, when his eyes are bright and his cheeks all aglow, and his hair is hopelessly tousled. He is the despair of auntie and the "cactus" of the family. Long, slender petals demurely waiting for the vagrant breezes, or tossed and tumbled in joyous disorder, give an airiness and grace to the "cactus" which no other dahlia can venture to imitate. Perhaps some sinister visaged individual may place us in the same category with the little maiden "who loved all her dolls just alike, especially one of them," but we are so walled in from all such unkind and partial criticism that we can well afford to ignore it. "Distance" has more than one advantage, as has been repeatedly brought home to us.

We unhesitatingly vote, therefore, for the "cactus," whether it be "Alpha," white ground, speckled and striped with purple, or "Gabriel," pale straw color with a rich crimson edging, or gorgeous "Mercury," orange and lemon thickly splashed with the same rich crimson. In the "show" class, we are quite satisfied that there was a fine display, for we heard many an ecstatic "ah!" and "oh!" from delighted visitors. Among the "fancies," there was one which, we confess it privately, almost shook our allegiance to the "cactus." It was "Gold Medal," a bright canary yellow, regularly striped with deep red. The pompous had no reason to cover their faces in such grand company, but there was one, "Brunette," which was particularly striking. Very full and double, it presented the novelty of a clear white centre bordered by a broad band of carmine.

Among the attractions at the Dahlia Show were an exhibit of blooms of the tuberous-rooted begonia and a very choice and varied assortment of gladioli. These latter were from the immense Long Island flower farm of John Lewis Childs, who raises them by the acre. Some seedlings that he displayed were as brilliant as the Gandavensis, while they compared favorably in size with his well-known Childsi. Henry A. Dreer, the famous Philadelphia florist, exhibited an exquisite assortment of aquatics, the rare victoria regia among them. There were others more within reach of the average householder, such as the stately nelumbium and the delicately tinted Zanzibar water lilies, not to mention the hardy varieties which all have seen and admired. But it was the Dahlia Show, and therefore,—

LITERATURE

Hurdcott. By JOHN AYSCOUGH. St. Louis: B. Herder.

Whenever a new story by "John Ayscough" is announced novel readers have learned to expect a book that will not only be of absorbing interest, but will actually leave them better for the reading. This is high praise now. However, the author of "Hurdcott," besides being a literary artist, is a Catholic prelate. The scene of the story is England, the time, early in the nineteenth century. In the first chapter we meet the gentle Elia, his sister Mary, and Hazlitt, the essayist, seated at a parson's whist-table. But somewhat to the reader's disappointment, they soon retire to leave the stage to Consuelo and Hurdcott, the protagonists in the tragedy that begins to unfold. The heroine has come from her Spanish mother's home in Sicily to join her father's people, and on the coach's meeting a mishap, she is guided to Squire Dauntsey's by Hurdcott, a handsome young man, who though of noble birth, was left by his mother at a lonely shepherd's door. The fair Consuelo has other suitors, Hungerford, the dreamy East Indian, and Caradoc, a Welsh gentleman, but she gives her heart to Hurdcott, the ill-starred shepherd. For though wholly innocent, the hero, on circumstantial evidence, is condemned to death for a murder; but a few hours before his execution, Consuelo becomes a Catholic, and is married to Hurdcott in his prison cell. After the last good-by, as she turns away from the jail, Consuelo sees a little child in the path of some galloping horses; she rushes forward to save the babe, and is herself crushed by the wheels of the heavy wagon. So in death the lovers are not divided, but are buried side by side in the village churchyard.

The dialogue of the book is as witty and clever as is the author's other works and the character portrayals as striking. To create the situations Consuelo often has to ignore conventions, and it is remarkable how little is said by Hurdcott, though he dominates the story. Amelia and Priscilla, the heroine's maiden aunts, Uncle Stratford, in mortal fear of having a popish candle thrust into his hand as he dies, the hearty Father Ryan, Basil, the rejected suitor, who becomes a monk, Lady Caradoc, the shrewd worldling, and Squire Dauntsey, whom Consuelo's coming makes a better man, are all consistently and powerfully drawn.

Wendake Ehen, or, Old Huronia. By the Archivist of St. Mary's College, Montreal, Arthur Edward Jones, S.J. Printed by order of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, 1909.

The Indian title to this valuable book is the equivalent of the old classical expression "Fuit Ilion." Perhaps "Vanished Huronia" would therefore better give the meaning of the title than "Old Huronia." "This book," says its distinguished and erudite author, "has no pretension to do duty as a history either of the Huron Nations, or of the men who devoted their lives to their evangelization, but it may prove helpful to those who purpose treating in full the many thrilling incidents which preceded the downfall and dispersion of a once powerful and prosperous race. It will serve to disentangle many a snarl of dates, and fix the scenes where events were enacted."

Essentially, therefore, it is not a book for common reading, but for reference. A single glance at its pages would indeed put the average reader to flight, but, on the other hand, they will be of absorbing interest to the scientific investigator. Any one who has attempted to study the "Relations of the Jesuits" will appreciate what Father Jones means when he speaks of "the snarl of dates." The "Relations" are not consecutive letters; they were sent by the missionaries to their Superiors in Quebec or Paris, and edited as well as could be done, but as the years overlap in the long series of volumes which were given to the public during the space of forty years, the historical student is often tempted to give up in despair his attempts at exact chronology. It is the same for the locations. The missionaries were careful to state that they went in such and such a direction, and they nearly always noted how many leagues they traveled on their journeys; but the uncertainty about what they meant by a "league," and how often the straight line was deflected by mountains and rivers and lakes, are so dubious at times that only such patient and protracted researches as Father Jones has given to the task could succeed in arriving at anything like a precise knowledge about where the various mission posts were placed. Fortunately as those great explorers were nearly always observant men, and were given to set down very minute details about the physical surroundings of at least their permanent residences, it was possible to fix their apostolic habitats with tolerable certainty. Father Jones' extraordinary familiarity with every page of the "Relations" has in this way given him a very great advantage over other topographers.

Though not precisely in the line of his work, this quest of localities has almost inevitably led the learned writer into short sketches of events, and he has been also able after laborious researches to catalogue the names of the occupants of the principal stations. Even the patronymics of the Donnés are rescued from oblivion; though it is to be regretted that no record was left by the missionaries of the boys or the workmen who were employed.

The work is illustrated by some very charming pictures taken from water color sketches, which had been made by the famous Father Martin, the founder of St. Mary's College, who was the first to give the impulse in our days to the study of the "Relations." It was he indeed who supplied Parkman with most of the information which went to make up that writer's reputation. It is a pity that Father Martin was not able to eliminate some of Parkman's Protestant bias.

One cannot help regretting that Father Jones did not hand over some of these precious aquarelles to Father Campbell to illustrate his "Pioneer Priests," but authors, we suppose, are like hens on a nest. They keep quietly turning their eggs in such a way that even those who are watching the nest scarcely detect their operation. It is one of the glories and rights of maternity.

This valuable contribution to ethnological science has been printed by the Ontario Government, which is to be congratulated on its choice of a collaborator in their work of finding out the facts about the aborigines. * * *

From Western China to the Golden Gate. With Thirty Illustrations. By ROGER SPRAGUE. Berkeley, Calif.: Lederer, Street & Zeus Co. By mail, 85 cents.

So many more pretentious books of travel consist largely of an enumeration of objects that were not seen, but might have been, had time or some other whipping-boy permitted, that it is a relief to pick up a chatty description of persons and things Chinese that really were seen, and not by a newly arrived stranger, but by one who had already been long enough in the Celestial Empire to know the temper of its people.

The start for home is made away off yonder near Thibet, in the City of Chentu. Porters and native craft convey the traveler overland and down one of China's great waterways until he is once more within reach of occidental civilization. His descriptions of the joys of life in a native inn, of his visit to the seldom visited gigantic statue of Buddha, and of the beggars who were marshaled as an army with banners and then were suddenly swept from public view open our eyes to what China is. He brings in, too, a heartrending tale of a young missionary who set out with his wife and babe for those distant regions. While on the journey, the infant died and the father became delirious from fever. Fancy the wife and mother alone among those rude boatmen!

He has a closing chapter on the awakening of China, from which it seems that he looks upon the Chinese as less conservative than they are commonly held to be, and he gives proofs of his statements. The illustrations are novel and attractive. * * *

Life of St. Aloysius Gonzaga, Patron of Christian Youth. By MAURICE MESCHLER, S.J. Translated by a Benedictine of the Perpetual Adoration. St. Louis: B. Herder.

Father Meschler's volume appeared in German some twenty years ago, on the occasion of St. Aloysius' tercentenary, and has now been turned into English by the same nun who translated so well the author's admirable life of our Divine Saviour. As Father Martindale remarks, in an introduction he contributes, St. Aloysius has suffered at the hands of iconographers who impart to "his reputation a languishing air wholly out of keeping with his ardent and masculine personality," and some biographers of the saint "are responsible for the impression of unreality" left upon their readers. But Father Meschler's book is not of this kind. For by availing himself of Father Cepari's classic life of the young Jesuit, and by making use of all the letters and documents that were brought to light in 1890, the author has given us a true portrait. The biography combines the merits both of a critical and devotional work, for footnotes abound, and the author's reflections are made in his usual striking and practical fashion.

To say of high-born saints that they conferred more dis-tion on their houses by renouncing the world than they ever would have won as mere lords or ladies is a preacher's commonplace, but in the case of St. Aloysius it is remarkably true. Even if the young Marquis of Castiglione had taken a very prominent part in the stirring events of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, how few would now be mentioning the name of that prince of the empire compared with the millions who have invoked the intercession and imitated the virtues of this prince of Heaven? Yet even while he lived Aloysius' "great refusal" brought honor to his family that it is hard for a democratic age like ours to realize, and as for the countless spiritual advantages his relatives derived from the saint's prayers and counsel and example, Father Meschler shows they were above all price. Castiglione made a good investment when he gave his first-born to the Society.

"St. Patrick," in the Notre Dame series of lives of the Saints (St. Louis: B. Herder), is a readable reproduction of the historic facts of the Irish Apostle's life and of the legends that gathered around them. Though the author frequently warns us that the fanciful stories are unauthoritative, he so interweaves them occasionally with real occurrences, notably in "the great contest of Tara," that his object—"to introduce the inexperienced reader to the study of St. Patrick's life and times in such a manner that, should he be tempted to pursue that study further, he may at least find nothing of importance to unlearn"—is hardly attained. Such a reader would be safer with Archbishop Healy, Father Morris or Cardinal Moran. Aubrey de Vere's "Legends of St. Patrick" are freely used. There are 270 well-printed pages and seven illustrations. Price, $1.25.

Birds in Literature. With Sixteen Full Color Plates. By ABBY P. CHURCHILL. Worcester, Mass.: The Davis Press, Inc. Price $1.50.

"If we look for ugliness, we see ugliness, and our spiritual growth is abnormal and deformed. If we look for beauty, the beautiful meets us everywhere and transforms our minds and hearts."

This profound truth which Professor John G. Thompson, lays down in his sympathetic Introduction may well help to explain why the high-keyed and neurotic young people of to-day differ from the more self-contained and more light-hearted youth of yesterday, when nature was nearer to them and so many modern artificialities were unknown.

But let us give up philosophizing and look at the birds. Very lifelike are they in their splendid raiment, from the aristocratic oriole and the dazzling tanager to the bold jay, whose insolent and mocking "Hah!" seems to ring out from the pine tree where he is perched. Each will find his or her favorites, whether it be the melancholy bittersn or the gossiping little wren, or that lover of retirement, the woodcock, which is doomed to be soon as extinct as the dodo.

A few masterly lines of description, some of the beautiful legends connected with birds, and quotations from a wide range of authors in both prose and verse combine to make a charming book for one whose heart is right.

"The Old Home and Other Stories," issued by Benziger Brothers, is translated from the French of Dr. Chatelain, by Susan Gavan Duffy, though Miss Duffy's name appears twice on the cover as sole author. The "Old Home" was a Swiss Protestant parsonage, and the next story, of uninteresting "Reminiscences," informs us that the parson was the grandfather of the author, who is also a Protestant, as we learn in "The Federal Fast," which ridicules the Mass and represents open-air worship as much superior, for "it is not the priest who lights up the sun every morning and the stars at night," etc. The remaining stories are harmless and prettily told, but they are rather pagan than Catholic. It is strange that Miss Duffy, who has done some good work as a Catholic writer, should translate this volume, but stranger still that a professedly Catholic publishing house should issue it. Critics are sometimes accused of not reading the works they criticize; perhaps publishers likewise do not always read their own publications.

EDUCATION

As one of the series of educational papers running in its Saturday issues for some weeks past, the New York Times of September 23 publishes a splendid criticism of the intemperate manner in which the advocates of "vocational" training in schools are pushing the claims of this particular hobby ridden by a number of educators to-day. One cannot but express a cordial wish that the scholarly argument of Dr. Andrew F. West, Dean of the Graduate School of Princeton University, would stay effectually the eagerness impelling the leaders of a movement that looks to the "immediately useful" if not as the sole end of education, at least as the chief and most desirable purpose of school training.

Dr. West, almost at the outset of his paper, concedes the imagined irrefutable stand of the defenders of the hobby which he pillories. "Of course," he frankly admits, "nine-tenths of those who go to school must 'make a living.' Of course, their education should help to this end. Of course, it is folly to give them or anyone else 'useless' training. Of course, very many will be lucky to get so much as even a 'practical' training. And, of course, the early 'practical' training is the best many can take and appreciate. It is some help—perhaps all they can get. And they must have it. It is their hard lot not to be able to get or to appreciate more." Admitting all these stock explanations of the exaggerated vocationalists' position, the Princeton professor finds it easy for them "to slide into acquiescence with the notion that the visible side is the chief thing, and that the real end of education is 'practical,' 'vocational,' 'something you can see the use of,' 'something that will help a man to make a living.'" It is, he says, because the utilitarian purpose, good only when followed as subordinate to something higher—the making of a good life—comes in with almost irresistible sweep. "Yet," he adds at once, and it is the pith and substance of an exposition which is masterly, "so long as it remains true that 'man does not live by bread alone,' all men, so far as they can possibly get the chance, should be trained to be breadwinners—and something more. It is this 'something more' which has always measured, and we may well believe, will always measure the difference between the man who cannot rise in the intellectual and moral scale and the man who can."

* * *

How has it come to pass among us that many "educated men" have abandoned the old conservative principle resting upon the very foundations of educational theory and amply confirmed by the results of history? There was a day in which no intelligent student worried himself with the question of the "immediate usefulness" of school or college training, but found himself justified in believing that every diligent human being of even moderate capacity became much more intelligent through its opportunity than he would have been, or perhaps could have been, without it. Whence has come the change that makes learning desirable only in as far as it helps to money getting—for this, in the final analysis, is the basis of the creed of the exaggerated vocationalist. Dr. West thus accounts for it. In our American system of education, he premises, "an immense amount of work has been done with conscience, persistence and enthusiasm. Almost every new idea introduced has been given a trial and worked 'for all it was worth.' We have had educational discussion in torrents and a deluge of publication. There has been freedom to say anything and to try anything that seemed worth saying or trying. On certain sides of this somewhat tumultuous and multiform development we have been marvelously successful, particularly in regard to the laborious devotion of our teachers and the perfecting of the externals of education."

* * *

The head of Princeton's Graduate School is quite clear, however, in the limits which he assigns to this marvelous success. Because of the liberal pecuniary provision made by our several States and cities the construction of our newer schoolhouses, their equipment, the well-planned playgrounds, the arrangements for securing good air and light, the sanitation,—“these and a thousand other big and little things subservient to education in an external way have been perfected better in our land than elsewhere.” We are, he agrees, first in the world in the matter of usable educational machinery. But, he adds, a disproportionate amount of energy has been given to the machinery, and while all that we boast of has been done with quick-witted knowledge, it has not been done with intelligence, since “due regard has not been paid to the relative value of the outer mechanism of education when compared with the invisible processes to be used and the invisible end to be attained in dealing with the pupil's high possibilities as a developing human being.”

* * *

The neglect of this due regard inevitably has led to the prevalent evil threatening our schools—outer devices and routine are mistaken for the inner life of education. Dr. West speaks of the “mechanized teaching which ensues, class after class, section after section ‘going through’ the routine with the same ‘lock-step,’ and the teacher expected and required to deliver ‘the tale of bricks’ in the shape of so many pupils moulded alike.” Naturally there must come a recoil from the dispiriting tedium of a system whose chief characteristic appears to be the measuring of intellectual activity by the external machinery of hours of attendance at class, notes, marks, credits, points, and all the other devices excogitated by the cramped pedagogics of the day. Unhappily the recoil appears to carry men to another extreme. Pleasant diversions, which are not studies at all, says Dr. West, are being introduced into our school programmes, and these, “diverting the pupil, indeed, from lifeless routine, divert him also from intellectual effort.” “Are our American boys and girls so feeble-minded,” he asks, “that they cannot stand thorough training in things of the mind? . . . It may be humbling to our pride to admit it, and yet if we are aware of the facts, we must know that we do not yet equal the Old World schools in this all-important matter of intelligent thoroughness.”

* * *

The Princeton Dean quotes with hearty commendation the resolute stand taken by so highly informed a statesman as Arthur Balfour in an address delivered last July, as well as the editorial comment thereon which appeared in the London Times:

“We often hear it said that the learning should have a practical purpose; and that sounds reasonable enough until we inquire what is meant by practical. Then we usually find that practical means money getting. We are told that learning is only valuable if it helps a man in the struggle for life. But if that is ever generally believed, the universities will change their nature and our civilization will become only an elaborately organized barbarism. Universities rose into being and flourished in power and splendor because their business was to help not the individual in his struggle for life, but the world in its effort to rise above the struggle for life.”

This, comments Dr. West, is the whole case in a nutshell. As a mere matter of national economy, and, quite apart from its overwhelming moral importance, it “pays” a nation to have as many as possible of its citizens educated in “something more” than breadwinning.

St. Xavier College, for close to three-quarters of a century the most noted and successful Catholic institution for advanced educational work in Ohio, has long been facing the problem of its future expansion made difficult by the development of industrial and manufacturing establishments in the immediate neighborhood of its present location in Cincinnati. A week or two ago a step was taken that probably solves the difficulty. After long-continued negotiation, the Trustees of the College became the possessor of the former home of the Avondale Golf Club, a beautiful tract of twenty-two and one-half acres situated at the end of Dana Avenue, in Avondale, Cincinnati's most delightful suburb. For the time being the College will use the property as a site for a branch high school. An immediate effect of the purchase, it is stated, will be the abandonment of the Walnut Hills succursal high school maintained by the St. Francis faculty for some years back. This will be moved to the new home. Gradually there will be assembled on the property just purchased a group of buildings worthy of the venerable institution which has won a distinguished name in its long years of excellent work in Cincinnati. It is not intended to go ahead with the new buildings for a year or more. In the meantime the alumni of the college, whose organization is an unwontedly strong one in St. Xavier's are planning to erect a club house on the place, where the former grounds of the Golf Club will serve as an ideal spot for out-door sports for them and for the present generation of students.

* * *

From St. Xavier's, too, comes welcome intelligence that all is in readiness to open a new department, a College of Commerce, Accounting and Finance, where young business men will find opportunity of training in correct and scientific principles of business. The Alumni Association of the College has taken a lively interest in the new school, and at a crowded meeting, held on September 13, its members showed such enthusiasm in support of the plan, and suggested such efficient and practical schemes to start the work, that this novel step in Cincinnati's educational work seems assured of signal and lasting success.

ECONOMICS

From time to time the problem of the cause of increased prices of food comes up, and there is generally a professor of political economy ready with the obvious solution. He consults his books and finds that an increase of gold tends to raise prices. He consults Wall Street and learns that the supply of gold has increased. He then jumps to the conclusion that the latter is the cause of the increase of the butcher's and grocer's bill.

He seems to ignore the fact that the older economists to whom he owes his principles supposed that the general economic condition would remain the same. Given a fairly constant relation between consumers and producers, consumption and product, and the medium of exchange, it is true that if this be increased prices will tend to rise. If there be one hundred bushels of wheat to be bought, and the available medium be one hundred dollars, wheat will be worth a dollar a bushel. If the medium increase to two hundred dollars, the sellers, if they are sharp, will get two dollars a bushel. But similar results will come from a change in the number of consumers, in the quantity of wheat produced, in the cost of its production and distribution, in the number of producers and distributors and the need they are in of selling. It is quite possible, too, that the effect of one of these partial causes may counteract that of another. Variation of price is so complex a matter that, even in the old order, all these elements had to be considered and given each its proper value, before the problem could be solved.

But the old order has passed away. Economic conditions to-day are no more those of half a century ago, than are political and social. As we pointed out some two years ago—and we are glad to see that the investigations of others more competent than ourselves tend to confirm our judgment—the increase of prices is due to the changes that followed the great gold discoveries, especially in South Africa. That gold has built up huge cities, drawn to them an immense mass of consumers, made possible huge armies and navies, involving millions to be clothed, housed and fed, opened up distant sources of supply, built ships and railways, employing more consumers, to distribute that supply, multiplied conveniences and luxuries, and in doing all these things it has occupied its capacity to the full, so that its increase has had no direct effect on the increase of prices.

Indirectly, however, that increase is responsible in great measure for the rise in prices. It has brought about that the consumers grow in numbers year by year out of all proportion to the producers. During the last decade the population of the country increased by 21 per cent., the acreage of agricultural lands increased by only 4.2 per cent., and of improved land, by 15.2 per cent. The wants of the consumers have been heightened by the growth of luxury while the means of supply tend to diminish. The great plains of North and South America have been taken up and exhausted to no small extent by continuous cropping, as the returns per acre, if compared with those of twenty years ago, will show; and the grain growers—they are not farmers—have pushed further and further north and west looking for virgin soil to be treated in the same wasteful manner. The conditions with regard to cattle are analogous. The West is no longer filled with great herds running wild until the time comes to corral them and drive them into the cattle-cars. The restriction of pasture land by the growth of towns and the augmenting of cultivated lands by means of irrigation is changing all that. In the United States the demands of consumers are yearly approaching the capacity of feeding them, as the diminishing exports of food prove, as well as the need of reaching foreign supplies, which prompted the proposal of reciprocity with Canada. In all these may be found the chief reasons for the increase of the price of food.

THE FIFTH NATIONAL EUCHARISTIC CONGRESS

With the pealing of the chimes and bells of every Catholic church in city and county the Eucharistic Congress opened at Cincinnati on Thursday, September 28. As the long procession of religious in the habits of their orders, priests in cassock and surplice, bishops and functionaries of the Mass passed between the large fluted columns into the Cathedral the many-voiced choir of men and boys rang out its jubilant greeting: "Ecce Sacerdos Magnus." Soon the entire nave was densely filled with priests and clerics, while the purple of the prelates and the golden vestments of the celebrant and assistants at the Mass, together with the lights and garlands gave to the sanctuary that beauty and glory which become the Eucharistic King holding His court where He sits enthroned in the silent tabernacle.

The sides and aisles of the church were thronged with the faithful, who pressed forward to the very altar rails and filled the niches of the windows. When Archbishop Moeller had celebrated the pontifical Mass, Archbishop Ireland, of St. Paul, was with difficulty escorted through the dense mass which surrounded the pulpit. His square-set features and commanding presence at once exercised their influence upon the multitude, as he solemnly pronounced the opening words of the Gospel of St. John: "In the beginning was the Word and the Word was with God, and the Word was God," and then added, "'and the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us' and now I say the Word was made flesh and dwells among us. What! the incarnate Word on earth, in the midst of men, this very day, so that we to-day may draw nigh to Him, speak to Him, hold Him in loving embrace! Yes, brethren, all that and more. It is yet ours to receive Him, flesh and blood, soul and divinity, as very food."

"The Eucharist," he said in substance, "is the complement of the Incarnation. What new mystery will the Christ unfold in order to be mine to-day as I live remote in space from Palestine, remote in time from the morning when angels bade the shepherds hurry to the lowly crib where lay the new-born Saviour? What mystery but that of the Eucharist."

"The Eucharist is the palladium of the Incarnation. Vainglorious scientists, readers of distorted history, rebellious rationalists are all hurling their envenomed darts at the doctrine of the Incarnation. Faith in the Eucharist is faith in the Incarnate God; to rally to the defence of the Eucharist is to battle for the Incarnation itself. The Watcher of the Vatican, with a vision clarified by the Spirit of God, has well read the signs of the times in calling upon us to gather in our love about the Blessed Sacrament. Israel to thy camp! The world whispers that faith in the Incarnation is dead; let us raise a shout that the world may hear and know that it liveth, that there are devoted souls prepared to champion it."

After the sermon a meeting of the priests was held in the Cathedral hall, where Bishop Maes, of Covington, explained the threefold purpose of the Congress: "to set aglow the heart of the priest; to set aglow the parish in which he works; to set aglow society itself with the Eucharistic fire." Archbishop Moeller then extended a hearty welcome to the clergy. According to a somewhat generous estimate of the local press, there were a thousand priests in attendance. In the afternoon two papers were read and discussed, and four more on the following days, before a large and appreciative audience of priests and prelates, showing the enthusiasm which the Eucharistic devotion, the very life of the priesthood, had aroused in their hearts. Great care had been expended not merely upon the papers, but likewise upon the preparation of the discussions. Papers and discussions will appear in a printed account that is soon to be officially published.

To bring down upon these deliberations the greatest grace of the Holy Spirit, and fittingly to glorify the Holy Eucharist before the faithful and all the world, pontifical Mass was celebrated with all due pomp and splendor. The sermons at these Masses were delivered by Bishops James J. Hartley, of Columbus; Bishop Joseph Schrembs, of Toledo, and Archbishop John M. Farley, of New York. The ceremonies closed with a brilliant Eucharistic pageant that took place Sunday afternoon, at Norwood Heights, with sermon by Rev. Robert B. Condon and solemn Benediction of the Most Blessed Sacrament.

Of the four preceding National Eucharistic Congresses in the United States, the first was held at St. Louis, in 1901; the second, in New York, in 1905; the third in Pittsburgh, in 1907, and the fourth at Notre Dame, Indiana, in 1909. We see how recent the movement is, since even the first international Eucharistic Congress was held only thirty years ago. Gently and sweetly the Holy Spirit has disposed that all things should co-operate in our day towards the great Eucharistic re-awakening of the world. The Fifth National Congress has now likewise passed into history, but it has left glorious results that will not cease with it, but will live on forever. Devotion to the Holy Eucharist has been increased, the hearts of priests and people are inflamed with a more ardent love, the little ones shall come in ever greater numbers to the Banquet of the Lord.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The Amsterdam Evening Recorder, for September 15, gives the following account of the memorial planned for Father Isaac Jogues, the Jesuit missionary martyred by the Mohawk Indians in the seventeenth century near Auriesville, New York:

At the meeting of the New York State Historical Association at Kingston, Thursday, W. Max Reid, of this city, chairman of the committee appointed in relation to the erection of a memorial to Father Jogues on the Isle of Lac du Sacrement, presented the following report:

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

As chairman of your committee on the Jogues memorial, I am happy to report substantial progress, as follows:

Your committee has had the good fortune to secure an island on Lake George and place the same under the custody of the New York State Historical Society, the state at the same time ordering that the island be renamed Isle of Lac du St. Sacrement. The island selected is the largest of the "Mother Bunch" group and the most northern of the large islands of Lake George. A sign has been erected on this island at a place where it is visible from the decks of Lake George steamers, bearing the following legend:

Isle of Lac du St. Sacrement.
Lake discovered and named by Isaac Jogues, S.J.,
May 30, 1646.

We are apt to wonder if this name, Lac du St. Sacrement, was not evanescent or perhaps only a tradition. But such is not the case. The name appears in the Relations of the Jesuits from 1646 to 1764, and even after it was named Lake George. It also appears in French and English documents up to 1755, when it was renamed Lake George by Sir William Johnson in August of that year. (I might say at this time that the Lake was named for King George II, and not for King George III, as sometimes stated. The reign of George III did not begin until 1760.)

So that you will see that the name Lac du St. Sacrement is not a new name, but one and particularly the only name that it bore for over one hundred years. Jogues also gives us the Iroquois name for the lake as an-dia-ter-oc-te, and the meaning as "the lake that shuts itself in."

The word "Horicon," mentioned by Cooper in the "Last of the Mohicans," was without meaning and may be dismissed without further comment.

I wish to acknowledge valuable assistance from John P. Burnham, Deputy State Forest Commissioner; Clifford N. Pettis, Superintendent of State Forests, and W. H. Burnett, State Game Protector. Also to his son, Bernard Burnett, for courteous attention. Also to the Board of Regents of the University of the State of New York for a very early approval of the scheme of erecting a memorial to Isaac Jogues.

But this is only giving you a report of the work your committee has accomplished and nothing of what they hope to do.

In regard to the memorial to Isaac Jogues, I will report that your committee has been to some expense, and has given a great deal of thought to the scheme without, at the present time, making a decision as to which of three plans they would recommend for your consideration. They have subscriptions for nearly $400, confined entirely to members of the committee.

One plan suggests a tablet of bronze on a block of granite with an appropriate legend, placed on the Isle of Lac du St. Sacrement, which would cost a few hundred dollars. The subscriptions of your committee would probably cover the cost. Another plan is a heroic statue of Father Isaac Jogues in granite, say fifteen feet high, placed upon a rock-faced support about five feet high, making the memorial twenty feet high. This could be installed on the island for less than $3,000. One fifteen feet high would cost about $2,300.

The third scheme is much more ambitious, and consists of a bronze statue of Father Jogues, designed by the noted artist, Conti. This would be thirty feet high and placed in a niche on the sloping face of Rogers Rock. This plan, you will see, will cost many thousands of dollars. However, if ten or more of the wealthy residents of Lake George and vicinity would each subscribe $1,000, this last plan can be carried out.

In closing, I desire to call to your mind the address on the subject of Father Jogues by the Rev. T. J. Campbell of New York City, delivered at the never to be forgotten sessions of this society on Lake Champlain last October. A revised and illustrated edition of that address has been issued from the press of AMERICA, of which Father Campbell is editor. As a matter of education it would be well for members of this society to secure a copy of this edition.

Mr. President, I would respectfully request that the committee on the Jogues memorial be continued, with instructions if you have any to give.

The committee on the Jogues monument consists of W. Max Reid, chairman; Mrs. Harry W. Watrous, New York; David Williams, New York; the Rev. Father T. J. Campbell, New York, and George P. Knapp, Shelving Rock, Lake George.

PERSONAL.

A signal honor was recently conferred on Madame Curie, to whom belongs, as Professor Curie told the world, more than half the credit for the discovery of radium. At the congress of radioactivity and electricity, lately held in Brussels, an endeavor was made to establish a standard of measurement for the emanations of radium. Madame Curie was appointed to conduct the investigations, as the only person possessing sufficient knowledge of the subject to do so. The unit of measurement, it was decided, will be the "curie," and thus the name of this distinguished woman of science will be perpetuated as the names of Ohm, Volta and Ampère are commemorated in electrical units. The world in general will look upon this distinction as greater than that of membership in the Department of Science in the French Academy, to which the "immortals" of that body, through respect for a tradition, declined to elect her.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

Rhode Island is credited with having the largest proportion of Catholics to population of any State in the Union. Its flourishing Catholic schools, with nearly 20,000 children in attendance, are a surety that within the borders of the little State the Church will make still greater progress in the near future. The cosmopolitan character of the present generation, however, offers a problem of assimilation no less perplexing to the State than to the Church. In this respect Southern Massachusetts and Rhode Island may be viewed as one. The old farms are in the hands of Portuguese, Italians and Armenians, says the Taunton Gazette. The fishermen are Greeks and Portuguese and a large proportion of the sailors. The laborers are mainly Portuguese and Italians. The pedlars who traverse the country districts and the gatherers of junk are mainly Jews, with an occasional Syrian. The textile factory people are Poles, Greeks, French and Russian by a large majority. In the shoemaking industry Scandinavians, Canadians, French and Armenians abound, and in the remaining iron mills there is a large infusion of Portuguese among the workers. The impress of Southern Europe is likely to be powerful in Southern New England, and the new social structure bound to evolve will have little trace of the Pilgrim and the Puritan.

The Spanish Friars Minor of the Leonine Union have charge of the Vicariate Apostolic in Morocco, the Vicar-Apostolic being Mgr. Francis Mary Cervera, Titular Bishop of Fessa. With the exception of the European residents, the Jews, who in all the cities are confined to separate quarters, and a body of aborigines, the Berbers, living in the Atlas Plateau, the whole population of Morocco is Mohammedan, and is inaccessible to Christian propaganda. The Prefecture Apostolic of Morocco was founded in 1631, its first incumbent, Blessed Giovanni da Prado, O.F.M., being martyred in that year at Marrakesh. His feast is kept by the Franciscan Order on May 29. Other missionaries continued to exercise their ministry through trials and persecutions of every kind until 1859, when the prefecture was organized on its present basis. Of the 6,000,000 inhabitants in the vicariate, the Catholics number 13,580.

The first national congress of Holy Name Societies will be convened at Baltimore, October 16-18. As these dates coincide with the days appointed for the jubilee celebration in honor of His Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, a large attendance is expected. The Rt. Rev. Owen B. Corrigan, Auxiliary Bishop of Baltimore and Archdiocesan Director of the Holy Name Society, has sent the official program of the Holy Name Congress to the Right Reverend and Reverend diocesan spiritual directors of the societies in the United States.

The following is a translation of the Circular-Letter of the S. Consistorial Congregation forbidding the use of Duchesne's "History of the Ancient Church" in Italian seminaries. We take it from our esteemed contemporary, Rome:

It is known to the Holy See that Duchesne's "History of the Ancient Church" has found entrance into some seminaries and has been put into the hands of the students, if not as a textbook, at least as a book of reference.

Had attention been paid to the admissions made in a recent controversy by the very persons who looked after the publication of this work, viz., that it is "a book reserved for the learned, for men of deep culture, and not to be diffused in the seminaries," greater care would certainly have been taken in admitting this work.

But, apart from this confession of the persons interested, I have to put a far graver judgment before the most reverend diocesan ordinaries. For in view of the doubt as to whether Duchesne's "History of the Ancient Church" might be admitted or at least tolerated in the Seminaries, I asked, as was my duty, the opinion of competent consultors, persons not only extraneous to the recent polemics, but moderate in the highest degree, and their pronouncement has been absolutely in the negative; since owing to the studied and continued reticences (which, indeed, are admitted by the author himself) regarding matters of the first importance, especially when they bear on the supernatural, the doubt he casts on others, or the manner in which he expounds them, he not only fails to give the true idea of the history of the Church, but falsifies it and distorts it enormously by presenting the Church as though she were destitute of those supernatural charismata on which she is based and without which she cannot be explained.

Add to this the picture he gives of the martyrs, the great majority of whom he eliminates, and whom he often represents as fanatics, thus weakening the great arguments on behalf of the Faith which was furnished by their supernatural heroism: while the persecutors, on the contrary, are described as men of genius instigated in their persecutions by a great political ideal.

The very Fathers of the Church, those real geniuses of mankind, issue from this history diminished and in some cases annihilated. So, too, the epic conflicts for the Faith against the heretics are often passed off as quibbling disputes, the result of misunderstandings which might easily have been set right; as though there were no substantial differences between the faith of the Fathers of the Church and that of Arius and others. No less badly treated are many other points of capital importance, such as cultus of the Ever Blessed Virgin, the state of the Roman Church, the unity of the Church, etc. For these reasons the reading of this History has been judged to be extremely dangerous, at times even disastrous, so that its introduction into the seminaries must be absolutely forbidden, even as merely a book of reference.

The matter having been referred to the Holy Father, His Holiness has fully approved this opinion and has ordered me to make the necessary communications to the most reverend ordinaries of Italy, and this I do by the present circular.

G. CARD. DE LAI, Secretary.
Rome, Sept. 1, 1911.

Norwich, Connecticut, witnessed, September 24, the rare ceremony of the solemn consecration of a church. Some of the worshipers present remembered when, some sixty years ago, the few Catholics then in Norwich worshiped in a humble chapel, little better than a hovel. Their new Church of St. Patrick, a stately Gothic edifice in granite, one of the largest and most artistic in New England, and completely free of debt and encumbrance, bears witness to their marvelous growth. Bishop Nilan of Hartford performed the solemn ceremonies consecrating the edifice irrevocably to God; High Mass was celebrated by Bishop Beaven of Springfield, and the Rt. Rev. Louis J. Walsh, Bishop of Portland, delivered the sermon. The evening sermon was preached by Rev. Terence J. Shealy, S.J., head of the Laymen's Retreat movement of New York. Having paid a merited tribute to Father Trainor, the pastor, and his faithful people for "creating, maintaining and freeing from debt a parish property of a money value approximating half a million," Bishop Walsh said of their predecessors:

"Sixty years or more ago, a few people came here from Tara's Hills, their only lesson to keep the commandments. The family was sacred from any divorce scandal, the mother was content to bear as many children as God sent her, and to welcome each new one as dearer than those that had come before. The father was devoted to his daily work for the sake of his family; the pure-spoken young man and young woman went from the church to set a good example among their associates. Great indeed was the family life, having its due effect upon society! The result has been a glorious Church, because the fathers kept the commandments. The apparently impossible was conquered, and the fruits have come to the present generation, because of keeping the divine command."

Over five hundred teachers, representing the principal Catholic schools of the Archdiocese of Westminster and the Diocese of Southwark, attended a mission given, in the first week of September, at St. George's Cathedral, Southwark. Father John McHale, S.J., of St. Francis Xavier's, Liverpool, conducted the exercises.

SCIENCE

The Gross-Lichterfelde Institute of Berlin announces a new method for the testing of building materials. A blast of fine quartz sand under a pressure of two atmospheres is projected for two minutes against the substance under test, and the resistivity of the material to the cutting and wearing power of the blown sand is the rating of its strength. American engineers are reviewing the method very favorably.

In view of the high price of platinum the International Committee of Weights and Measures in its annual report suggests the substitution of tantalum for this metal in the construction of standard weights. Tantalum, which resists all the strong mineral acids except hydrofluoric acid, has been found to satisfy the necessary requirements of permanence and hardness. The cost would thus be reduced by two-thirds, it is said.
